Bibliotheca Harleiana II. This room contains another part of the Harleian manuscripts, treating chiefly of philosophical, historical, and philosophical subjects, in a variety of languages, and by many different authors.

In this room is a series of French medals, beginning with those of Pharamond.

Harleiana III. Chartæ & Rotuli. This fourth room of the department contains the Harleian collection collection of originals (or very ancient and authentic copies of) charters, acts of parliament, deeds, warrants, rolls, and other instruments in writing, relative to a great number of transactions at home and abroad.

In the fifth room is carefully preserved, in several small cabinets, Sir Hans Sloane's collection of medals. Their number is said to be upwards of twenty thousand.

Bibliotheca Sloaniana MSS. The sixth room contains Sir Hans Sloane's manuscripts. They are a valuable collection, though not so ancient as those already mentioned. Their subjects are comprehensive, and consequently may be esteemed of general use. There are many original treatises on philosophy, physic, natural history, and, in fine, almost the whole circle of sciences.

In this room is to be seen a table of the pontifical medals, beginning with Martin the fifth, (who was the first of the popes that struck them good) and carried on in a chronological series to the present times.

The second department contains natural and artificial productions.

Collectio Sloaniana. There are many pieces of antiquity in this room, consisting of a great number of urns, vessels, &c. used of old by different nations.

Antiquitates Aegyptiacæ. In the repositories bearing this title are a great number of Egyptian antiquities; and first, several bronze figures, some representing Isis with the infant Orus on her lap; in others she is standing with a variety of symbols.

Here are some figures of Osiris, represented by a man with a large beard.

A figure of an old bearded man, with a kind of basket over his head.

An urn, with a cover cemented to it, containing an Ibis; its form is that of an inverted cone.

A basso relievo in marble, representing an idol of Mendes in Egypt, where they formerly worshipped a goat.

An alabaster urn, with a cover made in form of a hawk's head, and marked with several hieroglyphics.

A great number and variety of small earthen figures, shaped like mummies, with the head of Isis, or Osiris, some adorned with hieroglyphics, others plain.

Several bustos and groups of figures in earthen ware.

A vessel of white porous earth, which is said to have a particular quality; for if you fill it with water, and lay seeds of small fallot in the furrows of the outside, they will grow, and be fit for use in a few days.

At the upper end of the table are several more figures in metal of Osiris, Isis, Harpocrates, Egyptian priests, &c.

An Egyptian god represented by the figure of a bull.

Several small amulets with loops to them, which the Egyptians wore about their persons, as charms, or preservatives against bad fortune, unforeseen accidents, sickness, &c.

The head of Anubis, or Cynocephalus, a dog which in Egypt they worshipped.

Figures of a cat, a monkey, &c. scarabs, beetles of various sizes made of marble, agate, cornelian, &c.

Some small oblong pieces of enamelled earth, notched, as is in general conjectured, to mark the rising and falling of the water of the Nile. Also a cylinder, and some pebbles curiously marked with hieroglyphics and figures, and some Phœnician seals.

Antiquitates Hetruscæ. The four repositories under this title contain Hetruscan antiquities.

The first are some bronzes; as a figure of Mars, the god of war; a Deus Averruncus, the god who presided over the common sewers; a head of Proserpine, &c.

A great number of vessels of different forms, made of a kind of fine pale red earth; some of them plain, but elegantly varnished; others painted with figures, letters, and various ornaments. These vessels consist of amphoras, or vases with two handles, and covers to them very curiously painted and ornamented.

Jars with triangular mouths, intended to pour water on the hands of the priests, or for libations in their sacrifices.

Many pateras, dishes, of various shapes and sizes; some of them have pedestals.

Cups for containing the great variety of precious ointments that were formerly in use.

Some pateras very large, and ornamented with figures and Hetruscan letters.

Some urns of plain alabaster, and others very large, but ornamented with the same kind of figures and inscriptions as the large pateras above-mentioned. The letters do not agree with any alphabet now in use, or known.

Antiquitates Romana. The next six partitions are filled with Roman antiquities, and consist of several ancient figures, bustos and basso relievos of various kinds, and other curious articles.

First the copy of an antique piece of sculpture, made to perpetuate the memory of a slave that discovered a dangerous conspiracy against Rome, whilst grinding his knife.

Some wrestlers in stucco.

Lucina the goddess of childbirth, Æsculapius the god of physic, some vestals and sacrificing vessels in marble, and many marble heads, particularly of the emperor Adrian, Hercules, Plato the Philosopher, Juno, and others.

The bronze figures of Venus, Cupid, Hercules, Mars, &c. &c. Likewise the heads of Juno, Diana, Apollo, Mercury, Minotaurus, Faunus, &c.

Uncommon masks, various votaries or oblations, models of circuses, the places where they exhibited their public games; and several pieces of stones, bricks, and earthen pipes, dug out of the ruins of the ancient Roman buildings, aqueducts, &c.

Sacrificing Instruments. Under this head are a variety of odd fancied metal lamps; some like animals; others, monsters as have not their likeness in nature.

A sacri-

A sacrificing knife, simpulums, chalices, ladles, and other instruments of brass, used by the priests in their sacrifices.

A great number of Roman pateras, and dishes, various in form and size.

Lacrymatories. These were small glass, or earthen bottles, chiefly in the form of Phials. At the Roman funerals; the friends of the deceased used to fill them with their tears, and deposit them with the ashes.

A number of earthen sepulchral lamps of various forms.

Several square urns, with covers and inscriptions on them. And others of a more ordinary kind of Roman and British urns, wherein the ancients after having burnt the bodies of the deceased, deposited their ashes, burying them with the lamps, lacrymatories, &c. already described.

Antiquitates variae. T. Hollis, armr. dono dedit. Under this title are preserved a collection of antiquities of various kinds, which T. Hollis, esq; gave to the Museum.

The first are an alabaster round urn with a cover, and another of the same kind, but square: these were for the purpose of depositing ashes.

Several bronze figures of Egyptian idols, priests, &c.

A Typhon, Hercules, Mercury, Silenus, &c. and some more Hetruscan vessels.

Several figures of Roman gods, heroes, generals and soldiers.

Some marble bustos of Janus, Bifrons, Hercules, Balbinus Lucina and Diana.

Some large earthen jars, which the ancients used for philtration of liquids.

American idols. These are made of earth, and either burnt or hardened in the sun.

Next is a Japanese pagod, a model of a temple with an idol in it.

Several kinds of Indian pots and a variety of other articles by them applied to domestic uses.

A nest of baskets made of the bark of a tree, and edged with porcupines quills, died of various colours; and some large basons and ewers, of a pale green jasper with black spots.

On the sides of the room are hung up in frames several pieces of stucco ceilings, &c. some of them brought from Nero's bath at Rome, others from Pompeii.

A Bacchus of alabaster, and two earthen dishes of Raphael's painting.

The sword of state of Hugh Lupus, first earl of Chester; and some bastinadoes, which are instruments of punishment used by the Turks to beat the soles of the feet of offenders.

Some calumets of peace, large tobacco-pipes, which the Indians of North America use as a token of friendship.

Some whisks made of an Indian cow's tail, and brushes of fibrous roots and feathers.

A variety of musical instruments from the East and West-Indies; some of which are wind instruments, others have strings: likewise drums of several kinds from China and America, but more particularly some from Lapland.

A great variety of ancient mathematical instruments.

On the table of Roman antiquities are several heads and bustos, of which the head of Mercury, with a chain fixed to it, deserves notice.

Some pieces of bricks and tiles with figures and letters stamped on them.

Here are likewise some figures of animals, and heads of canes or sticks; and the specimens of the Roman fibulas, a kind of buckle or clasp, used by them to fasten their upper garments.

Also a variety of keys of different sorts, particularly the ring key, which for greater security was worn on the finger; and some bracelets and other ornaments, &c. of metal.

Various kinds of measures for oil, pulse, &c.

Some corn brought from the ruins of Herculaneum.

Some Turkish talismans, or charms, with arabic inscriptions, being generally a sentence of the Alcoran.

Some tahbahs or seals, (inscribed with Arabic words) which the Turks use instead of signing their names.

Some talismans and abraxas, a kind of spells or charms. Many of them are marked with the constellations; others have the figures of angels, &c.

A snuff-box made of the lava of Mount Vesuvius.

A ring set with a transparent agate.

Two pieces of serpentine stone for the lid and bottom of a snuff-box, and some pieces of metallic crystal from mount Aetna.

Among some bronze figures brought hither with the Cotton library, is one particularly worthy of remark, the naked body being covered with a rough substance, and upon the whole bears a great resemblance to the porcupine man, who some years ago shewed himself to the Royal Society.

Some thread, corn, hinges, and other matters, brought from the ruins of Herculaneum.

Lesbeuillier, dono dedit. We find here some Egyptian idols of a small size; among them is a figure of Harpocrates, adorned with all the symbols he is ever represented with.

Over the repositories in this room, are a great variety of modern and ancient articles, brought from the several distant parts of the world; particularly a large calabash (a kind of American vegetable) in the form of a globe.

Some Indian shields made of hides of the rhinoceros, or elephant.

Many specimens of hats of all sizes, and various materials.

Fans from Japan, China, Tonquin and other places; one of them is a remarkable large size, and made of the single leaf of a talipot tree.

Here are some drums, targets, and a great number of instruments of war.

A variety of American household utensils, made of vegetables, chiefly gourds; and some snow shoes and sledges used in the northern nations of Europe.

Collectio Sloaniana. This room contains a collection of minerals and fossils.

Silices. Achates. Sardi. In the cabinet under these these titles are many specimens of flints, agates, and cornelians.

At the top are some large pieces of chrystal, brought from the Hartz-forest in Germany, and other mines.

Iaspides. Jasper, a low prized precious stone. Heliotropium, the blood stone. Ophites, the serpentine marble. The Nephritic stone. Many sorts of florid jaspers, distinguished by a great variety of colours: some have, by the hand of nature, delineated on them representations of rivers, trees, landscapes, ruins of buildings, &c.

Apyri. Sulphura. In this repository are many specimens of stones that resist fire, and of the different kinds of Sulphurs, or inflammable minerals. Apyri, opaque rough stones. Lapis, Ollaris, a soft stone. Mica, the glimmer. Talc, a shining stone. Amianthus, an opaque brownish stone. Asbestos, the cotton-stone. Ambers of various kinds. Bitumens, jets, and coals, and the Asphaltus, or Jews pitch. Sulphurs, or brimstones.

Mineralia. Metallica. In this repository is to be seen a large collection of ores, from almost all the known mines in the world.

Here we find also many specimens of the different kinds of jasper.

Likewise a rough Egyptian pebble, broke into two parts; on each piece is a perfect resemblance of the head of Chaucer, as he is usually painted, entirely the work of nature.

Various pieces of Lapis Lazuli, or azure stone.

Next to these are a great number of specimens of precious stones of all kinds, opaque and transparent, rough and polished, some loose, others set.

Here are a great variety of pearls, particularly one of a purple colour, and another in the form of a bunch of grapes.

Among the models of diamonds, is that of Pitt's brilliant, which was sold to the king of France for 120,000*l.* The present king wears it in his hat instead of a button; its weight is 136½ carats.

A model of a fine rose diamond, weighing 139½ carats, being 2¼ carats more than Pitt's brilliant just above-mentioned; but, not having so fine a lustre, is not so valuable. This diamond formerly belonged to Charles the Bold, the last duke of Burgundy; and is at present in the possession of the emperor of Germany.

Among a great variety of chrystals, manufactured into vases, cups, boxes, &c. are some beads and balls of Chrystal. Likewise some bright glittering stones, and some pieces of coral, finely cut in various shapes.

In this table is a great deal of amber manufactured, particularly a fine cabinet, a curious crab, some bells, bottles, handles for instruments, &c. and some pieces of amber, in the substance of which insects are inclosed.

Here is a pestle, mortar, and plate of Egyptian porphyry.

In this room is the collection of Gustavus Brander, esq; it is very curious and consists chiefly of such specimens as are to be seen in the Sloanian collection.

In the cabinet between the windows are a great variety of incrustations and petrifications, as shells, corals, and other things.

In the two large tables are a very curious collection of fossil shells, figured fossils, natural and simple fossils, and particularly of minerals.

Collectio Sloaniana. This room contains a fine collection of fossil shells, figured fossils, recent shells, and some other articles. This is not the least curious part of the Museum; and the recent shells here preserved particularly claim the attention of the ladies; many of them are very scarce and valuable, others remarkably beautiful.

Among the contents of the repositories, or cabinets round the room, are, Salactites. These are a kind of stones formed by droppings of water, which being impregnated with certain stony particles, by degrees petrify, and grow to the hardness of a spar, and consist of several coats.

The Ludus Helmontii or waxen veins, as they are often called. This stone consists of several pebbles bedded in a mass of pure earth, which is grown to the hardness of a stone.

Under this title are deposited a human skull and a sword, both of which are compleatly covered over and incrustated with the same stony substance to a considerable thickness, yet without losing their form. They were found in the Tyber at Rome.

Silicustræ, many specimens of the palates of various kinds of fish,—petrified crabs.

Zoolithi, petrified parts of land animals. Among other specimens are the grinders of an elephant, &c.

Calculi, stones or balls found in the stomach or other parts of the intestines of animals.

Under this head are deposited the Bazoars; they are found in the intestines of an Indian goat, and have been deemed of great use in medicine.

Under this title likewise are the several specimens of stones extracted from human bodies, the larger from the urine bladder, the small from the gall bladder, and the others were formed in the kidneys.

The contents of the next room are no less curious and worthy of notice than the foregoing.

Vegetabilia. Fructus. Ligna. Under these titles are comprehended a great variety of foreign fruits, different kinds of aromatic and other curious woods, many sorts of gum, barks, and a numerous train of other vegetable productions.

Here are four tables of sea productions, chiefly of the coral kind, disposed of their several classes in the form of landscapes. On each of these tables there is a short account of the contents.

Nests of insects.

Here are deposited several wasps nests, a large hornet's nest, many nests of spiders, some humble bees cells, and ants nests of various kinds. Here is a curious spider's nest brought from the West-Indies to which the insect has with great natural skill and ingenuity contrived a valve or trap-door to secure the entrance, thereby defending its progeny from the attack of some enemy of the species.

Nests of birds. It is impossible to attempt noticing all the nests that are here preserved. The hanging nests, from the Indies, claim our first regard; they hang by a slender filament to a small twig of a tree, and are by that means put out of the reach of any enemy of the quadruped or reptile kind. The nests of the various sorts of humming birds are pretty, particularly one, on which a very beautiful bird is sitting. The king fisher's nest, and that of the tom tit, are not unworthy of remark. Here is a nest from the East Indies, about the size of a goose's egg, and in substance not unlike isinglass: it is made by a small Indian swallow of a delicate taste. There is only one kind of nest more to be mentioned, and we have done with this title; it is brought from the Indies, covered with leaves, which the birds are said to sew together with their beaks, whence they have the name of taylor birds.

Eggs, are very numerous. Among others, here are specimens of the eggs of the ostrich, the cassowary, owls and eagles of various kinds, penguins, cormorants, macaws, some parrots eggs, those of the China pheasant, king fisher, miscle birds, and some remarkable blue eggs from Virginia. There are also a small egg contained within another, very curious; some that have irregular furrowed surfaces, and an egg on which is neatly and whimsically rivetted a small horseshoe. Besides these eggs of birds, are some specimens of those of crocodiles, guianas, lizards, turtles, and tortoises.

Star-fish. Some of the specimens are very large, the number of their points or rays being various. The reticulated star-fish, called Medusa's head, is very curious.

A variety of crabs of different kinds, colours, and countries; some lobsters, sea-locusts, prawns, shrimps, the black crab from Jamaica, and others from the East-Indies, finely variegated in colour; but what really most demands regard, is an extraordinary large claw of a lobster.

A number of large sea-shells, as helmets, buccina, &c. In the upper end of this repository is a log of wood, with a great number of barnacles sticking to it.

Under this title is to be seen the soldier, or hermit-crab from Jamaica.

Over the repositories are disposed, in order, a great number of sea productions, of the coral-kind, as sea-fans, sea-willows, &c. and some large shells, as conchs, buccina, &c. together with a few of that kind called Pinna Marina, which are a very large species of muscle.

Here are three small tables. The first contains some shells finely polished and carved in embossed work.

Some cameos cut in shells, and many more in onyxes, sardonyxes, crystals, hyacinths, and other precious stones.

A variety of intaglios, in jaspers, &c.

Several rings set with cameos, others with intaglios of the stones abovementioned; and many antique rings and seals, and some beads made of carved fruit-stones.

In the second of the small tables are preserved several very curious models.

A small half-length of Sir Thomas Gresham, neatly carved in wood in relievo.

Many impressions taken in glass paste from antique seals.

A number of impressions taken in sulphur, from the seals, gems, and carved stones of the king of France's cabinet.

The third small table is entirely filled with the remainder of the impressions from the king of France's cabinet.

The first of the large tables contains a great number of insects of various kinds; those that first occur, are such as have moveable crustaceous shields to guard their wings.

Beetles. The elephant-beetle, the rhinoceros-beetle, the Cervus Volans, or stag-beetle; the unicorn-beetle, wood-beetles, tortoise-beetles, capricorn-beetles, the great sweet-smelling capricorn or musk-beetle, water-beetles, the large and long black beetle, mill-beetles, crickets, locusts, balm crickets, or harvest flies, boat-flies, a water insect, water scorpions. Cochineal, is a small fly that feeds and breeds on the leaf of an Indian fig.

In the other great table, where the insects are continued, are

A kind of small fly not unlike the gnat, and the ephemeron, whose whole extent of life is but a few hours.

Dragon-flies, or adder flies.

Butter-flies. They are divided into seven classes, each of which contain a great variety of species.

A very great number of specimens, curious and beautiful, are here preserved. The most remarkable among them are, a fine green fly, the mother of pearl, the owl and the peacock from the East Indies, and a remarkable fine purple fly from the West Indies.

Moths, divided into seven classes. Some of them fill the remainder of this table, the rest being in the insect table in the next room.

Collectio Sloaniana. The insects contained in the great table, are Wasps, bees, ants, horse-flies, gad-flies, or breeze-flies, gnats, insects without wings.

Wood-lice, or millepedes. These insects are divided into seven species, some rare.

Scorpions of different sorts.

Gally-worms.

Several specimens of the centipes from America and elsewhere.

Aurelias, or chrysalises of several species of insects.

A miscellaneous collection of worms.

Some nests of insects, as spiders, beetles, locusts, &c.

Cocoons of silk-worms. Under this title is a ribbon made of spiders web, and some silk of the same.

Tortoises and turtles of the smaller sizes.

Parts of birds; they consist of heads, beaks, talons, legs, quills, &c. Particularly to be noticed are some heads of the rhinoceros bird. The beak of a toucan, or Brazil pye. The beak of a spoonbill, or platea, of Holland. Some quills quills of the condor of South America, a bird of such a prodigious size and strength as to be able to carry a sheep through the air in its talons.

Parts of fish, consisting of jaws, palates, teeth, back-bones, fins, &c. of various kinds of fish.

On the shelves round this room are a great number and variety of articles, preserved in spirits, from the animal and vegetable kingdoms. The first title that presents itself to our view, is Quadrupeds. Among these are the Armadillo, called by the natives of Brazil Tatu, a little animal covered over with hard scales, like a sort of armour. The Sloth, called Haii by the natives of Brazil; it is said this animal is a whole day in walking a few yards. The Yerbua, a kind of beautiful field-mouse. Several kinds of monkeys. The flying squirrel frequent in Virginia. A hedge-hog, and the opossum, an animal, which in case of danger, protects its young in a cavity under its belly.

Under this title are a great number of fœtus's of different animals, and some unnatural productions, among which is the cyclops pig, having only one eye, and that in the middle of the forehead.

Birds. We find here a great number and variety of English and foreign birds, brought from all countries, and preserved in spirits. Among these are the king fisher, the wheat ear, the cross-bill; several specimens of humming birds; some birds of the titmouse kind, as the blackcap, the blue titmouse or nun, and the blue American titmouse. Among the specimens are a great number of others no less curious, and some unnatural productions, as a golling with three legs, &c. &c.

Reptilia. Amphibia. Serpentina. In these three repositories are many amphibious animals in spirits, among them are frogs, toads, some young crocodiles, allegators, guanas, cameleons, salamanders, the flying lizard, and other kinds of lizards.

The serpents consist of snakes, slow-worms, vipers, adders, rattle-snakes, asps, hooded snakes, coach-whip snakes, some amphibiaenæ, a kind of serpent whose head can scarcely be distinguished from the tail; they are brought from South America.

Fish of many kinds in spirits, and among others the hippocampus, or sea-horse; the flying fish, the remora, pearl oysters, the John Doree, the sea polipus, barnacles, and many others.

Insects. Many kinds of caterpillars, beetles, locusts, centipes, scorpions, spiders, and worms from human bodies.

Vegetables. These consist chiefly of foreign fruits preserved in spirits, and some of our own produce, but of an uncommon form. There are also under this title a collection of oils, balsams, and other chemical preparations, extracted from vegetables, chiefly the growth of the East-Indies.

In different parts of this room on the wainscot over the repositories, &c. are some dried animals, and stuffed skins of others, particularly some large bats, turtles and tortoises, sharks jaws, more heads and beaks of birds, a very large stuffed snake's skin from Surinam in the West Indies, the skin of a scaly lizard, some lizards, guanas, and the skin of an ant bear; a flamingo, a young wild boar, a porcupine, armadillos, an oron outon, or wild man of the mountains; the head of a sea horse, jaws of fish, and some crocodiles.

Here are a great variety of horns of different animals, particularly the fossil horns of mouse-deer, horns of elks, the rhinoceros, rein-deer, antelope, and chamoise. Sir Hans Sloane's famous horned owl, stuffed. Some birds stuffed, placed in glass frames; particularly a bird of paradise, some humming birds, manakeens, some of the titmouse kind, a Virginia nightingale, and a tropic bird: and some portraits of several kinds of birds taken from the life.

In a large cabinet are deposited a great many dried fish, brought from various parts of the world; among other specimens are a small saw-fish, the head of a sword fish, some flying fish, a dolphin, a sturgeon, a young shark, a porcupine fish, a torpedo, or cramp-fish, &c.

Over this cabinet is a stuffed emeu, or cassowary, a balearic crane, or crown-bird, an eagle, and a vulture.

The skeleton of a very young whale, some horns of the unicorn-fish, the head and paws of the walross, usually called the sea-lion, and the snouts of the saw and sword-fish.

We now enter upon the last room of this department, which is filled with productions of art, disposed in several cabinets.

In the first cabinet is a variety of little articles manufactured in glass, of different shapes, coloured, painted, and spun glass; some cups, dishes, and other matters, made of paper machie, resembling china ware; and other enamelled and curiously manufactured bagatelles.

In the next we must remark some articles in great esteem among many Roman Catholics, as relics, beads, &c. and some models of sacred buildings.

We now come to the utensils and ornaments of the Indian inhabitants of the great continent of North America, as feather crowns, necklaces, knives, and some curious contrivances for combs, brushes, &c. an Indian scalp, and some wampum: these are a sort of shells used as money among the Indians. Here is also some Cassada bread, or Cassavi; this is made of the root of a plant called yuca, manioc, or manihot.

In another cabinet are European productions of art, as some small cabinets, figures in bronze, and several ivory anatomical representations of skulls, eyes, ears, &c. and some fine work of turnery and carving.

We next see some Japan idols, very small, many cut out of almonds, and even grains of rice; East India money, some Chinese figures of their gods, men, and beasts, made after their fancy, and dressed in their fashions, part of them in bronze, the rest chiefly in rice-paste, called congee.

The model of a palanquin, a kind of chair of state, in which the grandes of the East are carried on mens shoulders; cards, dice, and other bagatelles; forks, chopsticks, backscratchers, steelyards, weights, and beads for casting up their accounts, called schwampam.

Some

Some China paper, womens shoes, pendants made of beetles, inks of all colours, rulers, small japanned vessels, &c.

In the last of the cabinets are various specimens of curious earthen ware, some porcellain cups before they are burnt, some other cups, which they say the Chinese made of English gravel which happened to be carried over in one of our ships; and several sorts of plain, painted, and gilt China ware of various shapes.

Under glass bells are some very curious pieces of work in ivory, particularly one made by the late queen of Denmark. The flower-pots in ivory are very fine.

Some models of Chinese grottos; a model of captain Gilbert, made in China of the fine earth. The root of the tea-plant.

Here are also some pieces of sculpture, as king William and king George the first, cut in walnut-shells and in ivory; the head of Baker, who wrote the Chronicle; also an impression of Oliver Cromwell's seal; paintings at large, in miniature and enamel; as a man that had an excrescence, or wen, in form of a head growing out of his left breast.

A cyclops pig.

A woman who had two horny substances grew out of the back part of her head; one of the horns is kept in some of the cabinets in this room.

Thomas Briton, the musical small-coal man. A black whale, and a buffalo.

Several drawings in miniature, composed of very small writing; particularly two heads, one of queen Anne, the other of prince George of Denmark. Also the head of the duke of Gloucester, done in the same manner.

Insects and reptiles.

A plantation of cochineal, with the people gathering and drying it.

Several flowers and plants.

In our way to the next department, we are led down the back stairs, where are two canoes, the one brought from America, the other from Greenland, differing both in form and materials; the first is very ingeniously covered with the bark of a kind of birch-tree, which is fixed to small ribs on the inside; the whole boat is remarkably light, insomuch that two men may easily carry it many miles from one lake or river to another. The other is entirely covered with seals skins, at a distance bearing some resemblance to parchment; the upper part of it is, as it were, decked with the same materials, there being only a small hole left open in the middle for the man to sit in and manage his paddle.

On the wainscot going down these stairs, is a large piece of painting representing several kinds of dead game.

The last department to be mentioned is that of printed books.

Crossing the hall, in the way from the back stairs, the first room we enter is appropriated for modern works of the press; part of it is filled with books sent in by the Stationer's company, and other presents given to the Museum in the reign of his late majesty; the remaining part of the presses are prepared for the reception of such as may be had in the reign of his present majesty.

Major Edwards's Library. This is a good collection of English, French, and Italian books, but chiefly the last. It is joined to the Cotton library, and deposited in this room.

Bibliotheca Sloaniana. I. In this room are preserved part of Sir Hans Sloane's, library consisting of books of physic, pharmacy, anatomy, surgery, chemistry, &c.

Bibliotheca Sloaniana. II. Another part of Sir Hans's library, containing natural history, herbaria, hortus ficcus. Here are many drawings, perhaps the finest that are to be seen in the world; particularly a book, containing some drawings of Monsr. Robert, painter to Louis XIV. of France: they consist of a great number of vegetables, curious animals, shells, and other natural productions. Sir Hans Sloane paid this artist five guineas for doing each leaf. We must also notice a great many drawings, elegantly coloured from nature by Madam Marian; they consist of a great variety of plants, with the insects that fed on them, and some other things.

Bibliotheca Sloaniana. III. Here are many books on philological subjects, grammars, lexicoons, critics treatises on rhetoric, geography, some travels, journals, and miscellanies.

Bibliotheca Sloaniana. IV. In this part of Sir Hans Sloane's collection, are histories of all nations, ancient and modern; some treatises on chronology, prints, globes, and large maps of different countries.

Bibliotheca Sloaniana. V. This room contains treatises on the arts and sciences, systems of philosophy, ethics, astronomy, commerce, philosophical transactions.

Bibliotheca Sloaniana. VI. The remaining part of Sir Hans Sloane's collection, being books of divinity and law.

Bibliotheca Regia. I. In this next room is deposited part of the royal library, given by his late majesty. It consists of the books collected in the reigns of Henry VII. Henry VIII. Edward VI. queen Mary, and queen Elizabeth. Here are also several other collections, as the libraries of archbishop Cranmer, More, Arundel, and Lumley. In this place are preserved the first books printed in England and France; some are upon vellum, others on paper.

Bibliotheca Regia. II. In this last room of the library is deposited the remaining part of the books given by his late majesty. They were collected in the reign of James the first, Charles the first and Charles the second.

If any ingenious person has either a mind to improve himself in the several sciences or languages by reading, or is prompted by curiosity to peruse some of the valuable books of this department, by applying to the trustees, he may have an order to attend the reading room for a time, where there is a particular officer appointed to provide such books as may be wanted.

The last room we have to mention contains some sea compasses, improved by doctor Knight, such as are now used in the royal navy, and several magnets, and apparatuses, serving to shew the magnetical powers in philosophical uses.

On

On the seventh of June doctor Archibald Cameron, convicted of joining the pretender in the late invasion, and suspected of being concerned in an attempt to renew the rebellion in Scotland the beginning of this year, was executed at Tyburn.

On his arrival at the place of execution, he looked on the officers and spectators with an undaunted and composed countenance; and as soon as he was unloosed from the sledge, he started up, and with an heroic deportment, stepped up into the cart, by the help of the executioner, whence, looking round with unconcern on all the awful apparatus of death, he smiled; and seeing the clergyman that attended him coming up the steps, he stepped forward to meet him, and endeavoured with his fettered hands to help him up, saying, so —are you come? this is a glorious day to me! it is my new birth day; there are more witnesses at this birth than were at my first." The clergyman asked him how he did; to which he answered, thank God, I am very well, but a little fatigued with my journey; but, blessed be God, I am now come to the end of it." Some person asking the clergyman whether he would be long about his office, the doctor, who over-heard him, said, he required but very little time, for it was but disagreeable being there, and he was as impatient to be gone as they were. The clergyman then asked the gentleman who had spoke if he was the sheriff, and on his being answered in the affirmative, he told him doctor Cameron's business there would be chiefly with him; that he had something to communicate to him, if he would take the trouble to come near; which he very readily complied with, and endeavoured to bring his horse close to the cart: but finding him a little unruly, and that he could not hear what the doctor said by reason of the noise of the multitude, he beckoned with his hand for silence, but to no purpose; whereupon he very obligingly alighted, and came up the steps, and with great civility and attention listened to the doctor who spoke as follows:

"Sir, you see a fellow subject just going to pay his last debt. I the more cheerfully resign my life, as it is taken from me for doing my duty according to my conscience. I freely forgive all my enemies, and those who are instrumental in taking away my life. I thank God I die in charity with all mankind.

"As to my religion, I die a steadfast, though unworthy, member of that church in which I have always lived, the church of England; in whose communion I hope (through the merits of my blessed Saviour) for forgiveness of my sins, for which I am heartily sorry.

"The custom of delivering something in writing on such occasions as this I should willingly have complied with, had it not been put out of my power, being denied the use of pen, ink, and paper, except in the presence of some of my keepers. But what I intend my country should be informed of with regard to my dying sentiments, I have, by the means of a blunt pencil, endeavoured to set down on some slips of paper, as I came by them, in as legible characters as I was able; and

"these I have left in the hands of my wife, charging her, on her duty to her dying husband, to transmit, with all convenient speed, a faithful transcript of them to you, and I am confident she will honourably discharge the trust."

He then told the sheriff he would no longer presume upon his patience; but the sheriff, with looks that bespoke a great deal of concern, and with much good-nature, begged he would take as much time as he pleased, for they would wait till he was ready. The doctor thanked him; and then turning to the clergyman, said, "I have now done with this world and am ready to leave it." He joined heartily in prayer and then repeated some ejaculations out of the psalms; after which he embraced the clergyman, and took leave.

As the clergyman was going down from the cart, he had like to have missed the steps; which the doctor observing, called out to him with a cheerful tone of voice, "saying, take care how you go, I think you don't know this way so well as I do."

He was then turned off, and after hanging about twenty minutes, was cut down, his heart taken out and burnt, but his body not quartered; and on the Sunday following it was interred in the large vault in the Savoy chapel.

When this gentleman was under examination before a committee of the privy-council, he denied his being the person described in the bill of attainder; but at his trial he owned it, and behaved with decency and composure; pleading the acts of kindness and humanity, which he had performed through the course of the rebellion, particularly his having saved the whole town of Aronche near Glasgow from destruction, and his behaviour before it broke out, (which he said would have been attested by general Wade, and colonel Hopson if they had been living) as inducements to spare his life. He heard his sentence without any alteration of countenance, except that his lips closed together, and his mouth began to fill, and he made three or four very low reverences to the bench, when he retired. His behaviour in the Tower was such as became his unhappy circumstances, manly and sedate, and his death was regretted even by those who abhorred his principles.

The citizens being highly satisfied with the conduct of Sir Crispe Gascoigne during his mayoralty, it was moved in the court of common-council that the thanks of that court should be presented him, which being unanimously agreed to, the same was presented as follows:

Resolved, "that the thanks of this court be given to the right honourable Sir Crispe Gascoigne, knt. late Lord-mayor, for his diligent attendance to, and faithful discharge of, the duties of that high office: for his steady perseverance in the cause of justice, his generous protection of the distressed, and his remarkable humanity: for the many generous instances of his benevolence, and great regard to his fellow citizens, and for supporting the dignity of chief magistrate with the utmost splen“dor and magnificence : for giving at all times “easy access to his person ; and for determining,

 “on every occasion, with the greatest candour,
 “ability, and integrity.”

About this time a great commotion arose among the people, occasioned by an affair of a very public nature. The lords had, with great dispatch, and without any great opposition, passed a bill “to permit persons professing the jewish religion, to be naturalized by parliament, &c.” and sent it down to the commons. Here the bill was strongly opposed ; but the ministry, being determined it should go, backed their friends in the house with a petition from several merchants and traders in London for it ; under a supposition, “that the passing of this bill into a law might encourage persons of wealth and substance to remove with their effects from foreign parts into this kingdom, and increase the commerce and credit of this nation.” The ministry, however, had not the same interest with the citizens, who, conceiving a quite different opinion of the effects of such a bill, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, on the very same day, presented a petition against it ; in which they expressed their apprehensions, “that should the said bill pass into a law, the same would tend greatly to the dishonour of the christian religion, endanger our constitution, and be highly prejudicial to the interest and trade in general, and to London in particular.” The next day another set of London merchants and tradesmen, following the example of the corporation, petitioned the said house in behalf of themselves and all other merchants and traders in Great-Britain ; alledging, “that should the said bill pass into a law, it would greatly affect our trade and commerce with foreign nations ; and particularly with Spain and Portugal, and would also be attended with many other bad effects to the kingdom :” and praying, that they might have leave, by themselves or council, to be heard against the said bill.

Immediately after this another petition was presented from a number of subscribing merchants, traders, manufacturers, shipwrights, and commanders of ships, in favour of the bill, as an encouragement to persons of wealth and substance to remove with their effects from foreign parts into this kingdom, which might be employed in foreign trade and commerce, in shipping, and the exportation of our woollen and other manufactures. The bill was then read a third time ; and some of the last petitioners against it were called in, and heard ; but, after very warm debates on both sides, it passed without any amendment.

On the twenty-seventh of November Edward Ironside, esq; (who succeeded Sir Crispe Gascoigne, knt. in the high office of Lord-mayor of London) died in his mayoralty, after having enjoyed that office only a few weeks, and gave place for the election of Thomas Rawlinson, esq; who was elected Lord mayor the day following.

The Lord-mayors who have died in their mayoralty, from its first institution in the year 1189, when the title of Lord-mayor was first conferred on Henry Fitz-Alwin, who continued in that high office twenty-three years, are as follow : After the death of Henry Fitz-Alwin, no succeeding Lord-mayor died in his mayoralty till Jacob Alderman, esq; in the year 1216 ; nor after that, till William Brown, esq; in the year 1513, which was 297 years from the death of Jacob Alderman, esq; Sir William Bowyer died in 1543, Sir Cuthbert Buck, in 1593, and Sir Thomas Skinner in 1596 ; since which period no Lord-mayor died in his mayoralty till 1740, which is 144 years from the death of Sir Thomas Skinner, when Humphry Parsons died in his mayoralty, it being the second time of his election into that office : and since him have died Sir Robert Godschall, Sir Samuel Pennant, Thomas Winterbottom, esq; and Edward Ironside, esq; where it is worthy of observation, that from the first institution of this office in 1189, to 1740, which is 551 years, there died only six Lord-mayors in their mayoralty ; and from the year 1740 to 1753, there have died five.

Complaints having been repeatedly made by the citizens of London, obliged to serve divers offices in this corporation, that the oaths of office were of that nature and tenure as could not be taken by conscientious people, the common-council, on the 20th of December, ordered the ancient oaths of office, taken by the constables, inquestmen, and scavengers, to be laid aside, and such others prescribed as were in the power of every conscientious person to discharge. At the same time a bill was passed for raising 2443l. on the inhabitants of the city, for the support of the London workhouse. A motion was likewise made at the same court to consider of the utility of a bridge over the river Thames, between that from Fish-street-hill and the Borough, and Westminster-bridge. They divided on the motion, but it was at length carried in the affirmative by 76 against 69. A motion was then made for appointing a committee to consider of the best plan, situation, &c. of such a bridge ; but that was deferred to another court.

An act of parliament passed this session for the relief of constables labouring under great difficulties by loss of time and expence in attending upon, and conveying offenders to jail : in which it was enacted, “that when offenders have not money sufficient to defray the expences of conveying them to jail, justices of the peace shall grant a warrant on the treasurer of the county for the payment of the charges of such conveyance.” And it was farther enacted, “that the charges of trouble and attendance shall be allowed, by order of the court, to poor persons bound to give evidence against felons. The sum of sixpence, and no more, to be paid to the officer as his fee for making out the order on the treasurer of the county for the money.” But in Middlesex, the overseers of the poor of the parish where the offender shall be apprehended, are to pay all charges for conveying him to jail, and for poor persons bound to give evidence.”

At a court of common council held the 22d of February 1754, a motion was made to repeal the the resolution of the twentieth of December, relating to the building of a new bridge from London to Southwark. After some debates, and a division made, there appeared a majority of two for the question. On which a committee was immediately appointed to carry the same into execution. This committee met on the twenty-fifth of March, and after resolving to take into consideration the state of London-bridge, they gave orders for accounts of the revenue, the then state of its foundation, the annual expence of repairs, and the produce of the rents of the houses on the said bridge for ten years past; to be laid before them. And in July following Mr. Dance, the city surveyor, reported the foundation of London-bridge to be very good. A motion was then made to pull down the houses on that bridge; and the surveyor was ordered to prepare a plan of a commodious footway on each side of the said bridge, and a carriage way sufficient for four carriages to go abreast.

At another court of common-council held the twenty-sixth of September following, the committee made their report, and gave it as their opinion, that the only proper place for building a new bridge over the Thames, was from the end of Fleet-ditch to the opposite shore: that Mr. Dance had prepared a plan to build the same of stone, which would cost 185,950*l.* exclusive of purchases, &c. That it would be proper to pull down the houses, and widen the ways on London-bridge; which might be rendered more safe, commodious and ornamental, at the charge of 30,000*l.* That the neat rent of the houses out upon lease, and necessary to be taken down, let yearly for 430*l.* 17*s.* And the houses of tenants at will (the land-tax to be deducted) amounted to 397*l.* 9*s.* per annum. So that the bridge-house estate would loose thereby about 828*l.* 6*s.* per annum, besides the tythes, church rates, poors rates and land tax, payable by the inhabitants of such houses to be pulled down, which amounted to the sum of 484*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.* per annum.

On the thirtieth of April the election for city representatives in parliament began at Guildhall. The candidates were Sir John Barnard, Sir Robert Ladbroke, Sir Richard Glynn, Sir William Calvert, Mr. alderman Bethel, and Mr. alderman Beckford. These being separately put in nomination at the common-hall, the majority of hands appeared in favour of Sir John Barnard, Sir Richard Glynn, Slingsby Bethel, and William Beckford, esqrs. But a poll was demanded on behalf of Sir Robert Ladbroke and Sir William Calvert. The poll began the same day, and continued for six days after; at the close of which the sheriffs, in the presence of the Lord-mayor, declared the election had fallen on Sir John Barnard, Slingsby Bethel, esq; Sir Robert Ladbroke, and William Beckford, esq; who were accordingly declared duly elected. Immediately after which Sir John Barnard addressed himself to the livery as follows:

“ The honour you have done me in chusing me “ six times one of your representative in parliament, calls for my sincere and hearty thanks;
“ the rather, as I look upon the present election

“ to be the last favour which I can expect. I have “ not of late presumed to offer my service;
“ knowing my inability of giving that attendance
“ in parliament, which this honourable city has a “ right to require from its members; but the “ continuance of your polling for me is a proof “ of your kindness in overlooking my failings;
“ and of your affectionate regard for me. The “ impression which this has made upon my heart “ can never be effaced, of which I beg leave to “ assure you, and of my best endeavours to promote the good of this city in particular; and
“ the nation in general.”

The contest on this election was the greatest that had been ever known: the whole body of dissenters and the interest of the ministry uniting to support Sir William Calvert in opposition to the-antiministerial livery, whose dislike of their late favourite Sir William arose from his attachment to the advocates for naturalizing the Jews.

The number of Liverymen that voted at this election were 5931; and the number of voices that stood on the poll each day were as follows:

On the election for sheriffs this year George Streatfield and Alexander Sheafe, esqrs. were chosen by a considerable majority, but being called upon to give bond to serve the office, they declined it, and gave answer to the court of alderman, by their attornies to the following effect: that being protestant dissenters, they had not, within a year of the election, taken the sacrament, according to the rites of the church of England, and therefore dared not to take upon them that office, in defiance of the act 13 Car. II. Stat. 2. Cap. I. In consequence of this a common-hall was summoned to choose other two; who choosing Allan Evans, a protestant dissenter, he likewise pleaded the same excuse. The court of common-council therefore, on the twenty-sixth of September, ordered that actions should be brought against all those gentlemen for the penalties incurred by their refusing to serve the office of sheriff; and a committee was appointed to see the said prosecution executed.

A cause was tried this term in the court of King's-bench, Guild-hall, on an action brought by Mr. Richard Holland, a leather-seller in Newgate-street, against the collectors of toll in Smithfield, during the time of Bartholomew-fair; when Mr. Holland's witnesses were examined; but no person appearing on the other side a verdict was given in favour of Mr. Holland, on fifteen issues, with costs of suit. By which determination all the citizens of London are exempted from paying toll at the said fair for the future.

When

When Mr. Holland first attempted to vindicate these rights, it gave such an alarm to several of his fellow citizens residing in London, that they were determined to oppose the oppressive measures of the farmers of the several markets in this city, in exacting tolls from them, which annually amount to a very considerable sum.

The opposition was first made in Newgate-market, by one Mr. Ralph Twyford, by trade a butcher, and a freeman of the city; but for some years had declined that business, and carried on that of selling dead victuals by commission, which were sent up to him from different counties by common carriers, and were brought to his house in Newgate-market by porters in packs, hampers and baskets, the rent of which house was 30l. per annum.

The toll demanded by the farmers, of the housekeepers who sold such goods by commission, was four pence for every pack of victuals, and one penny for every hamper, basket, or ped. The manner of collecting this money was very uncertain, sometimes they would demand a sum in gross, and to ascertain it would form such a number of packs hampers and peds, to make it up the sum demanded; whereas the people of whom these demands were made might have, nay, often had, more or less; of some they took no more than four-pence a pack, of others six-pence, of others what they would be pleased to give them, and of others nothing at all.

These exactions naturally led the people to reflect on their situation: first, they were freemen of London: secondly, they were housekeepers, and paid large rents: and, thirdly, as freemen and housekeepers they had, (agreeable to the method Mr. Holland was then taking) an indispensable right to sell their commodities free, and exempt from any kind of toll whatsoever, and therefore they determined to pay no toll for the future.

The consequence of this determination and refusal to pay, produced no less than twelve actions at law, to be brought by the farmers against the housekeepers in this market, who all came to a resolution to defend themselves in their rights and privileges.

In order to their defence they had recourse to an act of parliament made the twenty-second of Charles II. intitled, An act for the rebuilding of the city of London, uniting of parishes and rebuilding of the cathedral and parochial churches within the said city. In which is the following clause: "that for ever hereafter, the Lord-mayor and commonalty, and citizens of London, may and shall have a market to be kept three or four days in the week, as to them shall seem convenient, upon the ground now set out by the assent of the dean and chapter of the cathedral church of St. Paul's, London, for a market-place within Newgate, and that the said dean and chapter shall make and give one or more lease or leases of the said ground to the said mayor and commonalty, and citizens, and also of the wall of the said church-yard abutting severally upon Pater-noster-row and the Old-change, for the term of forty-years, reserving the yearly rent of four pounds for the ground " of the said market-place, and two-pence for every superficial foot of the ground or soil of the said wall, as it is now set out by the surveyors of the city and of the dean and chapter, and so from forty years to forty years for ever, at the like yearly rent, and one year's rent after the rates aforesaid, to be paid by way of fine for each of the said grounds respectively, upon the making every new lease thereof, which said lease and leases shall be good and effectual in the law as against the said dean and chapter and their successors, and all persons claiming by, from, or under them, and that no house, shed, or other building, shall stand or hereafter be erected and fixed upon the said market-place, other than the market-house already built, without the consent of the said dean and chapter, any thing in this or any other act to the contrary notwithstanding."

In pursuance of this act, the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, from time to time, have granted leases of the said market to the Lord-mayor, commonalty and citizens of London. An abstract of the last lease is as follows:

" Indenture, dated April 6, 1749, between the right reverend father in God Joseph lord bishop of Bristol, dean of the cathedral church of St. Paul in London, and the chapter of the same church, of the one part, and the mayor, commonalty, and the citizens of London, of the other part; in consequence of the surrender of a former lease of indenture dated the sixth of April, 1709, and of or in the pieces or parcels of ground therein after-mentioned, granted by the worshipful Henry Godolphin, doctor in divinity, then dean of the said cathedral and the then chapter, unto the said mayor, &c. all that and those piece or parcel, pieces or parcels of ground adjoining together, as the same is and are designed, marked, admeasured and set out for the holding and keeping a market, situate, lying and being between Warwick-lane and Ivy-lane, in the parish of St. Faith the Virgin, in London, containing in the whole by admeasurement 23797 superficial feet of assize; and also all the pieces or parcels of ground which are allotted, marked, set out and designed for passages, ways and avenues into, out, and from the said market, as is and are therein after-mentioned; which said market-place abutteth east unto and upon other ground of the said dean, &c. now or late in the occupation of Sir John Osborn, bart. or his under-tenants, in, upon, and through which, is a way or passage of ten feet broad, admeasured, marked and set out, to lead from the said market-place into Ivy-lane aforesaid, containing by admeasurement 960 superficial feet; and the said ground designed for the said market abutteth west unto and upon other ground of the said dean, &c. then or late in the several tenures of Jon Amherst, in, upon, and through which, is another passage or way of eighteen feet broad, marked, admeasured and set out, to lead from the said market-place into Warwick-lane aforesaid, containing by admeasurement 1422 superficial feet; —north “—north unto and upon other ground of, &c.

 “then or late in the occupation of the said Sir “John Osborn, in, upon, and through which,
 “part of another way or passage of eighteen feet “broad, is marked, admeasured and let out, to “lead from the said market into Newgate-street, “containing, &c. 711 superficial feet; south
 “upon other ground of, &c. in the tenure, &c.
 “of William Watton, esq; and Daniel Shetter“den, esq; in, upon, and through which, is “another way or passage of ten feet broad, “marked, admeasured, and let out, to lead from
 “the said market-place in Pater-noster-row, con“taining by admeasurement 710 superficial feet;
 “except and reserved out of this present lease “and demise unto the said dean, &c. and their “successors, tenants or assigns, free liberty to “build over the said two ways or passages of ten “feet broad, leading into Ivy-lane and into Pa“ter-noster-row, at both ends of either of the “said ways or passages, sixteen feet deep, or “thereabouts, from the first story above ground
 “as high as the adjacent houses, and to be laid “unto and used with any of the next adjoining “houses or tenements, to hold for forty years, at
 “the yearly rent of four pounds.”

The present farmers obtained an under-lease, from the city, of this market, upon paying a fine and a certain annual rent, and therefore insisted they were entitled to all the ground to the upright of all the houses which environ the market; and that no persons whatsoever occupying the business of a butcher, or selling meat, have any right even to put out hooks or rails at the fronts of those houses, in order to hang their meat on them, without paying toll.

As the act of the twenty-second of Charles II. directs that the mayor, commonalty, and citizens, of London, shall have a market as therein is described, surely the housekeepers, as citizens, and all other citizens of London, have a right to the free use of this market. In this act there is no notice of toll; and however the farmers of this and other markets, claiming under the mayor and commonalty of the city of London, may have set up such kind of demands, it was certainly intended to affect such persons only (non-freemen) who bring into the market various commodities out of the country to sell, and are provided by the farmers with stalls, standings, boards, trussels, scales, weights, &c. but as to the housekeepers, they furnish themselves with all those kinds of necessities, abstracted from the farmers.

Whereupon it was thought necessary to have a proper survey taken, by two able surveyors, who performed it in the most accurate manner, in which it is demonstrable that the 23,797 superficial feet, granted by the dean and chapter of St. Pauls to the city of London, by the lease above-mentioned, comprehended the whole of the ground, as the same was designed, marked, admeasured and set out for the holding and keeping a market, exclusive and leaving a way or passage of eight feet eight inches, to the fronts of all the houses round the market. It is very probable, and I do not doubt, but the predecessors of the present farmers claimed the same right; but how absurd is it to conceive such a number of persons should rent houses of such large rents, and should have no entrance to them without paying rent also to the farmers for the ground they step upon to go into and out of their houses. To conclude, one of the causes was tried by a special jury, in the court of common-pleas, Guildhall, in July, 1754, and the plaintiffs in that, (as in Mr. Holland's case) were nonsuited, and the people have ever since continued free and unmolested.

The following is the memorable certificate obtained by Mr. Holland in the mayoralty of Sir William Calvert; by which the antient franchises of the citizens of London are asserted and maintained.

“To all whom these presents shall come, we, “Sir William Calvert, knt. Lord-mayor of the “city of London, and the aldermen of the said “city, send greeting. Know ye, that among “other the liberties, free-customs and privileges,
 “by the charters of the late kings Henry II.
 “Henry III. Edward III. and other kings of “England, to the citizens of the city aforesaid “granted, and by the authority of divers par“liaments ratified, approved, and confirmed, it “appeareth, that all the citizens of London, and “their goods, are, and ought to be, quit and “free from all tolls, lestage, passage, package, “pontage, pavage, and murage, through the “whole realm of England, and the ports of the “sea, and through the whole dominions of the “same, as well on this side, as beyond the seas;
 “and that if any man shall take any toll or “custom of the citizens of London, the citi“zens of London may take of the borough or “town where any toll or other custom shall be “so taken, as much as the said citizens have given “for toll, and are thereby indemnified: and that “if any man within the realm of England, or “in any of the dominions of the said kings, on “this side, or beyond the seas, or in any of the “ports of the sea, on this side, or beyond the “seas, shall take any toll, or other custom, of “the citizens of London, the sheriffs of the said “city of London for default of justice upon that “behalf, their goods may take at London: and “also that the said citizens, through the whole “realm and dominions aforesaid, freely, and “without any let of the said kings, or their of“ficers or ministers, as well by sea as by land, “concerning their goods and merchandizes, in “any place or port, may traffic, and do their “business as to them shall seem good, quit of all “custom, toll or pavage, and also may abide “in any place within the said realm for doing “their said business, as in time past they have “been accustomed to do. And further it is for-“bidden, upon forfeiture, that none shall pre“sume from henceforth to molest, or otherwise “disquiet or vex the said citizens, contrary to “the liberties to them, as aforesaid, granted.
 “Wherefore we pray and friendly intreat you, on “the behalf of Richard Holland, who is a free“man and citizen of this city, that you will not “in any wise molest him in his person, nor in his “goods,

“ goods, nor inasmuch as in you is, suffer the “ same to be done by any others: and that if you “ have taken any thing from the said Richard “ Holland, his attorney, factor, assignee, or any “ of them, you make thereof restitution unto “ him, his attorney, factor, assignee, or some of “ them, without delay, lest we, for want of “ justice on your part to be performed, should “ be urged to inflict the penalties of the charter

“ afore said on you, or some of you, or to pre“ scribe some other hard course against you; which “ we hope you will in your wisdoms prevent. In “ witness whereof, we, the Lord-mayor and al“ dermen of the city of London, have caused “ the great seal of the office of the mayoralty of “ the said city, to be affixed to these presents.

CHAPTER XLV.

Act of parliament for removing the Borough market. Another for establishing Ratcliff-ferry. Great fire at the Hermitage. Mr. Trueman, being a dissenter, forbids the livery to elect him sheriff. City militia ordered to be ready. Petition to parliament for building Blackfriars-bridge. A general fast. Fire at Black-friars. Invasion threatened. City address on the occasion. War declared against France. Contest on the choice of Lord-mayor. Temporary-bridge burnt. A new one erected. Sir John Barnard resigns his gown. Great rejoicings on the taking of Louisbourg. City address on the prince of Wales coming of age.

AT a court of common-council held the 15th of January 1755, the committee appointed to enquire whether the construction of a new bridge might any wise prejudice the navigation, presented a report, setting forth, that it would greatly obstruct the same, and be very prejudicial to the commerce of the city of London. On which a motion was made, that the court should agree to the same report; but that being opposed, a debate arose which continued near three hours, and the question being put for agreeing to the said report, it was carried in the negative, 132 to 106, of whom ten aldermen were for the report, and six against it; on which the Lord-mayor declared a majority of 26 against agreeing with the report.

On the twenty-third of the same month a proclamation was issued promising a bounty of 30s. for all able seamen, not more than 50, nor under 20, who should enter as volunteers on board the royal navy, before the 20th day of February; and also a bounty of twenty shillings a man for each ordinary sea-man who should enter within the said time, to be paid by the clerks of the cheque, at the third muster, at whatever port such seamen should enter themselves. And on the seventeenth of February another proclamation was issued for recalling and prohibiting seamen from serving foreign princes; for giving a further encouragement of three pounds for every able, and forty shillings to every ordinary seaman, who should enter themselves on board his majesty's ships of war; and for granting rewards for discovering such seamen as should conceal themselves.

On the twentieth of February a terrible fire broke out at Mr. Thompson's an embroiderer, in Bury-street, St. James's, which soon consumed that house, and damaged two others adjoining. The flames were so rapid, that Mr. Swan, a lodger, was obliged to save himself by jumping out of the dining room window; three sisters jumped out of another room in their shifts. Mr. Forbes, a lodger, threw himself out of a two pair of stairs window; and Mr. Thompson's maid, and miss Swan's maid and her husband all perished in the flames.

An act of parliament was passed on the twentieth of March to prevent the holding of any market in the high-street of the Borough of Southwark. And another for establishing a ferry across the Thames from the Narrow-street, in Limehouse parish, to the east end of Rotherhithe.

On the fifth day of May a fire broke out in a hay-loft over the stables at Walker's wharf near the Hermitage brew-house, which in a short time consumed several warehouses of hemp, flax, &c. to the damage of 20,000l.

At a court of common-council held the 12th of June, 410l. per annum was allowed the comptroller of the bridge-house, in lieu of his customary annual bills. And a motion being made to alter and render more commodious the jail of Newgate, the same was referred to a committee of six aldermen and twelve commoners.

At the time of electing sheriffs, Mr. Trueman, apprehensive that he should be put up at the common-hall, did, by letter, read to the livery previous to the naming those on the list, forbid them to chuse him, as being a protestant dissenter, he was, by act of parliament, disqualified for that office.

On the 27th of August one Barlow, a book-seller in Star-alley, Fenchurch-street, shot his child of two years old, which died instantly, and then himself in at the mouth, but the ball glancing sideways did not kill him. The father was committed to the comptroller, where, after a few days, he died of his wound. His friends took away his body and buried it; of which the Lord-mayor being informed, ordered it to be dug up, and put in a hole made for that purpose in the cross-road at the upper end of Moor-fields, and a stake drove through the body. It appeared by a paper left behind him, that being hard pressed by his creditors who refused to give him time, he took this desperate method to put an end to his troubles.

On the nineteenth of September the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London waited on his majesty to congratulate him on his safe return from Germany to his British dominions; when William Moreton, esq; the recorder, made their compliments in the following address:

“ Most gracious Sovereign,

“ We your majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, humbly beg leave to address your majesty with our most sincere and joyful congratulations, on your majesty’s safe and happy return to your British dominions.

“ Permit us, royal Sir, with hearts full of gratitude, to express our sincere acknowledgments of your majesty’s paternal care and vigilant regard for the true interest and prosperity of your people, by the vigorous measures taken by your majesty to protect our commerce and colonies from the encroachments of the French.

“ And we do humbly assure your majesty, that we will, to the utmost of our power on this, and every other occasion cheerfully contribute towards the support of your majesty’s sacred person and government, and the defence of the just rights and possessions of your crown against all attempts whatsoever.”

“ I thank you for this very dutiful and affectionate address. The support of the rights of my crown, and the preservation of my dominions in America, are so essential to the trade and commerce of my people, that the city of London may depend, that I will continue to take such measures as may best tend to these great and important ends. The assurances you give me of your zeal and assistance are very pleasing to me; and the city of London may rely upon the continuance of my favour and protection.”

It being apprehended, by the motions of the French, that an invasion was intended, the secretary of war sent an order, on the fifteenth of November, to the court of aldermen, for the militia of the city of London to hold themselves in readiness to march. On which a court of lieutenancy was immediately summoned to carry the said order into execution, who, on the twentieth, gave orders for the militia to be exercised in the Artillery-ground, by four companies every day, till they had gone through the six regiments.

Information being received of a most dreadful earthquake that happened at Lisbon, on the first of Nov. by which the greatest part of the public edifices, and houses of that superb capital were destroyed, and upwards of 100,000 persons buried in the ruins, his majesty was pleased to send a message to the house of commons, requesting their assistance for the remaining part of the inhabitants of that great city, who laboured under the most direful afflictions. In consequence of which, the house unanimously resolved to enable his majesty, to give what assistance he should think fit, and that such expences as should be incurred by his majesty, in relieving the misery to which the people of Portugal must be reduced, by this deplorable calamity, should be made good out of the next aids.

At a court of common-council, held the eighteenth of December, the petition for a new bridge, prepared by the committee, was agreed to by a majority of one hundred against sixty-six; and Mr. Sheriff Whitebread was ordered to present the same to the house of commons, which being done on the thirteenth of January, an act of parliament was soon after passed for that purpose.

The act provides, that the mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, shall have power and authority to direct, order, and build the said bridge, and to maintain, preserve, and support the same, when built; for which purpose, they are to appoint a committee, from time to time, to manage and transact such affairs as they may find necessary, who are to have such powers and authorities as shall be delegated to them, from time to time, by the said mayor, &c. in common-council assembled, or such general powers as are granted by the act. But no person concerned in building, or dealing in any materials for building, shall be eligible, or capable of acting as a member of any such committee, nor any other person, during the time he shall possess any office, or place of profit under the act, or under the mayor and commonalty of London. The said mayor, &c. in common-council assembled, are empowered to design, and lay out, in what manner the said intended bridge shall be erected, and the ways, streets, and passages, to and from the same, made, widened, enlarged, or improved, and to do all matters and things, for carrying on and effecting the purposes of the act. The said bridge is to be so constructed, as that there shall remain a free and open passage for the water, thro’ the arches, or passages under the same, of seven hundred and fifty feet, at least, within the present banks of the river; that the navigation thereof may receive no prejudice. No buildings, but the proper gates and toll-houses, to be built upon the said bridge, and any persons damaging, or destroying, maliciously, or hindering or interrupting the building of the bridge, shall be adjudged guilty of felony, and suffer as a felon. The said mayor, &c. are empowered to make, widen, and enlarge such streets, ways, and passages, as they shall think necessary, on each side the river, to and from the said bridge, and to agree with the owners and occupiers cupiers of such lands, tenements, or hereditaments, as they shall judge proper to be purchased, removed, or pulled down for that purpose, for the purchase thereof; and, upon the payment of such sums, as shall be agreed upon, this act shall be as sufficient an indemnification against the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, of any of the said owners, as if the same had been sold by deed or feoffment, bargain and sale, or other assurance in the law whatsoever: and it shall and may be lawful for all bodies politic, corporate or collegiate, corporations aggregate or sole, trustees and feoffees in trust, guardians and committees for lunatics and ideots, executors, guardians and administrators, not only for and on behalf of themselves, their heirs, &c. but also their cestuique trusts, whether issue, or infants unborn, &c. &c. or other persons whatsoever, and for all femes-covert, to sell and convey such lands, &c. to the said mayor, &c. and all such persons so conveying, shall be indemnified for what they shall do, by virtue of this act, notwithstanding any omissions or mistakes as to matter of form. Persons refusing to treat with the said mayor, &c. for the sale of such estates, lands, &c. a jury is to be called, and impanelled by the sheriffs, and proper witnesses summoned, which jury is to enquire into the value of such lands, &c. and of the estate and interest of every person therein, and shall assess and award the sums payable to every such person, for the purchase thereof, and such verdict and the judgment of the mayor, &c. (if in the city) or of the justices, (if in Surry) shall be binding and conclusive against all persons, bodies politic and corporate, claiming right to, or in the said lands, &c. Upon the payment of the sums so awarded, legal conveyances, &c. are to be made to the said mayor, &c. of such lands, &c. If the persons are not to be found who have a right to such purchase-money so awarded, or there be any other impediment or doubt with regard to the payment of it, it is to be lodged in the bank of England, for the use of the parties interested therein, to be paid them at such times as the mayor, &c. shall order and direct. The said verdicts and judgments shall be good and effectual evidence in all courts of law, being duly recorded in the court of mayor and aldermen, or general quarter sessions of the peace for the county of Surry, where all persons may have recourse to them gratis, and take copies, paying for every copy such consideration as the act prescribes. On the payment or entry of such verdicts, judgments, &c. all the estate, trust, &c. in such estates, &c. shall vest in the said mayor, &c. and they shall be deemed in law, to be in actual possession thereof fully and effectually. Persons having any claim or demand on such lands, &c. sold as above, not entering their claim with the town-clerk of the city, or the clerk of the peace for Surry, who are to keep books for that purpose, within five years, from the enrollment of such bargain and sale, shall forfeit their right and interest in the said lands, &c. for ever. Tenants at will, and lessees for a year, to deliver up possession immediately of such lands, tenements, &c. on the payment or tender of six months rent, or on twelve months notice. Persons who have mortgages on any of the said lands, &c. not being in possession thereof by virtue of such mortgages, to assign over their mortgages to the mayor, &c. on the tender of the principal money and interest due, together with six months interest of the said principal money. The mayor, &c. are authorized to treat with the waterman's company about a recompence to be made to that company in lieu of their Sunday's ferry from Black-friars to the opposite shore. Fines not exceeding ten pounds to be levied by distress and sale of goods, on such sheriffs, deputy-sheriffs, bailiffs, agents, jurymen, &c. as respectively make default in the premises. They are empowered to fill up the channel of Bridewell-dock, between the Thames and Fleet-bridge, and to take away the bridge cross the said channel, making sufficient drains and sewers, and from time to time cleansing the same, to carry the soil, &c. into the Thames. When the bridge is finished and made passable, no coachman or driver shall stand or ply, nor any drayman, carman, carter, or driver of any carriage whatsoever, shall wilfully stand or remain with his carriage on the said bridge, or within 100 yards on either side thereof. Nor is any filth, dung, or rubbish, to be put thereon: persons offending to forfeit a sum not exceeding twenty shillings, nor less than two shillings and sixpence, to the informers and apprehenders of such persons, or be committed to hard labour on default of payment, for such time as the magistrate shall think proper, not exceeding three days. A proper number of lamps are to be fixed on the bridge, and to burn from sun-setting to sun-rising throughout the year, and a number of watchmen appointed for the safety of the passengers. For the erecting, repairing, and preserving the bridge, for widening the streets, purchasing ground, houses, &c. lighting and watching it, the mayor, &c. are empowered to appoint a toll, not exceeding the following rates, viz. For every coach, chariot, berlin, chaise, chair, or calash, drawn by six or more horses, 2s. With four horses, 1s. 6d. less than four horses, 1s. For every waggon, wain, car, cart, or carriage, drawn by four or more horses, or other beasts, 1s. and by less than four, 6d. For every horse, mule, or ass, laden or unladen, and not drawing, 1d. For every foot passenger on Sunday 1d. and every other day one halfpenny. Power is given to appoint receivers and other collectors of the said toll, and regulations made for the better management of them. The whole of the bridge to be deemed to be in the parish of St. Anne, Black-friars. The mayor, &c. are empowered to raise, upon the credit of the tolls, any sum, not exceeding 30,000l. a year, until 160,000l. be raised in the whole, to be applied to the purposes of the act. Persons sued for doing any thing in pursuance of this act, may plead the general issue, and it is declared to be a public act, and is to be deemed such by all judges, justices, and others, in all courts and places, without pleading the same.

In consequence of the dreadful calamity which happened at Lisbon, the following proclamation was published on the twentieth of December:

“Whereas

"Whereas the manifold sins and wickedness of these kingdoms have most justly deserved heavy and severe punishments from the hand of heaven; and the almighty, out of his great mercy, hath not only been our defence in times of danger, but hath protected and preserved us from imminent destruction, especially at this time, when some neighbouring countries, in alliance and friendship with us, have been visited with a most dreadful and extensive earthquake, which hath also, in some degree, been felt in several parts of our dominions: and whereas the present situation of public affairs (as to the issue of them) is of the highest importance to the peace and safety of these kingdoms, to our commerce and liberty, and, above all, to the most valuable blessing of the protestant religion: we, from the deepest sense of this our state, and of the miseries which our people would suffer if a like visitation should be shewed forth upon these kingdoms, and placing our whole trust and confidence in the mercy of almighty God, have resolved, that a general and public fast be observed, that both we and our people may humble ourselves before almighty God, and in a most devout and solemn manner, send up our prayers and supplications to the divine majesty, to avert all those judgments which we most justly have deserved, to continue his mercies, and to perpetuate the enjoyment of the protestant religion among us, and safety and prosperity to our kingdoms and dominions, and to implore his protection and blessing upon our fleets and armies; and we have therefore thought fit, by the advice of our privy council, to issue this our proclamation, hereby appointing and commanding, that such general and public fast be observed throughout that part of our kingdom of Great Britain called England, the dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, on Friday the sixth day of February next ensuing." Which fast was kept with a becoming decency by all ranks of people, except the quakers, who, in London, kept their shops open; otherwise the churches and meeting-houses were thronged, and there was, in appearance, an entire cessation from business throughout the whole city and suburbs.

On the nineteenth of February 1756 a dreadful fire broke out in the house of Mr. Howell, a timber-merchant at Black-friars-stairs; which burnt with such violence that it destroyed Mr. Howell's, and two more timber-yards, the Newcastle glass warehouse, and about thirteen more houses: some lighters loaded with deals likewise took fire, and their moorings being burnt, they fell down with the tide through London-bridge. One of them stopping at the bridge would have set fire to it had it not with great difficulty been prevented by some watermen. The others set fire to a ship from Maryland, and to another which run ashore at Rotherhithe to prevent being entirely burnt.

On the twenty-eighth of February, four thieves (Macdaniel, Berry, Salmon, and Egan) received sentence, each to stand twice on the pillory, two at a time, to be imprisoned seven years in Newgate, to find security of 1000*l.* each for their good behaviour for seven years, and to pay a fine. Their crime was enticing two young lads to commit a robbery, and then prosecuting them for the sake of the reward. On the fifth of February Berry and Macdaniel stood in the pillory opposite Hatton Garden, and were severely pelted by the populace. The latter received a terrible wound in his forehead with a stone, and Berry, who was weak before, was scarce able to survive it. And on the eighth Egan and Salmon stood in the pillory in Smithfield, the former of whom in less than twenty minutes received a mortal wound of which he died, and the other was miserably bruised. The populace were so exasperated against these miscreants, that the peace officers in vain endeavoured to restrain their fury. Berry and Salmon died in Newgate, and Macdaniel, after a course of years was sent abroad.

A bill being at this time depending in the house for laying a duty on plate, to the farther extension of the excise laws, the common-council, on the eighteenth of March, prepared a petition against it, and ordered Mr. Sheriff Whitebread to present the same. And the committee who drew up the said petition was likewise ordered to prepare instructions to be delivered to the representatives to oppose the said bill, which subjected every possessor of silver plate to the information of his servants or dissolute persons. The following is a copy of the instructions:

"Whereas a bill is now depending in parliament, by which owners, users and keepers of silver plate, are subjected to the laws of excise; we therefore take this opportunity of expressing our universal disapprobation of every extension of laws, which tend to deprive the subjects of Great-Britain of their invaluable right, a trial by jury.

"And this bill appears to subject all persons (although not engaged in trade) to penalties arbitrarily levied by excise laws.

"And we moreover recommend to you the opposing the bill, as tending to the ruin of many thousands of the most skilful artificers and manufacturers, or to compel them to carry their art and industry to foreign countries, leaving their families a burden to their own.

"We apprehend a further consequence of passing this bill, will be the exportation of bullion unwrought, and the nation may be left without the only commodity, to which they can have recourse in the most pressing distress.

"We conceive that this bill will also lay an unequal burden upon the middle and lower rank of subjects, from which the rich and opulent, (who are best able to contribute) are partially exempted."

Notwithstanding these endeavours to oppose a bill so apparently detrimental to the liberty of the subject, yet it received the royal assent on the fifteenth of April. By this act five shillings is to be paid for every hundred ounces as far as 4000, and all persons within the district of the chief office of excise in London are to enter their plate at that office, and all other persons at the next office to where they live, and at the same time to pay the duty, and to pay every year within thirty days after the commencement of the year. The first entry to be made within forty days after the fifth of July, under the penalty of twenty pounds, half to the informer; to be determined in London before the commissioners of excise, or in any court of record, with liberty of appeal from the commissioners of excise to those of appeal, and all other places in England, by two justices of the peace, with appeal to the quarter sessions. The forfeitures to be levied by distress of goods; but if no goods are found, then the person to be committed to jail till the money is paid. No notice or entry is necessary for any new acquisition of plate within the year. Persons receiving plate in pawn, without using it are not liable to pay the duty, but the owners thereof are. Church plate not to pay the duty; nor the stock in trade of any goldsmith or manufacturer of plate, except for what shall be used by them or their families. No oath to be taken at the entry of any plate, nor officer authorized to enter any house to search for plate.

His majesty having informed the parliament of his receiving advice, that the French were preparing in divers ports to invade England, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council waited on his majesty on the sixth of April, with the following address:

“ Most gracious sovereign,

“ Your majesty having been graciously pleased
 “ to acquaint your two houses of parliament,
 “ that a design hath been formed by the French “ court to make an hostile invasion upon Great-“ Britain or Ireland; we your majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, of the city of London, in common-council assembled, beg leave to express our abhorrence of so unjust and desperate an enterprize, projected in revenge for your royal and gracious protection of the trade and commerce of your people, and the necessary defence of the undoubted rights and possessions of your crown.

“ With gratitude and unfeigned loyalty, we most humbly assure your majesty, that the citizens of your faithful city, united in duty and affection to your sacred person and government, will exert their utmost power, and hazard their lives and fortunes, to support and defend your majesty, and the protestant succession in your royal family; not doubting, but the zeal and loyalty of your majesty’s subjects, conducted by your known wisdom and courage, with the assistance of the divine providence, you will be able to defeat all the designs of your enemies:”

To which address his majesty was pleased to return the following most gracious answer:

“ I thank you for this very loyal and dutiful address, I have the firmest reliance on the affectionate assurance you give me, of exerting “ yourselves to the utmost in support of my government; and the city of London may always depend upon my favour, countenance, and protection; and my constant care to defend the rights and possessions of my crown, and promote the trade and commerce of this kingdom.”

An act of parliament passed this sessions for repairing London-bridge. By which the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of London, in common-council assembled, were empowered to purchase and remove the buildings on, and contiguous to, the bridge, in order to enlarge the passage over, and the avenues leading to and from the said bridge; and to widen or enlarge one or more arches of the said bridge; and to design how the passage might be rendered more safe and commodious, and the bridge preserved and kept in repair. It directed that there should be a balustrade on each side of the bridge, and a passage of thirty-one feet open for carriages, and seven feet on each side for foot passengers; with lamps to be kept lighted from sun-setting to sun-rising, and a number of able-bodied watchmen to patrol the same by night: and that the expence of the said lamps and watch should be defrayed out of the bridge estate. It was further enacted, that the tythes, poors rates, land-tax, and customary payments due from the houses, &c. pulled down, should be charged upon the bridge-house lands. There were likewise an additional toll established, to be paid by carriages and horses passing over the bridge; and a toll to be paid by loaded vessels passing under the bridge: which tolls were to continue till the principal and interest of the money borrowed for the purposes of the said act should be repaid.

At the same time another act passed for building a new bridge from Black-friars to the opposite shore. By this act the commissioners were empowered to purchase houses and lands, &c. and to levy any toll not exceeding the following rates. For every coach, chariot, berlin, chaise, chair, or calash, drawn by six or more horses, two shillings. With four horses one shilling and sixpence; less than four one shilling. For every waggon, wain, cart, or carriage, drawn by four or more horses, or other beasts, one shilling, and by less than four, six-pence. For every horse, mule, or ass, laden or unladen, and not drawing, one penny; for every foot passenger on Sunday one penny; and every other day one halfpenny.

On the 18th of May his majesty’s declaration of war was declared in the usual places and with the accustomed ceremonies. Which declaration, after reciting the various hostilities committed by the French in the West Indies and North America, concludes thus: “ We have therefore thought proper to declare war, and we do hereby declare war against the French king, who hath so unjustly begun it, relying on the help of almighty God in our just undertaking, and being assured of the hearty concurrence and assistance of our subjects in support of so good a cause; hereby willing and requiring our captain-general of our forces, our commissioners for executing the office of our high-admiral of Great-Britain, our

“ our lieutenants of our several counties, governors of our forts and garrisons, and all other officers and soldiers under them, by sea and land, to do and execute all acts of hostility, in the prosecution of this war, against the French king, his vassals and subjects, and to oppose their attempts; willing and requiring all our subjects to take notice of the same, whom we henceforth strictly forbid to hold any correspondence or communication with the said French king or his subjects: And we do hereby command our own subjects, and advertise all other persons, of what nation soever, not to transport or carry any soldiers, arms, powder, ammunition, or other contraband goods, to any of the territories, lands, plantations or countries of the said French king; declaring, that whatsoever ship or vessel shall be met withal, transporting or carrying any soldiers, arms, powder, ammunition, or any other contraband goods, to any of the territories, lands, plantations or countries of the said French king, the same being taken, shall be condemned as good and lawful prize.

“ And whereas there are remaining in our kingdom divers of the subjects of the French king, we do hereby declare our royal intention to be, that all the French subjects, who shall demean themselves dutifully towards us, shall be safe in their persons and effects.”

The national discontent at the measures of the ministry, which did not promise any great success in the war lately proclaimed, and dishonoured the ancient and approved valour, courage, and loyalty of the national forces, by calling in foreign troops to protect and defend us from the French invaders, was greatly increased by the loss of Minorca: on which occasion the citizens of London thought it their duty to address his majesty on the then situation of affairs; and, on the twentieth of August, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council waited on his majesty with the following address:

“ We, your majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, of the city of London, in common-council assembled, humbly beg leave to approach your sacred person, and with hearts full of gratitude for your majesty’s paternal care of the true interests of your people, to express our sorrow and apprehensions for the disquietudes which our late losses and disappointments must create in your majesty’s royal mind.

“ The loss of the important fortresses of St. Philip, and the island of Minorca, (possessions of the utmost consequence to the commerce and naval strength of Great Britain) without any attempt, by timely and effectual succours, to prevent or defeat an attack, after such early notice of the enemy’s intentions, and when your majesty’s navy was so evidently superior to theirs, will, we fear, be an indelible reproach on the honour of the British nation.

“ Nor can we help expressing our apprehensions for the great danger of your majesty’s possessions in America, by the mismanagements and delays, which have attended the defence of those invaluable colonies, the object of the present war, and the principal source of the wealth and strength of these kingdoms.

“ Permit us, at the same time, royal Sir, to lament the want of a constitutional and well-regulated militia, the most natural and certain defence, under divine providence, of your majesty’s sacred person and government against all invaders whatsoever, as thereby your majesty’s fleets and armies may be more securely employed abroad, to the annoyance of your majesty’s enemies; your faithful and loyal subjects being ready and willing, whenever called upon by your majesty, to shed the last drop of their blood in your service.

“ As your majesty’s reign has ever been distinguished by a love of liberty and justice, we cannot doubt of your majesty’s directing the authors of our late losses and disappointments to be enquired into and punished, that your majesty’s known intentions of protecting and defending your subjects in their rights and possessions may be faithfully and vigorously carried into execution, and that the large supplies, so necessarily called for, and so cheerfully granted, may be religiously applied to the defence of these kingdoms and colonies, and their commerce, and to the distressing our inveterate and perfidious enemies, as the only sure means of obtaining a lasting and honourable peace.

“ And we do, with the utmost sincerity of heart, assure your majesty, that your loyal city of London will, at all times, readily and cheerfully contribute to whatever may be necessary for the defence of your majesty, and your illustrious family, and towards the attainment of these great and desirable ends.”

“ I thank you for these professions of your duty to me. My concern for the loss of my island of Minorca is great and sincere. My utmost care and vigilance have been, and shall be, executed to maintain the honour of the nation, and the commerce of my subjects. The events of war are uncertain; but nothing shall be wanting on my part towards carrying it on with vigour, in order to a safe and honourable peace, and for recovering and securing, by the blessing of God, the possessions and rights of my crown.

“ I will not fail to do you justice upon any persons who shall have been wanting in their duty to me, and their country; to enforce obedience and discipline in my fleets and armies; and to support the authority and respect due to my government.”

The city of Bristol likewise presented an address to his majesty on the same occasion, as did most counties in England: some of them recommending a strict enquiry to their members, and others others requesting these to present their addresses to his majesty for the same purpose.

On the twenty-ninth of September came on at Guildhall the election for Lord-mayor; when all the aldermen below the chair, who had served the office of sheriff, was severally put in nomination, and the sheriffs declared the majority of hands to be for Sir Charles Asgill and Sir Richard Glynn; but a poll was demanded and granted for Marshe Dickenson, esq; against Sir Richard Glynn. At the close of the poll, which lasted seven days, there were and Marshe Dickenson, esq; being returned with Sir Charles Asgill, the former was chosen. The objection made by the citizens to alderman Dickenson was, that, as a member of the house of commons, he had, by ministerial influence, been prevailed upon to vote to address his majesty for the importation of lawless mercenaries.

At a court of common council held at Guildhall the 28th of October, it was unanimously agreed to instruct the representatives in parliament for the city of London, on the then unhappy and dangerous situation of public affairs; when twelve aldermen and twenty-four commoners were chosen for that purpose: and the following instructions being agreed to, a copy thereof was delivered to each of their representatives:

To the right hon. Slingsby Bethel, esq; Lord-mayor, Sir John Barnard, knt. Sir Robert Ladbroke, knt. and William Beckford, esq; representatives in parliament for the city of London:

" We, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, justly alarmed at the critical and unhappy situation of these kingdoms, do most earnestly call upon you, our representatives, to exert your utmost ability towards procuring a strict and impartial parliamentary enquiry into the causes of these national calamities.

" An almost total neglect of our important fortresses in the Mediterranean, of such inestimable consequence to the trade and power of these kingdoms, and the permitted absence of their principal officers many months after the commencement of hostilities, the actual loss of Minorca, and apparent danger of Gibraltar, are circumstances which fill us with amazement and concern; but when we reflect on the great preparations for an embarkation of troops and artillery, and the equipment of a powerful fleet publicly known to be carried on at Toulon, whose neighbourhood to Minorca was sufficiently alarming, we cannot impute these fatal events to neglect alone, and therefore conjure you to enquire, why a respectable fleet was not immediately sent from hence, and why at last so small a squadron was ordered upon this important service, without any frigate, fire-ship, hospital-ship, transport or troops beyond their ordinary compliment, and this at a time when our naval force was confessedly superior to the enemy's.

" The cruelties suffered, and losses sustained by our fellow subjects in North-America have long called for redress, whilst the mismanagements in the attempts for their support, and the untimely and unequal succours sent to their relief, have only served to render the British name contemptible. We therefore require you to use your utmost endeavours for detecting all those, who by treachery or misconduct have contributed to those great distresses, his majesty having been graciously pleased to assure us, that he will not fail to do justice upon any persons, who shall have been wanting in their duty to him and their country.

" To these interesting enquiries we have but too much reason to add our pressing request, that you use your earliest endeavours to establish a well regulated and constitutional militia as the most honourable defence of the crown, and the most consistent with the rights of a free people. And this we are more anxious to recommend to your particular care and attention, as every apprehension of danger has furnished reason for encreasing the number of our regular forces, and for the introduction of foreign mercenaries; the expence of which is insupportable. We therefore trust that you will pursue this measure before you consent to the grant of supplies, experience having convinced us, that your laudable endeavours afterwards may prove fruitless.

" The insult offered to our laws by a claim of exception which these foreigners are said to have made, demands that you strictly enquire whether the ordinary course of justice has been interrupted or suspended on their account, or whether any person in authority under his majesty has given countenance to such claim, which, if you should discover, we confide in your resolution and integrity, that nothing will be wanting on your part, to bring to justice the advisers and instruments of such a violation of the bill of rights as the only means of quieting the minds of his majesty's loyal British subjects; and at all events we recommend it to you, to oppose the continuance of any foreign troops within the kingdom, a circumstance which must ever be considered as a reproach to the loyalty, courage, and ability of this nation.

" We also hope that you will endeavour to limit the number of placemen and pensioners, of late so remarkably increased, and at a proper season to restore triennial parliaments, as we conceive it the only means to obtain a free representative of the people.

" The immense sums so cheerfully paid, when almost every measure reflects national disgrace, call upon you strictly to enquire into their application, and we trust that you will carefully watch and endeavour to prevent all unnatural connections on the continent, in order to preserve the independency of these kingdoms.

" By

" By rendering these necessary services to your king and country, you will give his majesty the strongest testimony of your duty and affection, and most effectually secure to his government obedience and respect.

" At the same time we desire you, thus publickly to accept our most grateful acknowledgments of your past conduct in parliament, and to enjoin you at all times to hold sacred and inviolable the act made for establishing his majesty's right to the crown of these realms, and securing the rights and liberties of the subject; and that you oppose every measure tending to weaken that compact, which under the divine providence will ever prove the best security to his majesty's sacred person, and the succession in his illustrious house."

On the 27th of November a terrible fire broke out at No. 1. in Staple's-inn, Holborn, which entirely consumed the chambers of Mr. Ward, and those belonging to three other gentlemen. It was with the greatest difficulty that Mr. Ward, his wife, and several others saved their lives;
but Mrs. Ward's sister, (a young lady who came out of the country upon a visit but the night before) two of Mr. Ward's children, and their nurse, perished in the flames.

On the 27th of December at a court-martial appointed for that purpose on board his majesty's ship the St. George, in Portsmouth harbour, came on the trial of admiral Byng on a charge of cowardice and neglect of duty in preventing the French fleet attacking the island of Minorca.
And after a trial which continued till the 28th of January, the court gave it as their opinion, that admiral Byng did not do his utmost to engage the enemy, and that he had fallen under part of the twelfth article of war; and therefore they adjudged and sentenced him to be shot to death. At the same time, however, they unanimously recommended him to mercy.

Notwithstanding the recommendation of the court-martial to his majesty's mercy, an order was sent down for the execution of the sentence on the 28th of February; but strong application being made in his behalf, was respited a further time, in consequence of an order from his majesty, who was pleased to declare that the sentence should yet be carried into execution if it did not appear to be unjust. Which sentence being afterwards declared to be clearly legal, the admiral was shot to death in pursuance thereof, on board the Monarque at Portsmouth, on Monday the fourteenth of March, 1757.

On the morning of his execution, orders being given for all the men of war at Spithead to send their boats with the captains and all officers of each ship, accompanied by a party of marines under arms, to attend the execution, they, in pursuance of that order rowed from Spithead, and made the harbour a little after eleven o'clock with the utmost difficulty and danger, it blowing a very hard gale of wind. Notwithstanding which and the sea ran very high, there was a prodigious number of other boats round the ships on the outside of the men of war's boats, which kept off all others. Mr. Byng, accompanied by a clergyman who attended him during his confinement, and two gentlemen his relations, walked out of the great cabin to the quarterdeck, where he suffered a few minutes before twelve o'clock. He was dressed in a light coat, white waistcoat and white stockings, and a large white wig, and had in each hand a white handkerchief. He threw his hat on the deck, kneeled on a cushion, tied one handkerchief over his eyes, and dropped the other as a signal, on which a volley from six marines was fired, five of whose bullets went through him, and he was dead in an instant. It was not more than two minutes from his coming out of the cabin till he fell motionless on his left side. He died with great resolution and composure, not shewing the least sign of timidity. Just before he suffered, he delivered a paper to the marshal of the high court of admiralty, the contents of which were as follow:

" A few minutes will now deliver me from the violent persecutions, and frustrate the further malice of my enemies. Nor need I envy them a life subject to the sensations my injuries and the injustice done me must create. Persuaded
I am, justice will be done to my reputation hereafter. The manner and cause of raising and keeping up the popular clamour and prejudice against me, will be seen through, I shall be considered, as I now perceive myself, a victim destined to divert the indignation and resentment of an injured and deluded people from the proper objects. My enemies themselves must now think me innocent. Happy for me, at this my last moment, that I know my own innocence, and am conscious that no part of my country's misfortunes can be owing to me. I heartily wish the shedding my blood may contribute to the happiness and service of my country; but cannot resign my just claim to a faithful discharge of my duty according to the best of my judgment, and the utmost exertion of my ability for his majesty's honour, and my country's service. I am sorry that my endeavours were not attended with more success, and that the armament under my command proved too weak to succeed in an expedition of such moment. Truth has prevailed over calumny and falshood; and justice has wiped off the ignominious stain of my supposed want of personal courage or disaffection. But who can be presumptuously sure of his own judgment? If my crime is an error in judgment, or differing in opinion from my judges; and if yet, the error in judgment should be on their side, God forgive them, as I do; and may the distress of their minds, and uneasiness of their consciences, which injustice to me they have represented, be relieved and subside, as my resentment has done. The supreme judge sees all hearts and motives; and to him I must submit the justness of my cause.
J. Byng."

Portsmouth Harbour, March 14th, 1757.

The

The instability of the state at this time produced a change very disagreeable to the nation. Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge, in whose abilities and integrity every one placed confidence, had scarce made their appearance upon the political stage, before they were dismissed from their places in the ministry. This, however, was not any disgrace in the eyes of the public: on the contrary there was no corporation of any consequence but hasted to shew their dislike of their dismissal, and to approve of their conduct during the short time they had been permitted to be at the head of the ministry. The city of London led the way. And at a court of common-council held the fifteenth of April, Mr. deputy Hodges rose up, and spoke as follows:

" History, the key of knowledge, and experience, the touchstone of truth, have convinced us, that this country owes the preservation of its most excellent constitution to the frequent jealousies, fears and apprehensions of the people. Whenever the face of public affairs has borne a disagreeable or dangerous aspect; whenever the people have been injured by the conduct of those who have undertaken the direction and management of their public affairs, they have always by a vigorous and timely opposition, impeded the impending danger; and when they have been prosperous and flourishing, when those in power have done, or attempted any material service to their country, the people have been always equally ready to acknowledge and reward. Instances of this kind are so frequent in our history, that it is needless to descend to particulars, and it would be taking up your time unnecessarily to enter into a defence of this conduct: as applications to punish, when necessary, are intended to deter, so thanks and rewards do conduce to excite and create emulation; both absolutely necessary to support the principal ends and design of government, the happiness of society; and in all cases of this sort, it has been customary for this corporation, as the metropolis to set the example. Not long since, too late to be forgot, this country was on the brink of ruin, brought so by the mistakes or designs of those who had undertaken the direction of national affairs: on this melancholy occasion this court did present an address of condolence to the king; his majesty received them with candour, and, with the affection of a parent, regarded their complaints; a change of men soon followed; and with them such a change of measures, as revived the sinking spirits of the people, and raised a sinking land. Our country, Britannia, almost expiring, raised her dying head, saw virtue and integrity (who had long deserted her) offer their assistance in the persons of Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge, cheerfully accepted their friendly aid, at once forgot past misfortunes, though very great, and suffered them to be buried in future hopes; the consequence of which was, public spirit and œconomy ventured once more to appear in our assemblies; commerce put on a new garment, foreign mercenaries retired from our

" country, and the sons of freedom began to furnish their own arms; placemen, pensioners, jobbers, and agents, the corrupt sons of bad administration, hung down their heads, snarled and retired into corners; and every aspect foretold better times. But see the uncertainty of human events! we had no sooner pleased ourselves with the ray of prosperity, but Britannia's props are taken away, and, every one fears the danger of a relapse, by having lost those who so well administered, and understood her constitution. The appointing and removal of ministers, being the act of sacred power and sovereign authority, duty, as well as discretion, requires I should be silent on that head; but as a subject of Britain, I can lament the loss of such patriots and protectors; as an Englishman, I have a right to acknowledge and thank. We have all that right. Wisdom as well as policy dictate the exercise of it on the present occasion. I therefore beg leave to move that the freedom of this city be presented in golden boxes, to the right honourable William Pitt, and the right hon. Henry Bilson Legge, gentlemen who have so gloriously led the van, in our late excellent but short administration. It has been customary for this court to give the freedom of the city to those who have eminently served, and we shall surely do it to these gentlemen who have saved their country; if we cannot appoint men, or promote their continuance, we can and ought to sanctify their measures, when so evidently tending to the good of our country. The question I shall propose, and which I hope will meet with the unanimous concurrence of this court, is, that the freedom of this city be presented to the right honourable William Pitt, late one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, and to the right honourable Henry Bilson Legge, late chancellor and under-treasurer of his majesty's exchequer, in testimony of the grateful sense which the citizens of London entertain of their loyal and disinterested conduct during their truly honourable, though short administration: their beginning a scheme of public œconomy and at the same time lessening the extent of ministerial influence, by a reduction of the number of useless placemen; their noble efforts to stem the general torrent of corruption, and to receive, by their example, the almost extinguished love of virtue and our country; their zeal to promote a strict and impartial enquiry into the real causes of our great losses and disgrace in America and the Mediterranean; and lastly, their vigilant attention to support the glory and independance of Great-Britain, the honour and true interest of the crown, and the just rights and liberties of the subject, thereby most effectually securing the affections of a free people to his majesty and his illustrious family."

A motion was then made, that a copy of the freedom of this city, be delivered by the chamberlain to each of those gentlemen, in a gold box of the value of 100 guineas, which motion being unanimously agreed to, the same were presented sented by Sir Thomas Harrison, the chamberlain, on the twenty-fourth of May. And at a court of common-council held the fifteenth of June Sir Thomas acquainted the court that he had waited on the right honourable William Pitt and Henry Bilson Legge, esqs; agreeable to their resolution on the fifteenth of April; and that he had received from those gentlemen the following answers, which they have given him in writing:

The answer of the right hon. William Pitt.

" Give me leave, Sir, to request the favour of you, to present; in the most expressive terms, to the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council of the city of London, the high sense I have of the distinguished honour they have been pleased to do me, in conferring on me the freedom of their city.

" I have ever been zealously devoted to the support of the liberty, trade, and prosperity of that great and respectable body; and I am now proud and happy to have such cause to add the sentiments of truest gratitude for so generous a mark of their favour; and for so unmerited an approbation of my insufficient endeavours to carry into effect the most gracious intentions, and paternal care of his majesty, for the preservation and happiness of his people."

The answer of the right hon. Henry Bilson Legge, esq;

" Give me leave, Sir, to beg the favour of you to return my sincerest thanks to the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, of the city of London, for having admitted me to the freedom of their corporation.

" So eminent a mark of distinction, derived from the most respectable city in Europe, and to which so few have ever received the honour of admission, cannot but fill my heart with the highest sense of gratitude and regard: and though it far exceeds the bare merit of meaning well, which is all I have to plead, must prove a strong incentive to those, whom his majesty shall hereafter think fit to employ, to exert with equal zeal, much greater abilities in the service of their country.

" I hope every part of my future conduct, consistently with that which I have hitherto endeavoured to hold, will shew my firm attachment to the rights and privileges of my fellow-subjects, as well as to his majesty and his illustrious family, upon whose establishment the maintainance of those rights and privileges does so effectually depend."

On the thirteenth of July a violent storm of rain happened at London, which so suddenly filled the shores, that five men employed in cleaning the main shore at Fleet-ditch, were forced down by the rush of water, one of whom perished notwithstanding the utmost endeavours to save him.

On the 28th of September William Nelson, esq; aldermen of Aldersgate-ward, and Francis Gosling esq; alderman of Farringdon without, were sworn sheriffs of the city of London. And the next day came on at Guildhall the election of Lord-mayor for the year ensuing, when Sir Charles Asgil, knt. alderman of Candlewick-ward, being the alderman next the chair, was chosen without opposition.

On the seventh of October, about ten o'clock in the morning, an uncommon darkness was observed in London and its neighbourhood, which occasioned terrible apprehensions in many weak people, who considered it as the effect of a comet which at that time appeared every evening, and which had been predicted to produce fatal consequences.

On the 12th of February 1758, a petition of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, was presented to the house by the sheriffs of London; in which petition they alledged, that the office of bailiff and conservator of the river Thames, and waters of Medway, had been, time out of mind, vested in the mayor and commonalty, and citizens of the said city, to be exercised by the mayor or his sufficient deputies; and reciting the provisions of an act, passed in the ninth of queen Ann, for the better preservation and improvement of the fishery within the river of Thames, and for regulating and governing the company of fishermen of the said river; and alledging, that the said company had ceased to act ever since the year 1727 and that the body of fishermen were then under no government or regulation; in consequence whereof frequent abuses were committed, to the prejudice of the fishery within the said river, which abuses could not be prevented or redressed without the aid of parliament; and therefore praying, that leave might be given to bring in a bill for the more effectual preservation and improvement of the fry and spawn of fish in the said river of Thames and waters of Medway, and for the better regulating the fishery thereof, and more speedy punishing of offenders, in such manner as to the house should seem meet.

In consequence of this petition a bill was soon after brought in and passed; the purport of which was, " that the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen of London shall have full power, and they are thereby required, on or before September 29, 1757, to make, and set down in writing such reasonable rules and ordinances for the government and regulating all persons who shall fish or drudge in the river of Thames, and waters of Medway, (within the jurisdiction of the mayor of London, as conservator of the said river and waters) as common fishermen or drudgermen, or otherwise; and for declaring in what manner they shall demean themselves in fishing, and with what manner of nets and engines, and at what times and seasons they shall use fishing; and for ascertaining the assize of the several fish to be taken; and for the preservation of the spawn and fry of fish within the jurisdiction aforesaid; and for obliging every common fisherman or drudgerman, or other such person who shall fish with a boat, &c. to have his christian name and surname, and the name of the place in which he dwelleth, painted in large and legible characters, in some convenient place of his boat, &c. where any one

“ one may see and read the same; and for preventing the same from being changed or defaced; and to annex reasonable penalties and forfeitures for the breach of such rules, not exceeding five pounds for any one offence; and from time to time to alter and amend such rules, &c. and make new ones touching the matters aforesaid; so as the same be allowed and approved of by the lord-chancellor, lord-keeper, or commissioners of the great seal, the two lord chief justices, and the lord chief baron, or any two of them, &c. which rules and ordinances are required to be printed and made public within thirty days after being allowed.”

On the eleventh of April between the hours of ten and eleven at night, the temporary wooden bridge, built for the convenience of carriages and passengers, whilst London-bridge was widening and repairing, was entirely consumed by fire.— See page 33.

On the seventeenth of July Sir John Barnard, knt. father of the city, and alderman of Bridge ward without, desired the court of aldermen would permit him to resign his gown, on account of his age and bad state of health; to which, after much reluctance, and many importunities used by the aldermen present to the contrary, the court consented. And on the twenty-fifth it was unanimously resolved by the common-council, (who had many years before erected his statue under the piazza within the Royal Exchange, in gratitude for the many services he had done this city) “ That Sir John Barnard, knt. so justly and emphatically stiled the father of this city, having lately (to the great and lasting regret of this court) thought proper to resign the office of alderman, the thanks of this court be given him for having so long and so faithfully devoted himself to the service of his fellow-citizens, for the honour and influence which this city has, upon many occasions, derived from the dignity of his character, and the wisdom, steadiness, and integrity of his conduct: for his firm adherence to the constitution both in church and state, his noble struggles for liberty, and his disinterested and invariable pursuit of the true glory and prosperity of his king and country, uninfluenced by power, unawed by clamour, and unbiassed by the prejudice of party.”

Sir Robert Ladbroke, at the said court, declared his assent to take upon him the office of father of the city, and the aldermanship of Bridge ward without. And a motion was made by the said gentleman, that the thanks of the court of aldermen should be given to Sir John Barnard; and the same, being agreed to, was expressed in the following terms:

“ It is unanimously agreed and ordered, that the thanks of this court be given to Sir John Barnard, knt. late one of the aldermen, and father of the city, for his constant attendance and salutary counsels in this court, his wife, vigilant, and impartial administration of justice, his unwearied zeal for the honour, safety and “ prosperity of his fellow-citizens, his inviolable attachment to the laws and liberties of his country, and for the noble example he has set of a long and uninterrupted course of virtue in private as well public life.”

Both these acknowledgments were afterwards transmitted to Sir John by the town-clerk.

On the twenty-sixth of August the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London waited on his majesty at Kennington, when Sir William Moreton, the recorder, pronounced their address to his majesty on the conquest of Louisbourg and the reduction of the islands of Cape Breton and St. John, in the following manner:

“ Amidst the joyful acclamations of your faithful people, permit us, your majesty’s most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, of the city of London, in common-council assembled, humbly to congratulate your majesty on the success of your arms, in the conquest of the important fortresses of Louisbourg, the reduction of the islands of Cape-Breton and St. John, and the blow there given to a considerable part of the French navy.

“ An event so truly glorious to your majesty, important to the colonies, trade, and navigation of Great-Britain, and so fatal to the commercial views and naval power of France, affords a reasonable prospect of the recovery of all our rights and possessions in America, so unjustly invaded; and in a great measure answers the hopes we had formed when we beheld the French power weakened on the coast of Africa, their ships destroyed in their ports at home, and the terror thereby spread over all their coasts.

“ May these valuable acquisitions, so gloriously obtained, ever continue a part of the British empire, as an effectual check to the perfidy and ambition of a nation whose repeated insults and usurpations obliged your majesty to enter into this just and necessary war: and may these instances of the wisdom of your majesty’s councils, of the conduct and resolution of your commanders, and of the intrepidity of your fleets and armies, convince the world of the innate strength and resources of your kingdoms, and dispose your majesty’s enemies to yield to a safe and honourable peace.

“ In all events we shall most cheerfully contribute, to the utmost of our power, towards supporting your majesty in the vigorous prosecution of measures so nobly designed, and so wisely directed. And it shall be our most fervent prayer, that your majesty may long, very long, enjoy the fruits of your auspicious government, in returns of loyalty and affection from a grateful people; and that the crown of these realms may flourish, with equal lustre, on the heads of your august descendants to latest posterity.”

“ I receive this most dutiful and loyal address as a fresh mark of your constant affection to me and my government ; and I return you my hearty thanks for it. The steady affections of my people, united in a hearty zeal for the honour of my crown, will, I doubt not, enable me to carry on, with vigour and success, a war which was necessarily undertaken, to defend the religion, liberties, and valuable possessions of my kingdoms against the unjust attempts of my enemies. The city of London may always depend upon my protection and favour, and upon my constant care for the extent of their trade and navigation.”

On the twenty-eighth the colours taken at Louisbourg were presented to his majesty at Kensington, who was graciously pleased to order the same to be deposited in the cathedral church of St. Paul. Accordingly on the sixth of September, proper detachments of horse and foot grenadiers were ordered to parade at Kensington at ten o'clock in the morning for that purpose. The form of the cavalcade was as follows :

A serjeant and twelve horse-grenadiers.

A field officer and officers in proportion.

A detachment of eighty horse-grenadier guards.

Eighty of the life-guards, with officers in proportion, with their standard, kettle-drums and trumpets.

A serjeant and twelve grenadiers of the foot-guards.

And the march was closed by the four companies of grenadiers of the foot-guards.

In this manner they proceeded from Kensington through Hyde-park, and through the Stable-yard, St. James's, into Pall-mall, and so on to the west gate of St. Pauls, where the colours were received by the dean and chapter, attended by the choir ; about which time the guns of the Tower, and in St. James's Park were fired.

These colours were put up near the west-door of the cathedral, as a lasting memorial of the success of his majesty's arms, in the reduction of the important fortress of Louisbourg, and the islands of Cape Breton and St. John. The greatest rejoicings were made on the above occasion within the cities of London and Westminster.

On the sixteenth of September the cannon and mortars taken at Cherbourg passed by his majesty at Kensington, from whence they proceeded, and came through the city in grand procession, guarded by a company of matrosses, with drums beating and fifes playing all the way to the Tower, where they arrived about four o'clock in the afternoon. There were twenty-three carriages, drawn by 229 horses, with a postillion and driver to each carriage, in the following manner : the first drawn by fifteen grey horses, with the English colours and the French underneath ; seven ditto drawn by thirteen horses each ; nine ditto by nine horses each ; three ditto by seven horses each ; one ditto by five horses ; then two mortars by nine horses each. These pieces were finely ornamented with the arms of France, and other hieroglyphics, such as trophies, &c. finished in a matterly manner.

At a court of common-council held the 12th of December, the apothecaries were permitted to employ foreigners as journeymen to the end of the war, and for twelve months after.

On the eighth of January 1759, his royal highness George prince of Wales being arrived at the age of twenty-one years, the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, waited on his majesty with the following most dutiful address on the occasion :

“ May it please your majesty,

“ We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, humbly beg leave to congratulate your majesty on the satisfaction of seeing your royal grandson, the prince of Wales, that great object of your majesty's paternal care and sollicitude, arrived at his age of twenty-one years, mature in all the accomplishments that can add lustre to his high dignity, or command the love and veneration of mankind.

“ Long may his royal highness enjoy the benefit of your majesty's salutary precepts and example, and continue to make your majesty the amplest returns of filial duty and respect. May his royal highness live to emulate the virtues that have endeared your majesty's sacred person and government to a free people ; and may there never be wanting one of your majesty's illustrious race to perpetuate the blessings we derive from your auspicious reign.

“ Permit us, most gracious sovereign, to embrace this opportunity of assuring your majesty, that no hostile threats can intimidate people animated by the love of liberty, and inspired with a sense of duty and affection to your majesty ; who, confiding in the divine providence, and the experienced wisdom and vigour of your majesty's councils, are resolved to employ their utmost efforts towards enabling your majesty to repel the insults, and defeat the attempts of the ancient enemies of your majesty's crown and kingdom.”

To which address his majesty was graciously pleased to return the following answer :

“ The cordial expressions of your constant attachment to my person and family are very agreeable to me ; and I return you my hearty thanks for this fresh mark of your zeal and affection.

“ I have the firmest confidence in the fidelity and spirit of my people ; and I trust I shall be well enabled, under the divine providence, to defeat and frustrate the most daring attempts of the ancient enemy of my crown.”

The

The next day they complimented his royal highness, and his august mother on the same joyful occasion.

At a court of common-council held the nineteenth of July, the committee appointed to carry the act of parliament into execution for building a bridge cross the river Thames from Black friars, delivered to the court a representation in writing, under the hands of six aldermen and twenty commoners; the substance of which was as follows:

1. That it is the opinion of this committee, that the intended bridge should be of stone.

2. That from the evidence given to parliament, upon the application for an act to build the said bridge, it is the opinion of this committee, that an elegant, substantial and convenient stone bridge may be erected for a sum not exceeding 120,000l.

3. That, from estimates laid before us, it is the opinion of this committee that proper avenues to the said bridge may be purchased and completed for a sum not exceeding 24,000l.

4. That it is the opinion of this committee, that a sum not exceeding 144,000l. should be forthwith contracted for, and raised within the space of eight years, by such installments as this committee shall think proper in each year, not exceeding thirty thousand pounds in any one year: the money so to be contracted for to be paid into the chamber of London.

5. That it is the opinion of this committee, that the persons contracting to advance the said money should be intitled to an interest of four pounds per cent. per annum, by way of annuities, to be computed from the time of the first payment in each year, upon the whole sum by them respectively advanced within the year; but should incur such forfeiture as this committee shall see fit, in case of neglect to make good any of the stipulated payments: the said annuities to be paid half-yearly by the chamberlain, but to be redeemable at the expiration of the first ten years, upon six months notice, and payment of the money advanced.

6. That it is the opinion of this committee, that the chamberlain should be authorized and directed to affix this city's seal to such instruments as the committee shall think fit to give, pursuant to the said act, for securing the payment of the said annuities, redeemable as aforesaid, and which shall be transacted and paid for in manner before-mentioned.

7. That it is the opinion of this committee, that the chamberlain should be authorized and directed to pay and apply the monies so to be paid in, for the purposes of the said act, in such a manner as this committee shall, from time to time, think fit and order.

8. That it is the opinion of this committee, that the chamberlain should be authorized and directed to lay out and apply the sheriff's fines, appropriated by order of the court of common-council, for the purposes of the said act, either in the public funds, in order to carry interest, or to payment of the said annuities or otherwise, as this committee shall, from time to time think fit and order. And it was ordered, that the court of common-council be moved pursuant to the five last resolutions.

In consequence of which, at another court appointed for that purpose, the said affairs of the new bridge were considered and strongly debated. They divided three different times; and there being, on each division, a majority of forty, and upwards, they were agreed to.

CHAPTER XLVI.

Subscription opened at Guildhall for the supply of landmen. Death of princess Caroline. Rejoicings on the taking of Quebec. City address on the occasion. Great fire in Sweeting's-alley. Another in Covent-garden. Improvements in the city of London by act of parliament. Remarkable high wind. Earl Ferrers tried before the house of lords at Westminster-hall, for the murder of his steward. His execution. First pile drove for the new bridge at Black-friars. City address on the conquest of Canada. Death of king George II. Accession of king George III. City right to tolls in markets. Election of members for the city of London. Freedom presented to Arthur Onslow, esq; and the duke of York. Address to his majesty on the conquest of Bellisle.

THE power of the enemy in Germany being very strong, and continual recruits wanted to supply the great draughts of men necessary to be made from England to defeat their designs, the Lord-mayor called a common-council, and acquainted them, that he had summoned that court to deliberate on a proposition of great consequence to the service of their king and country, and hoped that the result would be such as should do honour to the city, by proving the sincerity of their professions to his majesty. Whereupon the court, among other considerations, resolved and ordered, that voluntary subscriptions should be received in the chamber of London, to be appropriated as bounty-money to such persons as should enter into his majesty's service, and that the city subscribe 1000l. for that purpose; and a committee of twelve aldermen and twenty-four four commoners was appointed to attend at Guildhall, to dispose of the said bounty-money to persons applying for the same; and that one alderman and two commoners be a quorum to transact business: and, as a further encouragement, every person, so entering, shall be entitled to the freedom of this city at the expiration of three years, or sooner, if the war should end: and the town clerk was ordered by the court to wait upon the right honourable Mr. Pitt with the said resolutions, and desire him to inform his majesty of the same. Some of the committee were ordered to wait upon lord Ligonier, to desire him to send proper officers to Guildhall to receive such persons as should be enlisted.

Agreeable to the above order the town clerk waited on Mr. Pitt, who the next day sent the following letter.

To the right honourable the Lord-mayor of the city of London.

“ My lord, Whitehall Aug. 15 1759, “ Having, in consequence of the desire of the “ court of common-council, had the honour to “ lay before the king their resolutions of yester“ day, for offering certain bounties and encou“ ragements to such able bodied men as shall en“ list themselves at the Guildhall of London, to “ serve in his majesty’s land forces, upon the “ terms contained in his majesty’s order in coun“ cil; I am commanded by the king to acquaint “ your lordship, (of which you will be pleased to “ make the proper communication) that his ma“ jesty thanks the city of London for this fresh “ testimony of their zeal and affection for his “ royal person and government. I am farther “ commanded by the king to express his majesty’s “ most entire satisfaction in this signal proof of “ the unshaken resolution of the city of London

“ to support a just and necessary war, undertaken “ in defence of the rights and honour of his “ crown, and for the security of the colonies,
“ the trade and navigation of Great-Britain.”

“ I am, with great truth and respect,

“ My Lord,

“ Your lordship’s most obedient humble servant,
“ W. PITT.”

A subscription was immediately opened at Guildhall which met with such universal encouragement, that they were soon enabled to carry this laudable scheme into execution: for, by giving five guineas to each person who should voluntarily offer himself for his majesty’s service, and a promise that he should be admitted a freeman of London without fee or reward, upon producing a testimonial of his good behaviour from a general officer, great numbers immediately offered and enlisted.

The city of Westminster soon after adopted the same scheme; when, on the nineteenth of September, a great number of the nobility, &c. met at the St. Alban’s tavern, subscribed 4726l. immediately, and appointed a committee to carry the said subscription, to pay bounties to persons who should enlist into the land service, into effectual execution. By an account afterwards published, it appeared that the Guildhall subscription amounted to 7039l. 7s. with which money were enlisted 1235 men for his majesty’s land-service.

On the fourth of September died her royal highness princess Elizabeth Caroline, second daughter to the late prince of Wales; and on the fourteenth her royal highness’s obsequies were interred with the usual solemnities in the royal vault in king Henry the VIIth’s chapel at Westminster.

On the twenty-eighth, George Errington and Paul Vaillant, esqrs. were sworn in at Guildhall sheriffs of London and Middlesex for the year ensuing. And the next day Sir Thomas Chitty, kn. alderman of Tower-ward, was elected Lord-mayor of London.

Among the various conquests obtained over the French, this year records the taking of Quebec: on the receipt of which news the Park and Tower guns were fired, flags every where displayed from the steeples of churches, and the greatest illuminations made throughout the city and suburbs, that were ever known. And on the twentieth of October, the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, waited on his majesty with the following congratulatory address on the occasion:

“ May it please your majesty,

“ To accept the most humble but warmest “ congratulations of your majesty’s dutiful and “ loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and “ commons, of the city of London, in common-“ council assembled, upon the rapid and unin“ terrupted series of victories and successes,
“ which, under the divine blessing, have attended “ your majesty’s arms by sea and land, within “ the compass of this distinguished and ever me“ morable year.

“ The reduction of Fort du Quesne on the “ Ohio; of the island of Goree in Africa; and “ of Guadaloupe, with its dependencies, in the “ West-Indies; the repulse and defeat of the “ whole French army, by a handful of infantry,
“ in the plains of Minden; the taking of Nia“ gara, Ticonderoga, and Crown-Point; the na“ val victory off cape Lagos; the advantages “ gained over the French nation in the East-In“ dies; and, above all, the conquest of Quebec,
“ (the capital of the French empire in North-“ America) in a manner so glorious to your ma-“ jesty’s arms, against every advantage of situa“ tion and superior numbers; are such events as “ will for ever render your majesty’s auspicious “ reign the favourite æra in the history of Great-“ Britain.

“ But, whilst we reflect with surprize and gra“ titude upon this last and most important con“ quest, permit us, gracious sovereign, to express “ our great regard for the immense (though al“ most only) loss which has attended it, in the “ death of that gallant general James Wolfe, “ whose abilities formed, whose courage attempt“ ed, and whose conduct happily effected, the “ glorious “ glorious enterprize in which he fell, leaving to “ future times an heroic example of military skill, “ discipline, and fortitude.

“ Measures of such national concern, so inva“ riably pursued, and acquisitions of so much “ consequence to the power and trade of Great-“ Britain, are the noblest proofs of your majesty’s “ paternal affection and regard for the true in“ terest of your kingdoms, and reflect honour “ upon those whom your majesty has been pleased “ to admit into your council, or to intrust with “ the conduct of your fleets and armies.

“ These will ever command the lives and for“ tunes of a free and grateful people, in defence “ of your majesty’s sacred person and royal fami“ ly, against the attempts of all your enemies.
“ And we humbly trust that almighty God will “ bless your majesty’s salutary intentions with a “ continuance of success, and thereby, in time,
“ lead to a safe and honourable peace.”

To which address his majesty was pleased to return the following most gracious answer.

“ I receive, with particular satisfaction, this “ most dutiful and loyal address, as an additional “ mark of your affection to my person, and of “ your signal zeal for the honour of my govern“ ment in this just and necessary war. Our suc“ cesses are, under the blessing of God, the na“ tural and happy fruit of union amongst my “ people, and of ability and valour in my fleets
“ and armies. I have an entire confidence in this “ truly national spirit; and the city of London
“ may depend on my tender care for the rights, “ trade, colonies, and navigation of my faithful “ subjects.”

On the tenth of November, about five o’clock in the morning, a dreadful fire broke out at Hamlin’s coffee-house in Sweeting’s-alley, near the Royal Exchange, which consumed that and another coffee-house adjoining. The flames spread themselves with such rapidity into Cornhill, that thirteen capital houses were entirely destroyed, and several others very considerably damaged. And on the twenty-third of December, about four in the morning, another fire broke out at a cabinet-maker’s in King-street, Covent-garden, which entirely consumed that house, and two others in front. A large workshop backwards took fire, and the flames soon reached several houses in Hart-street, which were burnt down; as were likewise all the houses on the right hand side of the way in Rose-street, through to Long Acre. About fifty houses were entirely consumed, besides many others greatly damaged. One fireman and a brewer’s servant lost their lives by the fall of a house, and several others had their legs and arms broke. The damage was computed at more than seventy thousand pounds.

The building of the new bridge being finally determined, and all preparations made for its execution, the more discerning part of the city foresaw, that unless proper measures should be taken to make the city of London more airy and commodious for trade before the bridge should be finished, the genteel part of its inhabitants might be invited into the new buildings on the Surrey side; by which the estates in the city would be greatly prejudiced. To prevent this, and for the farther emolument of the city, the common-council, on the twenty-second of January 1760, resolved that an application should be made to parliament for a bill to empower the city to make such alterations in regard to the avenues leading into it, as should be thought necessary, and might tend to its advantage. Accordingly a petition was presented on the twenty-fourth, praying that leave might be given to bring in a bill to widen and enlarge several old streets, lanes, &c. and to open several new streets and ways, and for determining, in a summary way, all disputes arising about the rebuilding of houses, in which several persons had an intermixed property. In consequence of this petition an act of parliament was soon after passed, by which the citizens were empowered to make the following openings, improvements and enlargements in the respective wards of the city of London.

Openings.

In Aldersgate-ward. A passage 20 feet wide, from the east side of Aldersgate-street (opposite to Little-britain) to the west of Noble-street, opposite to Oat-lane; and from thence through Wood-street, opposite to Love-lane.

Aldgate-ward. A passage 50 feet wide, from the mason’s shop, facing Crutched-friars, in a direct line to the Minories. A passage, 25 feet wide, through Northumberland-alley, into Crutched-friars.

Bishopsgate ward. A passage, 25 feet wide, through Angel-court, in Bishopsgate-street, into Little St. Helen’s. A passage, 20 feet wide, from Broad-street, through Union-court into Bishopsgate-street.

Coleman-street-ward. A passage, 50 feet wide, from Token-house-yard to London-wall.

Farringdon-ward without. A passage, 30 feet wide, in the middle part of Snow-hill, to Fleet-market. A passage, 25 feet wide, from Butcher-hall-lane into Little-britain.

Farringdon-ward within. A passage through Cock-alley on the south-side of Ludgate-hill, and opposite to the Old-bailey, 40 feet wide, into Black-friars.

Improvements and enlargements.

In Aldgate-ward. The houses on the east-side of Billiter-lane to be pulled down, to enlarge the passage to thirty feet. The houses at the east-end of Leadenhall-street to be pulled down, to make the passage there 35 feet-wide. Part of the houses on the east-side of Poor-jury-lane, beginning with a house on the north-side of the Horse and Trumpet, and extending southward to Gould-square, to range in a line with that end of the lane next to Aldgate; the passage of which is to be made 35 feet wide, by letting back all the houses from the gate to the Horse and Trumpet.

Broad-street-ward. The house at the west end of the buildings between Cornhill and Thread-needle-street, opposite to the south end of Princes-

Princes-street, to be pulled down, and the ground laid into the street. The houses to be pulled down on the south side of Threadneedle-street, extending from the house before-mentioned eastward to that part of the street which is opposite to the bank gates; and the passage there enlarged to 35 feet in width.

Coleman-street-ward. One house on the north east corner of the Old-Jury, and another house at the south west corner of Coleman-street, to be pulled down, and the ground laid into the street.

Cordwainer's-ward. The house at the north east corner of Trinity-lane, near the Dog-tavern, to be pulled down, and laid into the street.

Cornhill-ward. The house at the west end of the buildings, between Cornhill and Lombard-street, to be taken down, and the ground laid into the street.

Cripplegate-ward within. The houses which project forward at the west end of Silver-street, from the end of Monkwell-street, quite through into Aldersgate-street, to be pulled down, to make a street forty feet wide. The house at the corner of Aldermanbury, formerly the Baptist-head tavern, facing Milk-street, to be taken down, and the ground laid into the street.

Farringdon-ward within. The tin shop and the trunk-makers, at the south west corner of Cheapside, leading into St. Paul's-church-yard, to be pulled down and the ground laid into the street. Such part of the houses in Creed-lane, to be taken down as are necessary to widen the passage to thirty feet.

Farringdon-ward without. All the houses in the middle row between the paved-alley adjoining to St. Sepulchre's-church, and Gilt-spur-street, from the north end quite through to the south end, facing Hart-street, to be taken down, and the ground laid into the street. All the houses in the middle row between the Great and Little Old-bailey, from the north end facing Hart-street, to the Baptist-head at the south end; as likewise the shops or sheds under St. Dunstan's-church, in Fleet-street, to be pulled down, and the ground laid into the street.

Langbourn-ward. Such part of the houses at the end of Mark-lane, next to Fenchurch-street, and such part of those at the east end of Lombard-street, to be pulled down, as will make the passage in each place 30 feet wide.

Portoken-ward. The house at the north east corner of Houndsditch, adjoining to the church-yard, to be pulled down, and the ground laid into the street.

Tower-ward. Such part of the houses on St. Dunstan's-hill, adjoining to the George alehouse, and opposite to the chain, and such part of the warehouses opposite to the end of St. Dunstan's church, to be pulled down as will make the passage 30 feet wide.

The house on the north west corner of Great Tower-street, and also the house on the south east corner of Little Tower-street, to be pulled down to make a convenient passage. The house in Mark-lane which adjoins to Allhallows-staining, and projects 12 feet before the other houses, to be pulled down, to make it range in a line with the other houses, and enlarge the passage.

Vintry-ward. The houses on the north side of Thames-street, which reach from Elbow-lane to College-hill, and also those on the south side of the said street, which reach from Vintners-hall to Bull-wharf-lane, to be pulled down, in order to make the street 40 feet wide. The house at the corner of Tower-Royal, facing College-hill, to be pulled down, and the ground laid into the street.

Walbrook-ward. The house at the north east corner of Bucklersbury, which projects before the other buildings, to be pulled down.

Bishopsgate-ward. The two houses between New Broad-street, and New Broad street buildings, which project so far into the street, to be pulled down.

On the fifteenth of February a most terrible hurricane arose, which did incredible damage both at land and on the river, but more particularly the latter. A stack of chimnies fell on a house in Grosvenor-square, and demolished the bed and furniture of two rooms. A house in Hanover-street had the gable end blown off: and one of the pinnacles of a house adjoining to the house of commons was blown down, and broke through the roof of the room over the speaker's chamber. On the roof of the admiralty upwards of twenty-seven feet of the lead was rolled up by the force of the wind like a scroll. The mall in St. James's Park was covered with branches of trees; and a great number of chimnies, fences, &c. were blown down in Westminster, by which many people lost their lives.

On the sixteenth of April came on before the house of lords at Westminster-hall, the trial of Laurence earl Ferrers, for the murder of Mr. Johnson, * his steward, by shooting him with a pistol, the balls from which entered one side of his

* This murder was committed at his lordship's seat in Leicestershire. Mr. Johnson lived about nine hours after he was shot; in which time he gave the following account: That his lordship had sent all the servants out of the way but one, when he called him up to deliver in his accounts; that when he entered the room, he observed that his lordship turned the key upon him, and, when he presented his papers, he expressed some discontent, and bid him fall upon his knees. Mr. Johnson expostulated with him, desiring to know in what he had offended; that he doubted not, upon examination, he would find his accounts exact, and, as they had always been, to his satisfaction; he beseeched his lordship to give him leave to explain them. His answer was, that he did not doubt his accounts, but he had been a tyrant, and he was determined to punish him, and insisted on his falling on his knees to make his peace with his God, for he never should rise again till he rose at the resurrection. Mr. Johnson then fell upon one knee, and besought him to consider his age and his services; that he had been thirty years a faithful servant in the family, and that he could never be charged with wrong to any man. His lordship made answer, that he must either be a rogue to him, or to others, and, pulling a pistol out of his pocket, and cocking it, bid him instantly fall on both knees, and pray to God, for now was the last moment he had to live. He then obeyed, and his lordship discharged the pistol full at his body. He dropped, and his lordship raising him up, asked, "how he felt himself now;" to which he replied, "like a man who has but a few moments to live." Then said he, make good use of your time; and, taking him in his arms, his belly, and came out at the other. Lord keeper Henley was appointed lord high steward of England on this occasion. The prisoner, in his own coach, attended by the major of the Tower (where he was confined) and some other gentlemen, and guarded by a party of the foot-guards and warders of the Tower, arrived about eleven o'clock at Westminster-hall, and was immediately followed by the lord high steward in his state coach, drawn by six horses, and followed by the twelve judges and masters in chancery. All the crown evidence, and part of his lordship's, were that day examined; and the next day the evidence being closed, earl Ferrers was unanimously found guilty of felony and murder. In consequence of which, the day following, being the eighteenth,† the lord high steward pronounced sentence on the earl as follows: "That his lordship be carried back to the prison of the Tower from whence he came, and from thence to the place of execution, on Monday next, and there be hanged by the neck till he was dead; after which his body was to be delivered to Surgeons-hall to be dissected and anatomized." At this part of the sentence his lordship cried out, "God forbid!" but soon recollecting himself, added, "God's will be done!" Afterwards the lord high steward took notice that by the act of parliament, the lords, his judges, had a power of respiting, and therefore, that he might have more time to prepare himself, they postponed his sentence to the fifth of May. On the second of which the sheriffs received a writ for the execution of this unhappy nobleman, under the great seal of Great Britain, and a writ was also sent to the lieutenant of the Tower, for the delivery of his lordship's body to the said sheriffs.

On the morning of his execution, about nine o'clock, the sheriffs, attended by their under sheriffs, &c. went to the outward gate of the Tower, of which earl Ferrers being informed, sent to desire of them the permission of going in his own landau, instead of a mourning coach provided by his friends. The sheriffs having given a receipt for his body, the solemn procession moved on thus:

A large body of constables.

A party of horse-grenadiers and another of foot.

Mr. sheriff Errington, with his deputy, in his chariot.

His lordship in his landau, accompanied by Mr. sheriff Vaillant, and the reverend Mr. Humphreys, chaplain of the Tower, escorted by two other parties of horse-grenadiers and foot.

Mr. sheriff Vaillant's chariot, with his under sheriff.

A mourning coach and six, with some of his lordship's friends.

A hearse and six, provided to carry his lordship's body from the place of execution to Surgeons-hall.

The procession was slow and solemn, taking up two hours and three quarters, through an innumerable concourse of spectators, who behaved with the utmost decency, and were, in general, impressed with an awful melancholy silence. His lordship behaved with ease and composure during the whole time of his passage from the Tower to Tyburn. He told Mr. sheriff Vaillant, as they sat in the landau, that his dress (light cloaths embroidered with silver) might seem odd; but that he had his reasons for wearing them that day; which, however, he did not mention. After taking notice of the innumerable multitude that crowded round him every foot of the way, he added, that he supposed they came to see a lord hanged. He had applied in vain to the king, by letter, that he might suffer in the Tower, where Essex, queen Elizabeth's favourite, was beheaded: he made this application with the more confidence, as he had the honour, he said, to quarter part of his majesty's arms, and to be allied to him. To die at the place for executing common felons he thought hard: and observed, that the apparatus of death, and the being made a spectacle to such multitudes, was worse than death itself. Mr. Humphreys had never seen him till that morning; and that gentleman signifying to him that some account of his religious sentiments would be expected, he made answer, That he did not think himself accountable for these to the public. That he had always adored one God, the maker of the world; and for any peculiar notions of his own, he had never propagated them, or endeavoured to make proselytes; that he thought it wrong to disturb any national form of religion, as lord Bolingbroke had done by the publication of his writings. He added, that the multitude of sects, and the many disputes about religion; had almost banished morality. [Did ever these hurt the morals of any sincere enquirer after truth?] His shooting Mr. Johnson, against whom he declared that he had no malice, he ascribed to his not knowing what he did, which disorder was placed him in a chair. The only servant in the house, his lordship sent for a surgeon; and, when the surgeon came, he took him to the room where the steward was, and bid him take care of him; but, at the same time, with the severest menaces, threatened, that if ever he said a syllable about the wound, he would, with the other pistol, which he pulled out and shewed him, serve him just as he had served old Johnson. The surgeon, with great presence of mind, answered, there would be no occasion to say any thing, for the man would be well in four and twenty hours. But when he was got out of his reach, he then applied to a neighbouring justice of peace, told him of the case, and desired that his lordship might be secured, which was accordingly done. He was first confined in his own house, from whence he endeavoured to make his escape; but on the man's dying he was committed to the county prison, and from thence to the Tower.

occasioned, he said, by many crosses and vexations he had met with at that particular time. As he approached Tyburn, he expressed a desire to see a person (whether male or female is not mentioned) who waited there in a coach, and for whom he said he had a very sincere regard; but, being told that parting with this person might give him too great a shock, he declined it, and delivered to the sheriff a bank note in a pocket book, with a ring, and a purse with some guineas, to be given this person.

Being arrived at the place of execution, he alighted and ascended the scaffold with the same composure he had hitherto shewn, where, after a short stay, he was asked by the clergyman to join in prayer with him, which he declined; but, kneeling on black cushions, readily joined with him in the Lord's prayer, which he said he had always admired. After it was over, he added, with energy, "O Lord, forgive me all my errors; pardon all my sins." He then rose, and presented his watch to Mr. sheriff Vaillant, thanked him and the rest of the gentlemen for their civilities, and signified his desire to be buried at Breden, or Stanton, in Leicestershire. Then the executioner's man came to tie his lordship's hands; and his lordship mistaking him for the executioner, gave him his purse with five guineas, which the executioner demanded of his man, and he refused to deliver it. This incident would have retarded the execution, and greatly discomposed his lordship, had not the sheriff immediately interposed, and commanded them to proceed in their business, and end the dispute. They then put on his white cap, took off his neckcloth, and put on the halter, which was a common one. He then stepped upon the little stage in the middle of the scaffold, and it was explained to him in what manner it would sink. His cap being pulled over his eyes, Mr. sheriff Vaillant gave the signal for removing the board by stamping with his foot.

His lordship was turned off about two minutes before twelve, and seemed to die very easy; but his hands very soon turned remarkably black. After he was turned off the hearse and mourning coach drew up to the scaffold, and a shell, covered with black, was taken out of the hearse: his lordship's body, after hanging one hour and five minutes, was cut down; and the shell, being raised up on end, the body was dropped into it, and carried in a hearse, attended by the two sheriffs, to Surgeons-hall.

From the time of his ascending the scaffold to his execution was not more than eight minutes, during which his countenance never changed, nor did his tongue falter.

His lordship wore his own light brown curled hair, light coloured cloaths, black silk breeches, white silk stockings, and stone shoe and knee buckles. The gallows was covered with black bays, as was also the scaffold, which was erected under it and railed round.

A great number of persons were admitted to see the dissected body at Surgeons-hall, for three days. On the coffin was the following inscription: "Laurence earl Ferrers suffered May the 5th, 1760." His lordship's remains were afterwards delivered to his friends, and interred in Leicestershire.

On the seventh of June the first pile of the new bridge from Black-friars to the opposite shore in Surry, was drove in the middle of the Thames. And on the ninth the foundation was laid for a new chapel at the end of Portland-street, Marybone.

At the court of common-council held the eighteenth, the committee of the city lands were empowered to put in execution the act of parliament passed the last sessions, for widening and improving the several streets, &c. in the city; and at the same time directed an opening to be made as soon as possible from the east end of Crutched-friars into the minories. The said committee sold Aldgate for 177l. 10s. Cripplegate for 91l. and Ludgate for 148l. to be pulled down and taken away by the purchaser within a certain time. The statue of queen Elizabeth, which stood on the west side of Ludgate, was purchased by alderman Gosling, and set up against the east end of St. Dunstan's church, in Fleet-street.

On the twenty-ninth of September came on at Guildhall the election of Lord-mayor for the year ensuing, when the majority of hands appeared in favour of Sir Matthew Blackiston, knight. alderman of Bishopsgate-ward, and Sir Samuel Fludyer, bart. alderman of Cheap-ward, who being returned to the court of aldermen, the former was declared duly elected. And at the court of common-council held the fourteenth of October, it was agreed to petition the parliament for leave to take down Gresham college, and to build a street through the same into Broad-street, to be called Gresham-street.

On the eighteenth of October the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, waited on his majesty with an address of congratulation on the conquest of Canada; and being introduced to his majesty by Mr. Secretary Pitt. the recorder, in their name spoke as follows:

"Most gracious Sovereign,

"Permit us, your ever dutiful and loyal subjects the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, humbly to congratulate your majesty upon the late signal successes with which it hath pleased the divine providence to bless your majesty's arms by sea and land.

"The conquest of Canada, so heroically begun at Quebec, so nobly seconded by the defeat and dispersion of the enemy's fleet upon the coast of Britany, and so happily completed without the effusion of human blood at Montreal; at the same time that it reflects the highest honour upon the wisdom and vigour of your majesty's councils, upon the conduct, fortitude, and activity of your commanders, and upon the bravery and discipline of your fleets and armies, is an event of the utmost importance to the trade and manufactures of these kingdoms, as it is the only effectual means of securing your majesty's industrious subjects in North America, against the continual encroachments and unparalleled " rallied barbarities of a restless and insidious enemy, ever more dangerous in peace than war.

" Deeply sensible of your majesty's paternal goodness, in thus graciously protecting the most distant of your faithful subjects, your majesty's grateful citizens of London, will ever cheerfully exert those means, for which (under the divine favour) they esteem themselves indebted to preserve this valuable acquisition, and effectually to prosecute the various and extensive services of this just and necessary war, and to dictate to the aggressors the terms of a safe and honourable peace.

" To this desirable end, may the God of armies crown the justice of your majesty's cause with repeated and decisive victories; and when your majesty shall have long enjoyed the glorious fruits of all your care and labours, may the empire of Great Britain continue in your majesty's illustrious race, in full splendor and security, till time shall be no more."

To which address his majesty was pleased to return the following most gracious answer:

" I have the highest satisfaction in this fresh and signal proof of your affection to me, and to my government, for which I return you my hearty thanks. The same union amongst my people, and the same ability and valour in my fleets and armies, will, I trust, under the blessing of God, enable me, in the end, to terminate this necessary and expensive war, by an honourable, advantageous, and lasting peace. The city of London may depend on my constant care for their prosperity, and for the extension of the trade, manufactures, and navigation of my faithful subjects."

On the twenty-fifth of October, between the hours of seven and eight in the morning, his most gracious majesty king George the second was seized, at his palace at Kensington, with a violent disorder, and fell down speechless; soon after which he expired, notwithstanding all possible means were used for his recovery. He that morning rose at his usual hour without any apparent signs of indisposition: he called his page, drank his chocolate, and enquired about the wind, as if anxious for the arrival of the mails. He opened his window, and looked out of it; and seeing it a fine day, said he would walk in the gardens. This passed while the page attended him at breakfast; but on leaving the room he heard a deep sigh, which was immediately followed by a noise like the falling of a billet of wood from the fire; and returning hastily, found the king dropped down from his seat, as if in attempting to ring the bell, who said faintly, " Call Amelia, and then expired. Thus died one of the most magnanimous monarchs that ever adorned the British throne, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, and 34th of his reign.

The next day his majesty's grandson, George prince of Wales, was proclaimed by the title of king George III. The proclamation was first made before Saville-house, where the officers of state, nobility, and privy-counsellors were present, with the officers of arms, all being on foot: after which the officers of arms being mounted on horseback, the like was done at Charing-cross; within Temple-bar; at the end of Wood-street in Cheapside; and lastly, at the Royal-exchange, with the usual solemnities. The archbishop of Canterbury, the duke of Leeds and lord Falmouth attended the procession. The guns were fired at the park and Tower on this occasion; and the evening concluded with ringing of bells, &c.

On the twenty-eighth the right honourable the Lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London waited on his majesty at Saville-house, and being introduced to his majesty by his grace the duke of Devonshire, lord-chamberlain of the household, Sir William Moreton, the recorder, made their compliments of congratulation and condolence in the following address:

" Most gracious Sovereign,

" Your majesty's truly dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London, beg leave to approach your royal person and congratulate your majesty upon your happy accession to the imperial crown of these realms; and, at the same time, to condole the loss of our late most gracious sovereign, whose glorious reign and princely virtues must ever make his memory dear to a grateful people.

" It is our peculiar happiness, that your majesty's heart is truly English, and that you have discovered in your earliest years, the warmest attention to the laws and constitution of these kingdoms; laws so excellently formed, that as they give liberty to the people, they give power to the prince; and are a mutual support of the prerogatives of the crown, and the rights of the subject.

" Your majesty is now in possession of the united hearts of all your people, at a time when the honour and credit of the nation are (by the courage and activity of your majesty's fleets and armies) in the highest extent; a time when we have happily no divisions at home to obstruct those measures, which have carried terror to our enemies abroad.

" As your majesty's reign is so happily begun with the universal approbation and joy of the whole nation, permit us, great Sir, to express the high sense we have of your majesty's virtues, by the strongest assurances of our unalterable zeal for your majesty's sacred person and government; being convinced, that your majesty has the true interest of this nation entirely at heart, and that your power will be ever exerted in protecting the trade, rights, and liberties of your subjects. May your majesty reign long in the hearts of your people; and may the crown of these kingdoms ever descend to one of your majesty's illustrious family to latest posterity."

To which address his majesty was pleased to return this most gracious answer:

" I have

" I have great satisfaction in the early marks
 " you have given me of your zeal and affection
 " for me and for my government. And I return
 " you my hearty thanks. You may rely on my " tender concern for the rights, trade, and ma" nufactures of the city of London."

And on the thirtieth the court of common-council waited on his majesty with their address on the same occasion.

The next day, about noon, the first stone of the new bridge at Black-friars was laid in the north abutment, by the right honourable the Lord-mayor (attended by several aldermen and commoners of the committee) by the striking the same with a mallet, the officers laying thereon, at the same time, the city sword and mace. Several pieces of gold, silver, and copper coins of his late majesty were placed under the stone, together with the following latin inscription in large plates

On the last day of October, in the year 1760, and in the beginning of the most auspicious reign of GEORGE the Third,
 Sir THOMAS CHITTY, Knight, Lord-Mayor, laid the First Stone of this Bridge,
 Undertaken by the Common-Council of London, (in the height of an extensive War) for the public accommodation, and ornament of the city,
 ROBERT MYLNE being the Architect.
 And that there may remain to posterity a monument of this city's affection to the man who, by the strength of his genius, the steadiness of his mind, and a kind of happy contagion of his probity and spirit, (under the divine favour and fortunate auspices of GEORGE the second) recovered, augmented, and secured,

32

The British Empire
 in Asia, Africa, and America,
 And restored the ancient reputation and influence of his country amongst the nations of Europe;
 The Citizens of London have unanimously voted this Bridge to be inscribed with the name of WILLIAM PITT.

The right of the city to take toll for provisions exposed to sale before houses in the markets, was tried in the court of King's-bench, Guild-hall, by a jury of non-freemen, between the citizens of the city of London, plaintiffs, and Edward Smith and Ralph Twyford, salesmen in Newgatemarket, defendants: and between the said plaintiffs and John Cope, a salesman, defendant, for the sale of provisions exposed to sale in White-hart-street, an avenue or passage leading to Newgate-market. In each of these causes the jury gave a verdict for the city: by which the citizens have established their right to the tolls, for all the avenues leading to, and to the tolls in the markets.

At a court of common-council held the eighteenth of February 1761, a motion was made and agreed to, that the freedom of this city be presented to Sir John Phillips, bart. and George Cooke, esq; one of the knights for the shire of Middlesex, in testimony of the grateful sense which the citizens of London entertain of the many benefits received from their readiness and assiduity, to assist and support such of their resolutions, as required the aid and authority of parliament.
 The court, however, looking on this with some surprize, unanimously agreed, that, for the future, no person shall have the freedom presented to him, unless the motion for the same shall be mentioned at one court, previous to the putting the question for granting the same.

In the afternoon of the twenty-sixth a fire broke out at the mill belonging to his majesty, at the Red-house, Deptford, which consumed the same, together with a large quantity of flour.
 The damage was computed at about 2000l. It was occasioned by the violence of the wind, which drove the mill with such velocity that it could not be stopped.

On the second of March the flow of the tide was so small, that the sterlings of London-bridge were not covered at high water. A circumstance never known before.

On the twenty-sixth came on at Guildhall the election for members to represent this city in the ensuing parliament, when, after holding up of hands, the sheriffs declared the election was fallen on Sir Robert Ladbroke, Sir Richard Glynn, William Beckford, esq; and the honourable Thomas Harley, esq; But a poll being demanded on the behalf of Sir Samuel Fludyer, the same was immediately begun and continued till the second of April, when, on casting up the books, the numbers appeared

For Sir Robert Ladbroke, kn.	4306
Sir Richard Glynn, bart.	3285
William Beckford, esq;	3663
Hon. Thomas Harley, esq;	3983
Sir Samuel Fludyer, bart.	3193

And

And on the fourth the four first were returned duly elected.

About ten o'clock at night, on the twenty-fourth, a fire broke out in a stable-yard behind Swallow-street, Golden-square, and destroyed fourteen houses, two of which were new and of great value. The fire was so fierce, that a box of writings, which was in an iron chest, though inclosed in sand near a foot thick, was entirely consumed, and a quantity of cash in the same box was melted. And

On the second of May another fire broke out at a biscuit maker's, near Pelican-stairs, in Lower Shadwell, and burnt almost to Wapping-wall; by which thirty-four houses were destroyed. Eight barges and lighters were burnt, and three were sunk. The whole damage was computed at fifty thousand pounds.

At a court of common-council held the fifth of May, it was unanimously resolved, "That the freedom of this city, in a gold box, value 100*l*. should be presented to the right honourable Arthur Onflow, esq; speaker of the house of commons in five successive parliaments, as a grateful and lasting testimony of the respective love and veneration which the citizens of London entertain for his person and distinguished virtue; for the many eminent qualifications he displayed, the unwearied and disinterested labours he bestowed, and the impartial and judicious conduct he maintained, in the execution of that arduous and important office, during a course of thirty-three years: and for that exemplary zeal, which, upon all occasions, he exerted with so much dignity and success, in support of the rights, privileges, and constitutional independencies of the commons of Great Britain."

The following is the answer which the right honourable Arthur Onflow gave in writing, when attended upon by the chamberlain with the freedom of this city.

"Mr. Chamberlain,

"I receive, with the truest sense of gratitude, this great mark of respect the city of London is pleased to shew towards me in their gift of the freedom, and which I can only impute to the high regard the citizens of London bear to the house of commons, and as a testimony for their esteem for those who faithfully perform their duty to the public there.

"The expressions of good will and kindness to me, which are used in conferring this honour upon me, however little deserving I may think myself of them, do indeed affect me extremely, as an argument of the favourable opinion the city of London entertains of my sincere and dutiful endeavours to support, upon all proper occasions, the rights, privileges and constitutional independence of the commons of Great Britain.

"I beg my Lord-mayor, aldermen, and the whole of the common-council, will accept my respectful and humblest thanks upon this occasion, and be assured of my constant and warmest wishes that this great metropolis may ever

"flourish in all prosperity and dignity—in a dignity that becomes the metropolis of a great kingdom, and of which the city of London is so considerable and respectable a part."

And at another court of common-council held the 5th of June, it was unanimously agreed, "That the freedom of the city be humbly presented to his royal highness Edward Augustus, duke of York and Albany, one of the rear-admirals of the blue squadron of his majesty's fleet, in a gold box of 150 guineas value, in testimony of the dutiful affection of this court for their illustrious sovereign, whose peculiar glory it is to reign over a free, happy, and united people, and as a pledge of the grateful respect they bear his royal highness for his early entrance into the naval service of his king and country, the noblest and most effectual bulwark of the wealth, reputation and independence of this commercial nation."

On the seventeenth the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council waited on his majesty at St. James's with the following congratulatory address on the conquest of Bellisle:

"Most gracious sovereign,

"With reverential awe and gratitude to the supreme giver of all victory, we, your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, of your city of London, in common-council assembled, humbly approach your royal presence, to express our joy and exultation on the entire reduction of the important island of Bellisle, by the conduct, intrepidity, and perseverance of your majesty's land and naval forces: a conquest, which after more than one fruitless attempt in former times, seems to have been reserved by divine providence to grace the auspicious beginnings of your majesty's reign, and confirms our hopes of a long continuance of wise, steady, and successful measures.

"A blow so humiliating to the pride and power of France, cannot but impress that haughty nation with a due sense of the superiority of a patriot king ruling over a free, brave, and united people; and will, we trust, convince them of the danger of delaying to accept such terms of peace as your majesty's equity, wisdom, and moderation, shall think fit to prescribe.

"What therefore have we more to wish, but that your majesty may long, very long, continue the guardian and protector of the religious, civil, and commercial rights of Great Britain, and her colonies; and that your majesty's wisdom may ever be seconded by equally faithful and spirited councils; and your commands executed with no less ardour, emulation and success.

"On our part, permit us humbly to assure your majesty, that your faithful citizens of London will, with unwearied zeal and cheerfulness, contribute to support a vigorous prosecution of this just and necessary war; until your majesty,

The Ceremony of Laying the first Stone of Blackfriars Bridge
By the LORD MAYOR & ALDERMEN of the CITY of LONDON.

"majesty, having sufficiently vindicated the honour of your crown, and secured the trade, navigation, and possessions of your subjects, shall enjoy the blessing and glory of giving repose to Europe, of wholly attending to, and promoting the virtue and happiness of your people, and of cultivating all the softer arts of peace."

To which his majesty was pleased to return the following most gracious answer :

"I return you my hearty thanks for this fresh mark of your affection to my person, and of your constant zeal for the lustre of my arms, and for the glory of my reign. Your repeated assurances of chearful and steady support in the prosecution of this necessary war, are most highly pleasing to me, and cannot fail to promote the desirable object of peace, on just, honourable, and advantageous conditions. The city of London may always depend on my unwearied endeavours for the security and extension of their trade, navigation and commerce."

On the twenty-third Sir Robert Ladbroke, with many other gentlemen of the committee for building Black-friars-bridge, went on board the caisson, and laid the first stone of the first pier. And

On the twenty-ninth was opened the road from Islington to the Dog-house-bar, in Old-street, by the name of the City-road, which is undoubtedly the finest about London. It was made in consequence of an act of parliament passed in the first year of his present majesty king George III. in which it was enacted, "that a new road should be opened from the north east side of Goswell-street-road, next Islington, and near to the road called the New-road, over and along part of a meadow-ground late belonging to Mrs. Mary Walker, cross the New-river, and then over and along the other part of the said meadow, and over and along divers other meadows, &c. to Old-street road, opposite to the Doghouse-bar; and also that the trustees for putting the said act in execution should be impowered to open, repair, widen, and keep in repair, the present road, at and from the Doghouse-bar, over and along certain grounds belonging to the reverend doctor Christopher Wilson, one of the prebendaries of the cathedral church of St. Paul, London, lord of the manor of Finsbury, in right of his prebend, and to the mayor, aldermen, and commons, of the city of London, as lessees thereof; and to Bibye Lake, esq; under a lease from the said city; and to John Witton, tenant of the said Bibye Lake; and from thence to the end of Chiswell-street, by the Artillery-ground."

And it was further enacted, "that the new part of the said road shall be forty-feet wide at the least: and that part of the road leading at and from the Doghouse-bar, to the end of Chiswell-street by the Artillery-ground, shall not exceed 50 feet in width. That the said trustees shall and may erect gates or turnpikes across or on the sides of any part or parts of the said road, and also a toll-house or toll-houses, in or upon, or adjoining to, the same: and the following tolls shall be demanded and taken; that is to say,

For every horse, mare, gelding, mule, or ass, drawing or not drawing, one penny.

For every drove of oxen, or neat cattle, five-pence per score; and so in proportion for any greater or lesser number.

For every drove of calves, hogs, sheep, or lambs, two-pence half-penny per score; and so in proportion for any greater or lesser number.

With a penalty of twenty-shillings to suffer any person to pass with a horse, carriage, &c. through a private way.

That none of the said tolls shall be taken at any of the gates or turnpikes for any horse, &c. drawing any waggon or other carriage, which shall be used and employed in the carriage of any materials for repairing the said road, or in the carriage of any lime, chalk, dung, mould, soil, or compost, of any nature or kind whatsoever, for manuring of any garden or other land or ground; or in the carriage of any hay, straw, or corn in the straw, not sold or disposed of, but to be laid up in barns, &c. of the owners thereof; or for any implements of, or employed in, husbandry, or for manuring of land in the several parishes in which the said road, hereby intended to be made and repaired, does lie; or for any horse, or other cattle, going to, or returning from, pasture or water; or for any post-horse, or vehicle carrying the mail or public packet; or for horses, carts, or waggons, travelling with vagrants sent by passes. Nor of any person going to, or returning from, any election of a knight or knights of the shire to serve in parliament for the county of Middlesex, on the day or days of such election.

Provided always, that no person shall be liable to pay toll more than once the same day, to be computed from twelve o'clock at night, to twelve o'clock in the succeeding night, with the same horse or other cattle, and shall produce a note or ticket that the toll was paid at any of the said gates or turnpikes.

But whereas several waggons, carts, drays, or other carriages, may probably pass the said road many times in the same day, and it is but reasonable that the horses, or other cattle, drawing such carriages, laden, and so passing as aforesaid, should pay more than once in the same day; it was farther enacted and provided, that all horses or other cattle, drawing such waggons, carts, drays, or other carriages, that shall pass through any gate or turnpike to be erected by virtue of this act, laden as aforesaid, more than twice in the same day, shall, at the third time, pay the several and respective tolls directed to be paid at the first time for passing through any of the said gates or turnpikes."

It was further enacted, "that no part of the lands to be purchased by the authority of this act, and made use of for making or widening any part of the said road, shall be made use of for the erecting of any buildings whatsoever, other than of such toll-houses and watch-houses as may be erected by order of the said trustees; and that no building shall be erected on any new foundation, tion, by any proprietors or occupiers of lands, adjacent to the new intended part of the said road, betwixt the Fountain at Peerless Pool, and that end of Goswell-street road, near Islington, within forty feet of the same; and that no part of the said road shall be paved.

And if any such buildings, within forty feet as aforesaid, shall be hereafter erected, or any part of such road shall be paved, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, the same shall be deemed a common nuisance.

And further, that no gate or turnpike shall be erected, or any toll taken or received, on either side of the Old-street road, where the said new road opens into the same, by virtue or in pursuance of any powers granted to the trustees of the Old-street road, by any act or acts of parliament made for repairing the same; unless it shall appear, by certificate under the hands of seven of the said trustees, and verified by the oath of their treasurer, to be made before one or more justice or justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex, that the tolls of the said Old-street trust, collected at the gates as they now stand, are diminished above 120l. a year, since the making of the said new road, such diminution to be computed from the monies collected on the said Old-street road, from the first day of January to the thirty-first day of December 1760, both inclusive.

And further, that no gate or turnpike shall be erected, or any toll taken or received, where the said new road opens into that part of Goswell-street road, next Islington, or within sixty yards thereof, by virtue or in pursuance of any powers granted to the trustees of the Islington turnpike.

That the said trustees shall have full power to cause lamps to be erected upon the said road, and to appoint a number of fit and able bodied men to watch and guard the said road in the night-time. And that the expences of erecting, lighting and maintaining such lamps, and the allowances to be made to such watchmen, and all other charges incident to the said respective services, shall be paid and defrayed out of the money to be raised by virtue of this act."

And it was further enacted, "that if any person shall hale or draw, in, upon, and along, any part of the said road, any tree or trees, piece or pieces of timber, or any stone or stones, (mill stones excepted) otherwise than on wheel carriages, every such person for every such offence shall forfeit the sum of forty shillings."

A Treaty of marriage having been concluded between his majesty king George III. and her most serene highness the princess Charlotta of Mecklenbourg, the same was completed on the eighteenth of September, 1761. At nine in the evening, her highness, preceded by 120 ladies in extreme rich dresses, was handed to the chapel royal by the duke of York, attended by six dukes daughters as her bride maids, and her train supported by the daughters of six earls, where the nuptials were solemnized by his grace the archbishop of Canterbury, in the presence of the royal family and the principal part of the nobility.

And on the fourteenth the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council waited on their majesties with the following congratulatory addresses on the above joyous occasion.

To the king's most excellent majesty.

The humble address of the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled.

"Be pleased, most gracious sovereign, to accept the cordial and respectful congratulations of your majesty's ever dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, on the solemnization of your majesty's most auspicious nuptials.

"Warmly interested from every motive of gratitude as well as duty in whatever can affect your royal mind, we enjoy the highest satisfaction in the completion of our wishes, by your majesties happy union with a princess of the most exalted merit; a princess, who, by her descent from an illustrious lineage (respectable for their firm and constant zeal for the protestant religion, and dear to us for their particular attachment to your majesty's royal house) and above all, by her own most eminent virtues, and amiable endowments, was most worthy to engage your majesty's esteem and affection, and to share the honours of the British crown.

"We adore the divine goodness, that, as in all your majesty's other conduct, so more particularly

" particularly in a choice of the highest importance
 " to your majesty and to your kingdoms, hath
 " so visibly guided and inspired your royal breast.
 " A choice, which we thankfully acknowledge " the strongest and most acceptable proof of " your majesty's paternal attention to improve " the happiness and security of your people, and
 " to render the same stable and permanent to " posterity.

" May the same providence long preserve your " majesty, and your royal consort, to enjoy the " fruits of this blessed marriage, in an uninter" rupted course of conjugal felicity, and in a " numerous offspring, resembling their illustrious " parents in every public, as well as private " virtue. And may the imperial crown of these " realms be worn with undiminished lustre by
 " their descendants, till time shall be no more."

The following is his majesty's most gracious answer:

" I thank you most heartily for your dutiful and " affectionate address. This fresh mark of your " attachment to my person, and particularly the " warm sentiments of joy and satisfaction which " you express on the happy choice I have made
 " of a queen for a consort, are most pleasing to " me. The city of London may always depend " on my unceasing care for their welfare and " prosperity."

The humble address of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, &c. to her majesty.

" Most gracious queen,

" We, his majesty's ever dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, of the city of London, in common-council assembled, humbly beg leave to express, in your royal presence, the exceeding great joy we feel at your majesty's safe arrival, so ardently wished for, and so impatiently expected; and at the same time to congratulate your majesty's most happy nuptials with a monarch, whose early wisdom, fortitude, and piety, add lustre to the diadem he wears, and render him the darling, as well as father, of his people.

" We do, with that honest warmth and sincerity which characterize the British nation, humbly assure your majesty, that as the many virtues and amiable endowments, which your majesty possesses in so eminent a degree, cannot fail to bless our beloved sovereign with every domestic happiness; so will they ever endear your majesty to a people, not more distinguished for their love of liberty, and their country, than for their inviolable loyalty and gratitude to those princes, from whom they derive protection and prosperity.

" Long may your majesty live to share the felicity you are formed to inspire. And may your majesty prove the happy mother of a race of princes, to transmit the glories of this distinguished reign to the latest of our posterity."

Her majesty's most gracious answer.

" I thank you for your kind congratulations
 " so full of duty to the king, and affection to " me. My warmest wishes will ever attend this " great city."

Addresses on the same occasion were presented by the universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

On the twenty-second his majesty's coronation was performed in the abbey-church at Westminster, with the usual solemnities. Their majesties and the princess dowager went in the morning through the park from St. James's in chairs, and their attendants in coaches, to Westminster-hall, from thence they walked about twelve o'clock in grand procession to the abbey. After the ceremony, which lasted six hours, they returned to the hall, where they dined most magnificently, in the presence of numberless spectators richly dressed. All the way of the procession was lined with crowded scaffolds, and the abbey also was as full and splendid as possible. On the queen's entrance into the hall, three thousand wax tapers were all lighted in less than five minutes. The royal standard was hoisted at the Tower, the ships in the river displayed their flags, the streets were universally illuminated, and there was an entire stagnation of all sorts of business.

A little before the procession began, proceeded that of her royal highness the princess dowager of Wales, from the house of lords, across Old Palace-yard, on a platform erected for that purpose, to the south-cross of Westminster-abbey. She was led by the hand by his royal highness prince William Henry, dressed in white and silver. Her train, which was of silk, was but short, and her hair flowed down her shoulders in hanging curls.

The rest of the princes and princesses, her highnesses's children, followed in this order:

His royal highness prince Henry-Frederick, also in white and silver, handing his sister the princess Louisa-Anne, dressed in a slip with hanging sleeves. Then

His royal highness prince Frederick-William, in the same dress, handing his youngest sister the princess Caroline-Matilda, dressed also in a slip with hanging sleeves.

The other persons who made up the remainder of this procession were those who had not a right to walk with their majesties.

The procession was closed by the three Mahometan ambassadors, in the proper dresses of their country, having their turbans of fine muslin on their heads, and long gowns of flowered and laced silk; their sabres were crimson, and in each of them were enclosed a dagger and a poniard.

The great diamond in his majesty's crown fell out in returning from the abbey to Westminster-hall, but was immediately found and restored.

On the twenty-eighth alderman Nash and alderman Cartwright were sworn in at Guildhall sheriffs of London and Middlesex. And the next day Sir Samuel Fludyer, bart. was chose Lord-mayor of London for the year ensuing.

The nation being greatly discontented at the measure, measures of the court, and more particularly at the resignation of the right honourable Mr. Pitt, whose conduct in administration they highly esteemed, the court of common-council, on the twenty-second of October, made a motion to instruct their members, or to represent to them the then critical conjuncture; which motion being unanimously agreed to, the same was presented as follows:

The representation of the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, to Sir Robert Lubboke knt. Sir Richard Glynn, knt. and bart. William Beckford, esq; and the hon. Thomas Harley, esq; this city's representatives in parliament.

" We, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, think it at this time our duty, as it is our natural and undoubted right, to lay before you, this city's representatives in the great council of the nation, soon to be assembled in parliament, what we desire and expect from you, in discharge of the great trust and confidence we and our fellow-subjects have reposed in you.

" That you take the earliest opportunity to use your utmost endeavours to obtain the repeal or amendment of the late act, intituled, An act for the relief of insolvent debtors; in respect to the inconveniences arising from the compulsive clause, by which a door has been opened to the greatest frauds and perjuries; and, if continued, must become the destruction of all private credit, so essential to the support of a trading people.

" That you concur in and promote all necessary measures for establishing good oeconomy in the distribution of the national treasure; and for that purpose that you endeavour to have a committee appointed, in order to enquire into any abuses which may have arisen in the application of it, and to prevent any frauds or illicit practices in the management thereof.

" That you entertain just sentiments of the importance of the conquests made this war by the British arms, at the expence of so much blood and treasure; and that you will, to the utmost of your power and abilities, oppose all attempts for giving up such places as may tend to lessen our present security, or, by restoring the naval power of France, render us subject to fresh hostilities from that natural enemy; particularly that the sole and exclusive right of our acquisitions in North America, and the fisheries, be preserved to us.

" As the present happy extinction of parties, the harmony and unanimity of all his majesty's subjects, their zeal and affection to their native king, and the great increase of commerce are most convincing proofs to us of this nation's ability still to carry on, and vigorously prosecute, the just and necessary war—it is our desire that you concur in giving his majesty such supplies, as shall enable him to pursue all those measures which may promote the true interest of his kingdoms, and place him above the menaces of any power that may pretend to give laws, or prescribe limits, to the policy and interests of this nation. But, as it is apparent that our enemies flatter themselves with the hopes of exhausting our strength by the immense expence in which we are at present engaged, we therefore require you, in the further prosecution of this war, to support such measures as may frustrate those expectations: yet to act with the utmost vigour in the reduction of their remaining colonies, so as to obtain a safe and honourable peace."

At the same time another motion was made, that the thanks of the court be given to the right hon. Mr. Pitt, for the many and important services rendered to his king and country. And a third, that the committee in their thanks to Mr. Pitt, do lament his resignation, &c. These motions being unanimously agreed to, the town-clerk presented their resolutions to Mr. Pitt, who was pleased to return the following answer:

" Mr. Pitt requests of Sir James Hodges, that he will be so good to represent him, in the most respectful manner, to the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, and express his high sense of the signal honour they have been pleased to confer on him, by their condescending and favourable resolution of the twenty-second of October; an honour which he receives with true reverence and gratitude, not without confusion at his own small deservings, while he views with exultation the universal public spirit dispersed through an united people; and the matchless intrepidity of the British sailors and soldiers, conducted by officers, justly famed through all the quarters of the world: To this concurrence of national virtue, graciously protected by the throne, all the national prosperities (under the favour of heaven) have been owing; and it will ever be remembered to the glory of the city of London, that through the whole course of this arduous war, the great seat of commerce has generously set the illustrious example of steady zeal for the dignity of the crown, and of unshaken firmness and magnanimity."

Sir Samuel Fludyer, the Lord-mayor elect, having invited their majesties to dine at Guildhall on the approaching Lord-mayor's day, they were graciously pleased to accept of the same. And on the ninth of November, being the day on which the Lord-mayor entered into his office, the ceremonial on the occasion was conducted in the following order:

The aldermen, sheriffs, and other officers, having met at the Mansion-house about ten in the forenoon, Sir Samuel Fludyer, bart. Lord-mayor elect, in the usual manner, and with the usual attendants, proceeded to Westminster, where his lordship was sworn in before the barons of the exchequer.

While that ceremony was performing, their majesties, majesties, with the royal family, honoured the city with their presence. The manner in which this visit was paid was as follows:

His royal highness the duke of Cumberland, in his coach drawn by six horses, preceded and followed by guards.

Her royal highness the princess Amelia, in the same manner.

His royal highness the duke of York, in a new and superb state coach, in the same manner.

Their royal highnesses prince William, prince Henry, and prince Frederick, in one coach, in the same manner.

Their royal highnesses the princess dowager of Wales, the princess Augusta, and the princess Caroline, in one coach, preceded by twelve footmen in black caps, with guards, and a grand retinue.

Their majesties in their state coach, preceded by the earl of Harcourt in his chariot, and the dukes of Rutland and Devonshire in another chariot, the grenadier-guards and the yeomen of the guards, followed by a corps of the horse-guards, passed on to St. Paul's church-yard, at the east end of which the following speech was addressed, with all humility, to the king's most excellent majesty, by the senior scholar of the grammar-school in Christ's-hospital.

" Most august and gracious sovereign,

" From the condescension and goodness, which " your majesty displays towards even the meanest
" of your subjects, we are emboldened to hope " you will accept the tribute of obedience and " duty which we, poor orphans, are permitted to " present you.

" Educated and supported by the munificence
" of a charity, founded, enlarged, and protected
" by your royal predecessors, with the warmest
" gratitude we acknowledge our inexpressible
" obligations to its bounty, and the distinguished " happiness we have hitherto enjoyed under the " constant patronage of former princes. May this " ever be our boast and our glory! Nor can we " think we shall prefer our prayer in vain, whilst " with earnest but humble supplications, we im" plore the patronage and protection of your ma" jesty.

" To our ardent petition for your princely fa" vours, may we presume, dread sovereign, to " add our most respectable congratulations on " your auspicious marriage with your royal con" sort. Strangers to the disquietude, which often " dwells within the circle of a crown, long may " your majesties experience the heart-felt satis" faction of domestic life; in the uninterrupted " possession of every endearment of the most ten" der union, every blessing of conjugal affection,
" every comfort of parental felicity. And may
" a race of princes, your illustrious issue and de" scendants, formed by the example, and inherit-
" ing the virtues of their great and good proge-" niters, continue to sway the British scepter to
" the latest posterity."

As soon as he had finished, the boys in a grand chorus chanted God save the king, Amen. After which, the senior scholar delivered two copies of his speech to the king and queen, who received them most graciously.

From thence they went to the house of Mr. Barclay, opposite to Bow-church, which, on this occasion, was decorated in a very sumptuous manner; the rooms, balcony, &c. being hung with crimson damask; and from this house they saw the procession of the Lord-mayor, &c.

A great number of grand equipages, belonging to the nobility and gentry, the judges, foreign ambassadors, ladies, &c. mingled in the procession of the royal family, by which means it was made extensive and brilliant.

At the close of the procession, earl Temple and the right honourable William Pitt, esq; coming in one chariot, were honoured with the most hearty acclamations of people of all ranks.

The show on the water was very brilliant.

The Lord-mayor, aldermen, &c. returned in the order they went.

The state coach was drawn by six beautiful iron grey horses, richly caparisoned and adorned with ribbons; and all the companies made a grand appearance.

The armourers and braziers, the skinner and the fishmongers companies, particularly distinguished themselves on this occasion. The former were marked by an archer riding erect in his car, having his bow in his left hand, and his quiver and arrows hanging behind his left shoulder; and a man in complete armour. The skinner were distinguished by seven of their company being dressed in fur, having their skins painted in the form of Indian princes. The fishmongers pageants consisted of a statue of St. Peter finely gilt, a dolphin, two mermaids, and two sea-horses, which had a very pleasing effect.

The procession being ended, the royal family were conducted by the sheriffs to Guildhall, at the entrance of which they were received by the Lord-mayor, who, kneeling, presented the city sword to the king, which being returned, it was carried before his majesty by his lordship to the council-chamber, where the compliments of the city were made, and where his majesty conferred the honour of knighthood on Nathaniel Nash and John Cartwright, esqrs. the two sheriffs, and on Thomas Fludger, esq; brother to the Lord-mayor. From thence, in like manner, the royal family proceeded to the hustings, where a most magnificent and sumptuous entertainment was provided. Their majesties were attended, as they passed from St. James's to the city, with the loudest acclamations of joy. Scaffoldings were built at many of the houses in the city, and the concourse of people who were assembled was almost incredible. Four regiments of the London militia lined the streets from Temple-bar to Ludgate, and were of singular service in preventing the greatest multitude that perhaps was ever beheld from incommoding the walk of the liverymen in the return of the Lord-mayor's procession.

The entertainment was elegant, sumptuous, and well conducted. His majesty and all the royal family expressed their entire approbation of it; and the nobility and foreign ministers acknowledged it was beyond any thing they had ever seen.

In

In the evening, the ball was opened by his royal highness the duke of York and the lady-mayors; and minuets were danced by some others of the royal family, the nobility, &c. till one o'clock.

Their majesties returned to St. James's about one o'clock, and the rest of the royal family followed them as fast as their coaches could be brought up; the Lord-mayor, with the sword of state carried before him, the sheriffs, and gentlemen of the committee, conducting them to the hall-gate.

Mr. Pitt, at his departure, was saluted with the acclamations of the people, which continued to surround his chariot all the way to his house. The rest of the company did not separate till after three, and the whole was concluded with the utmost regularity and decorum.

The streets through which their majesties passed in their return to St. James's, were illuminated in the most brilliant manner; but an accident had like to have happened by the breaking of the glasses of their coach, in passing under St. James's gate-way.

At a court of common-council held the 18th of November, a motion was made and agreed to, that his majesty's statue be erected in the Royal Exchange, among those of his predecessors; and that the pictures of his majesty, and his royal consort, be put up in the Guildhall of the city. And another motion was made and agreed to, that fit and able persons be employed to make the said statue, and to draw the said pictures; and that an humble application be made to their majesties that they would be pleased to do the city the honour to sit for their pictures. And a committee being appointed, they, on the twenty-third, waited on their majesties, separately, for that purpose; and at the same time Sir Samuel Fludyer, the Lord-mayor, in obedience to his instructions, took occasion to express the deep and grateful sense which the common-council held of their majesties gracious condescension, in honouring their late entertainment with their royal presence. Their majesties were pleased to receive the committee in a very gracious manner, to express their entire satisfaction at the late entertainment, and to assure the committee that both the pictures should be sent to the city; which was accordingly soon after done, and placed over the hustings in Guildhall. And the statue of his majesty was fixed in a nich by the side of his grandfather in the Royal Exchange, where it now stands.

On the fourth of January 1762, war was declared against Spain in the usual places, and with the accustomed ceremonies.

On the seventh a terrible fire broke out in a granary at St. Saviour's dock, which, in a short time, consumed that, and eight houses, besides greatly damaging several others. And on the twelfth there was a violent storm of wind, attended with rain, which did very considerable damage to the shipping and craft in the river. Some houses, and many chimnies were blown down, by which several lives were lost. The river Thames rose so high, that the gardens at Millbank, Westminster, were laid under water.

About this time the town was greatly alarmed by the imposture of the Cock-lane ghost, which was managed by a girl about twelve years old (under the direction of her parents) so artfully, that it drew in several clergymen and other people of sense and reputation, to believe, and to countenance the deception. The particulars of this mysterious affair were as follow.

On the thirteenth of February, between the hours of eleven and twelve at night, a gentleman was sent for to the house of one Parsons, officiating parish-clerk of St. Sepulchre's, in Cock-lane, near West-Smithfield, to be witness to the noises, and other extraordinary circumstances, attending the supposed presence of a spirit, that for two years past had been heard in the night, to the great terror of the family. To throw some light on this strange affair, we shall begin with a narrative published at that time, the substance of which was as follows:

That in 1759, one Mr. K— employed an agent to carry a letter to a young gentlewoman of a reputable family in Norfolk, and to bring her up to London in a post chaise, if she should be willing willing to come: that she did come; but Mr. K— being at Greenwich, she followed him there directly, and was received by him, after a journey of one hundred miles performed in one day, with much tenderness. After some short stay at Greenwich, where it was thought necessary that she should make a will in his favour, she was removed to a lodging near the Mansion-house; from thence to lodgings behind St. Sepulchre's-church; and, lastly, to a house in Bartlet-court, in the parish of Clerkenwell: here, in 1760, she was taken ill of the small-pox, and, on or before the 31st of January, her sister who lived reputably in Pall-Mall, was first made acquainted with her illness and place of residence, and, being overjoyed to hear of her, went immediately to see her, and found her in a fair way of doing well: next day she sent to her, and received a favourable account of her; but, on the morning following, word was brought that her sister was dead. She died on February the second 1760, and was buried, in two or three days after, at the church of St. John, Clerkenwell, her sister attending the funeral, who was surprised at not seeing a plate on the coffin, and expressed that surprize to Mr. Brown after the funeral was over; lamenting, at the same time that she had not been permitted to see her sister's corpse, the coffin being screwed down before she came. She added, that K— had married one of her sisters, and had ruined the other, who was buried by the name of —, as appears by the parish register. By the will already mentioned K— availed himself of her fortune, to the prejudice of her brother and sisters, who all lived in perfect harmony till this unhappy affair happened. Such is the account given by Mr. Brown, of Amen corner. A worthy clergyman, however, who attended her several times, and who administered to her the last comforts of his function, declares, that the small-pox, with which she was seized, was of the confluent sort, and that the gentlemen of the faculty, who attended her, had pronounced her irrecoverable some days before her death.

It was, however, the ghost of this person that Parsons declared had taken possession of his girl, a child about twelve years old, who lay with the deceased in the absence of her supposed husband when he was in the country at a wedding about two years ago, and then it was that the knocking was first heard, to the great terror of this child; she frequently crying out that she might not be taken away. Soon after this woman died, whose apparition was now supposed to appear to this same child; and, in answer to the question put to her one night, what was the occasion of the first knocking, &c. before she died? answered that it was the spirit of her sister, the first wife of Mr. K—, who was husband to them both.

Having now sufficiently prepared the reader, we shall proceed in our narrative. The gentleman, already said to have been sent for, attended, and found the child in bed, and the spirit being at hand, several questions were put to it by the father, as shall be related hereafter. The gentleman, not caring to pronounce too hastily upon what appeared to him extraordinary, got some friends together, among whom were two or three clergymen, about twenty other persons, and two negroes, and sat up another night.

They first thoroughly examined the bed, bed-cloaths, &c. and, being satisfied there was no visible appearance of a deceit, the child, with its sister, was put into bed, which was found to shake extremely by the gentleman who had placed himself at the foot of it.

Among others, the following questions were asked: Whether her disturbance was occasioned by any ill treatment from Mr. K—? Yes.—Whether she was brought to an untimely end by poison? Yes.—In what was the poison administered, in beer or purl? Purl.—How long before her death? Three hours?—Is the person called Carrots able to give information about the poison? Yes.—Whether she was K—'s wife's sister? Yes.—Whether she was married to K—? No.—Whether any other person than K— were concerned in the poisoning? No.—Whether she could visibly appear to any one? Yes.—Whether she would do so? Yes.—Whether she could go out of that house? Yes.—Whether she would follow the child every where? Yes.—Whether she was pleased in being asked questions? Yes.—Whether it eased her mind? Yes.—[Here a mysterious noise, compared to the fluttering of wings round the room, was heard]—How long before her death had she told Carrots (her servant) that she was poisoned? One hour.—Here Carrots, who was admitted to be one of the company that night, asserted that the deceased had not told her so, she being at that time speechless.—How long did Carrots live with her? Three or four days.—[Carrots attested the truth of this.]—Whether if the accused should be taken up he would confess? Yes.—Whether she should be at ease in her mind if the man was hanged? Yes.—How long would it be before he would be executed? Three years.—How many clergymen were in the room? Three.—How many negroes? Two.—Whether she could distinguish the person of any one in the room? Yes.—Whether the colour of a watch held up by one of the clergy, was white, yellow, blue, or black? Answered black.—[The watch was in a black shagreen case]—At what time she would depart in the morning? At four o'clock. Accordingly at this hour the noise removed to the Wheatsheaf, a public house, at the distance of a few doors, in the bed-chamber of my landlord and landlady, to the great affright and terror of them both. Such is the manner of interrogating the spirit; the answer is given by knocking or scratching. An affirmative was one knock; a negative, two. Displeasure was expressed by scratching.

On the night of the first of February many gentlemen, eminent for their rank and character, were, by the invitation of the reverend Mr. Aldrich of Clerkenwell, assembled at his house, for the examination of the noises supposed to be made by a departed spirit for the detection of some enormous crime.

About ten at night the gentlemen met in the chamber in which the girl, supposed to be disturbed by a spirit, had, with proper caution, been put to bed by several ladies. They sat rather more than an hour, and, hearing nothing, went down stairs, when they interrogated the father of the girl, who denied, in the strongest terms, any knowledge or belief of fraud.

The supposed spirit had before publicly promised, by an affirmative knock, that it would attend one of the gentlemen into the vault under the church of St. John, Clerkenwell, where the body was deposited, and give a token of her presence there by a knock upon her coffin: it was therefore determined to make this trial of the existence or veracity of the supposed spirit.

While they were enquiring and deliberating, they were summoned into the girl's chamber by some ladies, who were near her bed, and who had heard knocks and scratches. When the gentlemen entered, the girl declared that she felt the spirit like a mouse upon her back, and was required to hold her hands out of bed. From that time, though the spirit was very solemnly required to manifest its existence, by appearance, by impression on the hand or body of any present, by scratches, knocks, or any other agency, no evidence of any preternatural power was exhibited.

The spirit was then very seriously advertized, that the person to whom the promise was made, of striking the coffin, was then about to visit the vault, and that the performance of the promise was then claimed. The company, at one o'clock, went into the church, and the gentleman, to whom the promise was made, went, with one more, into the vault. The spirit was solemnly required to perform its promise; but nothing more than silence ensued: the person supposed to be accused by the spirit then went down, with several others; but no effect was perceived. Upon their return they examined the girl, but could draw no confession from her. Between two and three she desired, and was permitted, to go home with her father.

It was therefore the opinion of the whole assembly, that the child had some art of making or counterfeiting particular noises, and that there was no agency of any higher cause.

This mysterious affair, however, was afterwards discovered to be no more than a wicked contrivance to be revenged on Mr. K—, for suing for a small sum of money he had lent, and could not otherwise recover, from one of the parties concerned. Mr. K— being sufficiently supported by evidence of the premises, indicted William Parsons and Elizabeth his wife, the parents of the girl that acted the chief part in this affair, and also the reverend Mr. Moor, and a reputable tradesman, for a conspiracy, in the affair of the Cock-lane ghost, to injure his character: and their trials came on before lord chief justice Mansfield in the court of King's-bench at Guildhall, by a special jury, on the tenth and twelfth of July, when, after a trial of twelve hours, the conspirators were found guilty, and punished. The clergyman and another were brought to the bar and severely reprimanded, and, having compromised the affair with the prosecutor, for a sum of money, they were dismissed. Parsons was pilloried three times in one month, and imprisoned two years; his wife was imprisoned one year: and Mary Frazier sent to Bridewell for six months.

On the ninth of February, the banks of the Thames were so overflowed that many full casks and other merchandize were swept away from the keys and wharfs, and the prison-yard of the borough compter was some inches under water. And on the tenth of March the tide rose so high, that it flowed into Westminster-hall as far as the stairs leading up to the house of commons.

The great success of his majesty's operations by sea being farther crowned in the conquest of Martinico (the most considerable of the French sugar-islands) the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, on the seventh of April, waited on his majesty with the following congratulatory address on the occasion:

To the king's most excellent majesty.

The humble address of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, of the city of London, on the conquest of the island of Martinico, presented April 7.

" May it please your majesty,

" Graciously to accept the humble congratulations of your ever dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, of your city of London, in common-council assembled, upon the glorious and important conquest of the strong, fertile, and opulent island of Martinico, and the consequential surrender of the island of St. Lucia; acquisitions doubly valuable, as they considerably diminish the naval and commercial strength of France, and proportionably extend and secure the commerce and navigation of Great Britain and her colonies.

" The amazing rapidity of this conquest reflects a lustre upon our former triumphs, as well as the highest honour upon the royal wisdom that planned and directed, the skill, unanimity, and activity, that conducted, and the heroic valour of the fleet and army that effected it with so little loss, and leaves your majesty at full liberty to turn your victorious arms to other places, where the enemies of your majesty and your kingdoms are no less vulnerable, and will most sensibly feel the necessity of dissolving their late dangerous compact, and of submitting to terms of peace adequate to our successes, and the expences of this just and necessary war; your majesty, undazzled by the splendor of repeated victories, having no other view than to vindicate the honour of your crown, and to establish and secure the just rights and possessions of your subjects.

" In so laudable a pursuit, so becoming the father of his people, your majesty may firmly rely on the strongest and most chearful efforts of the grateful citizens of London, united in duty and affection to your majesty's sacred person and government, and in zeal for the glory and prosperity of their country."

To which address his majesty was pleased to return the following most gracious answer:

" I

" I thank you for your loyal and affectionate
 " congratulations upon our late important suc" cess. Too much praise cannot be given to the " bravery and conduct of my fleet and army.
 " You say truly that I am not dazzled by the " splendor of repeated victories: the permanent " prosperity of my people, as a free and com" mercial nation, has always been the object of " my ambition: what conduces most to that end,
 " I shall ever count my greatest glory."

The city of London having laboured under great inconveniences for want of a proper supply of wholesome fish at a moderate price, an act of parliament was passed this sessions for better supplying the cities of London and Westminster with fish, to reduce the exorbitant price thereof, and to encourage and protect fishermen. The particulars of which act were as follow:

That any person, though no fishmonger, may buy, at any market, sea-coast, or river, &c. any fish in season, and sizeable, paying the accustomed dues at the place of purchase, and may sell the same again in any fish or flesh market, paying the usual market dues, Covent-garden market and the precincts thereof excepted.

Such fish shall not be resold by the first purchaser, before the same shall be brought to London or Westminster, or to where consigned, under penalty of twenty pounds, and shall be conveyed to the places consigned, without being liable to be stopped, and exposed to sale on the way.

Carriages employed in this service shall carry fish only, and shall be marked on the outside, Fish Machine Only; and shall be entered at the office for licensing hackney-coaches, paying one shilling for the registering: and numbered, on penalty of forty shillings, and shall not be liable to be deemed common stage-waggons, &c.

They shall be permitted to travel with four horses in pairs, or with one horse, or three horses in length, though with narrow wheels, and shall pay the like toll as post-chaifes, &c. drawn by a like number of horses; and shall be allowed to travel on Sundays and holidays; as shall also the returned horses of such carriages; and neither carriage nor horses, if returning empty, shall be liable to pay toll; and if any game, or other thing besides fish, and the necessary implements of the carriage, be put therein for conveyance, the person putting in the same shall forfeit five pounds, and if the driver shall take up, or suffer any passenger, game, or other thing, to be carried therein, he shall forfeit forty shillings, and on non-payment shall be committed and kept to hard labour for any time not exceeding one month.

If bulk shall be broke of any fish carriage consigned for the London markets, &c. before being brought within the bills of mortality, or sale made of the fish before they are exposed in the said markets, the offender forfeits ten pounds.

The fish, after being so brought up, shall be forthwith sorted, and exposed to sale in some public market the next morning, Sundays excepted; and until such fish is so exposed, no part thereof shall be sold by retail, on penalty of ten pounds, but mackarel brought up by such carriages, may be sold on Sundays.

All contracts made for fish, except for salmon and lobsters, are vacated after May 1, 1762, and the parties discharged from the penalties of their contracts; and persons contracting after the said time for buying up fish, other than salmon and lobsters, before the same shall be first brought to market, and duly exposed to sale there, shall forfeit fifty pounds, and the contract is declared void.

And after May 1, 1762, no contract for British salmon and lobsters shall be in force longer than one year; and the like shall take place with respect to any parole contracts.

After May 1, 1762, no person shall employ, or be employed, in buying at the markets of London and Westminster, &c. any fish brought thither for sale, to be afterwards divided among fishmongers, or others, to be sold; nor shall any person buy, in the said markets, any fish but what shall be for his own sale or use, on penalty of twenty pounds.

No salesman or other person shall refuse to sell, or enter into an agreement not to sell, to or for any particular person's use, any fish exposed to sale, at a public market, on penalty of twenty pounds.

And all fish of the respective sorts hereafter specified, brought after May 1, 1762, for sale to the London markets, shall be openly sold at the first hand, and in no greater number or quantity in a lot than is hereafter prescribed; and and every lot shall consist of one sort of fish only, viz.

All fresh salmon, sturgeon, large fresh cod, skait, turbot, bret, brill, pearl, kingston, ling, and dorys, by the single fish: all half fresh cod, not exceeding two in any one lot: all quarter fresh cod, not exceeding four in any one lot: all mullets, cole-fish, salmon-trout, and other trouts, not exceeding two in any one lot; all small cod, not exceeding twenty-four in any one lot, in Billingsgate market, or within 150 yards of Billingsgate dock; and in any other market within the weekly bills of mortality, not exceeding eight in any one lot.

Small pike, Billingsgate, six in a lot; other markets four.

Large haddock, Billingsgate, four; other markets two.

Small haddock, Billingsgate, twenty-four; other markets eight.

Carp, gurnet, tench, and sea bass, Billingsgate, six; other markets four.

Thornbacks, Billingsgate, two; other markets one.

Large soals, Billingsgate, four pair; other markets two pair.

Small soals, Billingsgate, eight pair; other markets four pair.

Mackarel, whittings, whiting-pouts, plaice, dabbs, herrings, pilchards, garb-fish, flounders, and maids, Billingsgate, sixty; other markets thirty.

Smelts, Billingsgate, fifty-two; other markets twenty-six.

Eels,

Eels, Billingsgate, twenty pounds; other markets ten pounds, unless any single fish shall exceed that weight.

Large lobsters and crabs, Billingsgate, twenty; other markets, ten.

Small lobsters and crabs, Billingsgate, 40; other markets ten.

None of the said several species of fish shall be bought or sold at the first hand, in the said markets, in a greater number or quantity in a lot than is prescribed above, nor more than one sort of fish in a lot shall be sold, or offered for sale, on penalty of five pounds.

But a smaller number of any of the said fish than a lot consists of, if it contains more than one; and also a lesser weight of eels than makes one lot, may be sold or exposed to sale in the said markets.

No fish shall be sold again, or exposed to sale the same day, in the same market where it was before sold, on penalty of ten pounds, but the buyer may sell the same, whilst sound and wholesome, in any other place.

Before any fish, to be sold at the first hand in any of the said markets, be exposed to sale, an account of the sorts, and quantity of each, in large legible characters, shall be put up at the fish-stand (the number of flounders, plaice, dabbs, excepted; and also of mackarel, maids, herrings, and pilchards;) and if any other fish of the sorts mentioned in the act be brought for sale, before the market of the day is over, they shall likewise be added to the account, before they are exposed to sale; and the said accounts shall be kept up, undefaced, till all the fish be sold, or the market be over, on penalty of five pounds. Or if any person, before such time, shall wilfully take down, deface or alter, the accounts so put up, or cause the same to be done, he shall forfeit forty shillings.

No fisherman, &c. after the arrival of his vessel from fishing, shall destroy, or cast away, any of the fish, not being unwholesome, perished, or unmarketable, remaining unsold after market is over, on penalty of being committed and kept to hard labour for any time not exceeding two months, nor less than one week.

The provisions in this act touching the sale or buying of fish within the bills of mortality, and penalties for non-observance thereof, shall extend to the parish of St. Mary-le-bone in Middlesex.

The prohibitory clauses in this act against contracts shall not extend to those made, or to be made, with regard to salt or dried fish, oysters, carp, or tench.

No information shall be received by a justice against any person for being concerned in any contract for buying up fish to be sold again contrary to this act; but the penalty for entering into such contract, shall be recoverable only, with double costs, in one of the courts of Westminster; one moiety to go to Greenwich hospital, and the other to the prosecutor.

The queen being happily delivered of a prince on the twelfth of August, the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, waited on his majesty, on the fourteenth, with their compliments of congratulation, in the following address:

“ Most gracious Sovereign,

“ We, your majesty’s ever dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of your city of London, in common-council assembled, humbly beg leave to embrace this earliest opportunity of congratulating your majesty upon the safe and happy delivery of the queen, and the auspicious birth of a prince.

“ So important an event, and upon a day ever sacred to the liberty of these kingdoms, fills us with the most grateful sentiments of the divine goodness, that has thus early crowned your majesty’s domestic happiness, and opened to your people the agreeable prospect of permanence and stability to the blessings they derive from the wisdom and steadiness of your majesty’s victorious reign.

“ May the same gracious providence soon restore your majesty’s most amiable and beloved consort, and give perfect health and length of days to the royal infant.

“ Long, very long, may your majesty live, the guardian and protector, the ornament and delight of Great-Britain; and, by your instructions and example, form the mind of your royal son, to the government of a free, brave, and generous people: and, in the fulness of time, may that son succeed to the virtues as well as to the throne of his royal father; and preserve, for a long succession of years, the glory, happiness, and prosperity of his country.”

To which address his majesty was pleased to return the following most gracious answer:

“ I receive with the greatest pleasure, these very affectionate expressions of your duty and attachment to me and to my family; and thank you for your congratulations upon an event so interesting to me, and to the future welfare of my people, with which my own happiness, upon this and every other occasion, is inseparably connected. The city of London may always depend upon my constant favour and protection.”

Soon after her majesty’s delivery, the waggons with the treasure of the Hermione (a Spanish register ship taken by the English, and whose cargo consisted of near twelve millions of money) entered St. James’s-Street; on which his majesty and the nobility went to the windows over the palace-gate to see them, and joined their acclamations on two such joyful occasions: from whence the procession proceeded to the Tower in the following order.

A company of light-horse attended with kettle drums, French horns, trumpets, and hautboys.

A covered waggon decorated with an English jack, and a Spanish flag underneath, having behind the waggon.

Two more covered waggons.

Seven

Seven waggons uncovered.

One covered waggon, decorated with an English jack, and a Spanish flag underneath.

Another covered waggon, decorated with an English pendant, and a Spanish one underneath.

Several waggons uncovered.

And lastly, a covered waggon, decorated with an English jack, and a Spanish flag.

In the whole twenty waggons.

The procession was concluded with an officer on horseback, carrying an English ensign, attended by another holding a drawn cutlass.

The escort to each waggon consisted of four marines, with their bayonets fixed. And the whole cavalcade was saluted by the populace with the greatest acclamations of joy.

About ten o'clock at night on the twenty-fourth, a most dreadful storm of thunder and lightning began at London, which greatly alarmed the inhabitants: about eleven it was accompanied by a heavy rain, which, with some intermission, continued till near four the next morning. The flashes of lightning were particularly pale and very frequent. At times there were six or seven of them successively, almost without intermission. They cast such a light, that objects in the adjacent parts of this metropolis were plainly distinguished two and three miles distance.

Negotiations of peace with France being absolutely determined on by the court, and ministers appointed on the part of each nation to transact the affairs in debate at London and Paris, the French king nominated the duke de Nivernois to reside at London for that purpose, and the court of London appointed his grace the duke of Bedford to go to Paris to treat of peace, of which resolution the ministry thought proper to inform the Lord-mayor of London by the following special letter, dated the thirtieth of August:

" To the right hon. the Lord-mayor.

" My Lord,

" I have the earl of Egremont's directions to acquaint your lordship, that, in consequence of his most christian majesty's nomination of the duke de Nivernois to come here to treat of a peace, the king has been pleased to name the duke of Bedford to go to Paris for the same purpose; and his grace's appointment will be declared on Wednesday next the first of September. My lord Egremont thinks it may be of use to make this public in the city as soon as possible.

" I am with the greatest respect,

" My Lord, your lordship's most obedient " humble Servant, R. Wood."

About two o'clock in the morning on the eighth of September, a fire broke out at the back of a stair-case in the press-yard, Newgate, which in a few hours consumed all the apartments in that place, greatly damaged the chapel, and the back part of a house belonging to a stocking-trimmer, in Phoenix-court, Newgate-street. There were two unfortunate prisoners in the rooms which were burnt, who perished in the flames: the one was captain Ogle, who had been tried for murder, but being found a lunatic was ordered to remain in prison; the other unhappy person was one Thomas Smith, who had been confined on suspicion of stealing corn, and left a wife and three children; the former of whom, the night preceeding the accident, carried him his whole effects, amounting, in money and bank bills, to between five and six hundred pounds. He was heard to call out for help, and seen to put his arm through the iron grate, which was so excessive hot, that it set his shirt on fire, at which time it was imagined he threw his pocket-book out with the notes in it, which were saved. In a few minutes after the floor fell in, and they were both buried in the ruins; for it burnt so violently, and the flames spread so fast, that none of the people could get to their assistance. The fury of the flames was greatly abated by six, but continued burning till two in the afternoon, when a party wall fell down, but happily did no damage. Though the confusion was so great, not one prisoner escaped, nor were any hurt, except the two unfortunate persons abovementioned.

On the sixteenth another fire broke out at a carpenter's in Great Pultney-street, by Carnaby-market, occasioned by a woman lodger reading in bed, which, in a short time, entirely consumed that house, and greatly damaged two others adjoining. The greatest part of the house was in flames before the lodgers knew of their danger; two of whom, a man and his wife, were burnt in their bed; and several, to escape the flames, threw themselves out of the windows, but received so much hurt, that they were obliged to be carried to the hospital; among the latter a poor woman died as she was carrying there.

On the twenty-ninth of September came on at Guildhall the election of a Lord-mayor for the year ensuing, when alderman Beckford and alderman Bridgen were returned to the court of aldermen; and upon their scrutiny, there were eighteen votes for Mr. Beckford, and one for Mr. Bridgen; in consequence of which the former was declared duly elected. Mr. Beckford, it was imagined, would have fined rather than have served; but the livery having elected him, he was determined, he said, to serve the office to the best of his abilities, let the consequence to himself be what it might.

On the fourth of October, the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of London waited on his majesty with the following address of congratulation on the conquest of the Havannah:

To the king's most excellent majesty.

The humble address of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, of the city of London, in common-council assembled.

" Most gracious sovereign,

" We your majesty's ever dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons “ mons of your city of London, in common-“ council assembled, humbly beg leave to con“ gratulate your majesty upon the late signal “ success with which it hath pleased the Al“ mighty to bless your majesty's arms, in the re“ duction of the Havannah and its dependencies “ (most properly stiled the key of the Spanish

 “ West-Indies, and long deemed impregnable) “ under a capitulation that does honour to the “ spirit and humanity of the British nation.

“ It is with the highest pleasure we reflect “ upon the value and importance of this con“ quest, attended with the acquisition of im“ mense riches, and an irreparable blow to the “ trade and naval power of Spain. A conquest
 “ that gives additional lustre to an already glori“ ous and successful war; and which cannot but “ strike terror into an enemy, not only unpro“ voked, but insensible to the repeated instances “ of your majesty's good-will, friendship, and “ moderation; and convince him, that there is “ no attempt, how arduous soever, but what, “ planned and directed by the wisdom of your “ majesty's councils, may, under the divine pro“ vidence, be effected by the harmony, activity, “ and abilities, of such commanders, and the “ valour, zeal, and emulation of your fleets and “ armies, regardless of any fatigues or dangers, “ wherever the glory of their king and country
 “ is concerned.

“ May the possession of this very valuable “ conquest, together with other happy conse“ quences of your majesty's measures, thus wisely “ and vigorously pursued, prove the means of “ effectually defeating the ambitious views of “ your majesty's enemies, and of for ever dis“ solving the late alarming compact of the house “ of Bourbon, calculated to destroy the com“ merce of your subjects, and replete with dan“ ger to the existence of your majesty's ancient “ and natural ally, and to the independence of “ the rest of the powers of Europe.

“ And we beg leave humbly to assure your “ majesty, that your faithful citizens of London, “ animated with the warmest sense of duty to “ your majesty and their country, will, with “ unwearied cheerfulness, contribute their utmost “ efforts to strengthen your majesty's hands, until “ your enemies, moved by their own repeated “ losses and distresses, shall be disposed to listen “ to such terms of accommodation as your royal “ wisdom shall think adequate to our glorious “ successes; and such as may effectually secure “ the trade and navigation of your subjects, and “ prevent the calamities of a future war.”

On the twenty-seventh of this month it appeared that, by the rains which fell for some days past, a high tide in the river Thames, and a strong gale of wind at north, the rivers within twenty-miles of London were so raised, that the like had never been known in the memory of man; and the damage that was sustained, more especially on the river Lee, was almost incredible.
 In less than five hours the water rose twelve feet in perpendicular height. About Stratford, West-ham, Plaistow, Waltham-abbey, and along the marshes, they were very fatal to the inhabitants.

Most of their cattle in the fields were carried off; likewise stacks of hay and wood, with the loss of all the hogs that were in their styes and yards, together with all the horses that were in the stables.

In some parts of Stratford the flood reached their chamber windows, and the face of the waters was covered with the bodies of the beasts that perished. From the nearest computation that could be made, not less than 5000 hogs perished in this flood, together with all the horses and other cattle that were in the meadows, whose numbers were very considerable. The flood extended itself over all the causeways, and several people were lost in the high roads; a woman and horse, and a gentleman in a post chaise, with the horses and post-boy, all perished in the water; and three of the passengers in the Bury-machine, with two of the horses, were also drowned. The china works beyond Bow-bridge were overflowed in such a manner that the current rushed through the great arch like the tide through the arches of London-bridge. The callico-grounds in the neighbourhood of Bow and Stratford were all overflowed, and great quantities of linen carried off. The houses from Bow-bridge to Stratford were all under water, and the inhabitants were compelled to take refuge by getting out of their windows.
 This powerful inundation was productive of the like dismal consequences in most other parts of the kingdom.

On the eighth of November the right honourable the Lord-mayor received the following letter from the secretary of state's-office, which was sent to him in consequence of the preliminary articles of peace having been signed by the duke of Bedford:

To the right honourable the Lord-mayor.

“ My Lord, Cleaveland-row Nov. 8, 1762.

“ I am directed by my lord Egremont to ac“ quaint your lordship, that one of his majesty's “ messengers has this moment brought an ac“ count of the duke of Bedford's having signed
 “ the preliminary articles of peace with France “ and Spain, at Fontainebleau, on the third in“ stant. The secretary of state's intention, for “ making this immediate communication to your “ lordship of the first account relative to the fig“ nature of the preliminaries, which has been “ transmitted to his office by the king's minister
 “ at Paris, is in order to have it publicly known “ in the city without loss of time. Your lordship “ will, no doubt, take such steps as are most “ proper to answer the purpose.

“ I am, &c. R. Wood.”

And on the first of December the cessation of arms was proclaimed in the usual places, and with the accustomed ceremonies.

On the thirteenth of February, 1763, the Thames rose so high, that many houses on the Surry side were four or five feet under water:
 the long walk at Lambeth, by the bishop's-palace, was overflowed, and boats were employed in the town to carry people from house to house. The damage done by this high tide was computed at 20,000*l*. In Westminster-hall the water was four feet deep; and the inhabitants of Tooley-street and Wapping were obliged to keep to their upper rooms.

On the twenty-fourth a riot happened at Covent garden theatre, occasioned by a demand being made for full prices throughout the whole performance of Artaxerxes: all the benches in the boxes and the pit were entirely torn up, the glasses and chandeliers broken, and the linings of the boxes cut to pieces. The rashness of the rioters was so great, that they cut away the wooden pillars between the boxes, so that, if the inside of them had not been iron, they would have brought down the galleries upon their own heads. The damages were computed at two thousand pounds.

On the twenty-second of March the definitive treaty of peace was proclaimed at the usual places, pursuant to his majesty's royal warrant signed for that purpose.

There being at this time a bill depending in parliament to subject the makers of cyder and perry to the excise laws. The court of common-council, on the above day, unanimously came to the following resolution:

"That it is the opinion of this court, that a petition be prepared to the honourable house of commons, against so much of the bill now depending in that house, for granting an additional duty on wine, cyder, and perry, as relates to subjecting the makers of cyder and perry to the laws of excise."

And at another court held the next day, a motion was made that instructions should be given to the members of this city, in regard to the said petition, and a committee of four aldermen and eight commoners was appointed to prepare the same, which being done, and read in court, was unanimously agreed to.

The representation of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, to the representatives of this city in parliament.

"This court cannot forbear expressing to you their surprise, at the precipitate progress which has been already made in a new attempt towards a general excise. The extension of excise laws into private houses, whereby the subject is made liable to a frequent and arbitrary visitation of officers, and the judicial determination of commissioners, removeable at pleasure, is inconsistent with those principles of liberty which have hitherto distinguished this nation from arbitrary governments. An attack upon the liberty of the subject, made so immediately after a glorious and successful war, and at a time when we had just reason to expect to enjoy the blessings of peace, demands your serious attention. And this court doth remark, that whatever may be the necessity of the times, the smallness of the sum indicates that cannot be the only motive to so extraordinary a measure. For these reasons, this court doth earnestly recommend your constant attendance in parliament, and utmost endeavours to oppose every enlargement or extension of the powers of excise; and that you do not conceal from the public any such attempt, nor suffer yourselves to be amused by any plausible alteration in the bill subjecting the makers of cyder and perry, to excise laws."

And on the twenty-eighth the said court, having been informed that the commons had passed and sent up the cyder bill to the lords, resolved that an humble petition should be presented, in their name, to the house of lords, and another to the king, praying that the said bill might not pass into a law. The petition to his majesty was as follows:

"The humble petition of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, of the city of London, in common-council assembled,

"Most humbly sheweth,

"That your petitioners are fully convinced, that the collecting the duties intended to be laid on the makers of cyder and perry, by way of excise, is not nor can in many instances be, so regulated, but that it will occasion numberless difficulties and questions.

"That the method of trial and decision of excise disputes are founded only in necessity, being in their nature arbitrary, and inconsistent with the principles of liberty, and the happy constitution of your majesty's government.

"That the exposing private houses to be entered into and searched, at pleasure, by persons unknown, will be a badge of slavery upon your people.

"That your petitioners, firmly confiding in your majesty's favour, and filled with a most humble and grateful sense of your paternal affection for your people, most humbly beseech your majesty to protect their liberty, and keep them happy and at ease; free from the apprehension of being disturbed in their property; by which your majesty will erect a lasting monument of your goodness in every house in the kingdom.

"Your petitioners, therefore, most humbly implore your majesty, that you will not give your royal assent to so much of the bill, as subjects the makers of cyder and perry, to excise laws.

"And your petitioners shall ever pray, &c."

For these zealous endeavours to oppose a bill so detrimental to the subject, the citizens received the particular thanks of the city of Exeter, and were greatly applauded by their fellow subjects in general; but their petitions had not sufficient effect to prevent the said bill passing into a law: though, by their repeated applications it was afterwards repealed.

On the ninth of April some recruits confined in the Savoy for the East-India service, rose upon the centinels, wrested their arms from them, and made themselves masters of the keys; but the guards in the barracks being alarmed, another fray ensued, in which three of the recruits were shot.

shot dead, some others mortally wounded, and one of the soldiers had his hand so shattered, that it was obliged to be cut off.

On the eighteenth the two ambassadors extraordinary from the republic of Venice to the court of London, made their public entry through the city to Somerset-house, in the following manner :

The whole company assembled at Greenwich, from whence they set off between twelve and one. There were three state barges, viz. the queen's of ten oars, and two others of eight oars each, with another of six oars for their attendants: besides a great number of other barges belonging to the nobility and gentry, who accompanied the procession.

They landed about three o'clock at the Tower, from whence they proceeded in the following order through the Minories, Leadenhall-street, Cornhill, Cheap-side, Ludgate-street, Fleet-street, and along the Strand to Somerset-house, where they were entertained at the king's expence, till their audience of his majesty.

Four king's under marshal-men on horseback.

City marshal on horseback.

Master of the ceremonies assistant, in a coach and six.

Thirty eight footmen, two and two, on foot.

Eight gentlemen of the bedchambers, belonging to the ambassadors, on horseback, two and two.

House steward alone, on horseback.

Eight pages on horseback, two and two.

Kettle drum.

Second master of the horse, alone.

King's state-coach, with the ambassadors, the earl of Guilford, and master of the ceremonies; six horses.

King's second coach, with the two secretaries to the embassy, six horses.

Six gentlemen of the privy-chamber, in the next royal coaches.

The queen, princess of Wales, duke of York, princess Augusta, duke of Cumberland, and princess Amelia's coaches with six horses each.

The ambassador's grand state-coach with eight horses, empty.

The second coach empty, with six horses.

The third coach with two Venetian noblemen, six horses.

The peer's coaches and six.

All the dresses of the persons attending this procession, both on the water, as well as at land, were extremely splendid.

On the 29th John Wilkes, esq; member of parliament for Aylesbury, was taken into custody by a warrant from the secretary of state, for writing a paper called the North-Briton, No. 45, and after examination was committed to the Tower. At the same time all his papers were seized, to be examined by persons appointed by the secretaries. And on the third of May, he was brought from the Tower to the bar of the court of common-pleas, Westminster, where he made the following speech :

" My lords,

" I feel myself happy to be at last brought before a court, and before judges whose characteristic is the love of liberty. I have many humble thanks to return for the immediate order you were pleased to issue, to give me an opportunity of laying my grievances before you. They are of a kind hitherto unparalleled in this free country, and I trust the consequences will teach ministers of Scottish and arbitrary principles, that the liberty of an English subject is not to be sported away with impunity, in this cruel and despotic manner.

" I am accused of being the author of the North-Briton, No. 45. I shall only remark upon that paper, that it takes all load of accusation from the sacred name of a prince, whose family I love and honour as the glorious defenders of the cause of liberty, and whose personal qualities are so amiable, great and respectable, that he is deservedly the idol of his people. It is the peculiar fashion and crime of these times, and of those who hold high ministerial offices in government, to throw every odious charge from themselves upon majesty: the author of this paper, whoever he may be, has, upon constitutional principles, done directly the reverse, and is therefore in me, the supposed author, meant to be persecuted accordingly; the particular cruelties of my treatment, worse than if I had been a Scotch rebel, this court will hear, and I dare say, from your justice in due time redress.

" I may, perhaps, still have the means left me to shew that I have been superior to every temptation of corruption. They may, indeed, have flattered themselves, that when they found corruption could not prevail, persecution might intimidate. I will shew myself superior to both. My papers have been seized, perhaps with a hope the better to deprive me of that proof of their meanness and corrupt prodigality, which it may, possibly, in a proper place be yet in my power to give."

The case was then learnedly argued by eminent lawyers on both sides, and when they had finished, the court, after making a polite excuse to Mr. Wilkes for the delay, took time to consider the case; and to give their opinion: therefore they remanded him prisoner to the Tower, till Friday the sixth of May. On which day he was brought up to the court of common-pleas, where the lord chief justice and the other judges being assembled, Mr. Wilkes addressed them as follows :

" My lords,

" Far be it from me to regret that I have passed so many more days in captivity, as it will have afforded you an opportunity of doing, upon mature reflection, and repeated examination, the more signal justice to my country. The liberty of all peers and gentlemen, and what touches me more sensibly, that of all the middling

" middling and inferior class of people, who " stand most in need of protection, is, in my " case, this day to be finally decided upon: a " question of such importance as to deter" mine at once, whether English liberty be " a reality or a shadow. Your own free-born
 " hearts will feel with indignation and compassion
 " all that load of oppression under which I have " so long laboured. Close imprisonment, the " effect of premeditated malice, all access for " more than two days denied to me, my house
 " ransacked and plundered, my most private and " secret concerns divulged, every vile and malig" nant insinuation, even of high treason itself,
 " no less industriously than falsely circulated by
 " my cruel and implacable enemies, together
 " with all the various insolence of office, form
 " but a part of my unexampled ill treatment.
 " Such inhuman principles of star-chamber ty" ranny will, I trust, by this court, upon this " solemn occasion, be finally extirpated; and
 " henceforth every innocent man, however poor
 " and unsupported, may hope to sleep in peace " and security in his own house, unviolated by
 " king's messengers, and the arbitrary mandates
 " of an overbearing secretary of state.

" I will no longer delay your justice. The na" tion is impatient to hear, nor can they be safe
 " or happy till that is obtained. If the same " persecution is after all to carry me before ano" ther court, I hope I shall find that the genuine " spirit of Magna Charta, that glorious inheri" tance, that distinguishing characteristic of En" glishmen, is as religiously revered there, as I " know it is here, by the great personages before " whom I have now the happiness to stand; and
 " (as in the memorable case of the imprisoned
 " bishops) that an independent jury of free-born
 " Englishmen will persist to determine my fate,
 " as in conscience bound, upon constitutional
 " principles, by a verdict of guilty or not guilty.
 " I ask no more at the hands of my country" men."

When Mr. Wilkes had finished his speech, the lord chief justice stood up, and delivered the opinion of the court on the three following heads, which were chiefly insisted on by counsel:

1. The legality of Mr. Wilkes's commitment.
2. The necessity for a specification of those particular passages in the 45th number of the North Briton, which had been deemed a libel. And
3. Mr. Wilkes's privilege as a member of parliament.

To the first of these his lordship was of opinion, that Mr. Wilkes's commitment was not illegal.

To the second, which required a specification of the particular passages in the North Briton, which were deemed a libel, his lordship took notice, that the insertion of these passages, so far as they related to the point in question, was not at all necessary.

* On the twelfth of May 1763, between twelve and one o'clock, the following aldermen went in procession from

And to the last point he observed, that the privilege of parliament should be held sacred and inviolable; and as there were but three particular cases in which that privilege was forfeited, it only remained to examine how far Mr. Wilkes's was endangered. Mr. Wilkes stood accused of writing a libel; a libel in the sense of the law was a high misdemeanor, but did not come within the description of treason, felony, or breach of the peace; at most it had but a tendency to disturb the peace, and consequently could not be sufficient to destroy the privilege of a member of parliament.

Thus was the point of privilege determined, and Mr. Wilkes, by order of the court, immediately discharged.

In his way from the hall to his house in Great George-street, he was surrounded by many gentlemen of distinction, amidst the most repeated acclamations of more than ten thousand people.

[The particulars respecting the above gentleman will be progressively given from this first circumstance to the close of our work.]

On the sixth of May, about four o'clock in the morning, a terrible fire broke out at the house of lady Moleworth, in Upper Brook-street, Grosvenor-square, which, in a short time, entirely consumed the same, with all its furniture. Lady Moleworth, her brother captain Usher, her second and third daughters, and four or five servants, perished in the flames. Her eldest daughter jumped out of a window and broke her leg;
 the mother intended to follow, but the fire overpowered her, and she sunk into the midst of the flames. Her fourth and fifth daughters jumped out of a garret window; the former broke her thigh, and the latter was greatly bruised. Dr.
 Coote Moleworth, with his lady, being on a visit, narrowly escaped with their lives. The doctor's lady threw herself from a two pair of stairs window into the garden, and was much scorched and terribly bruised. The doctor hung from the window by his hands till a ladder was brought him. An elderly woman, governess of the children, threw herself out of the nursery-window, and was killed on the spot. One of the footmen, in jumping from a window, fell upon the iron spikes, where he hung till a chairman, at the hazard of his own life, took him off; but he afterwards died of his wound. Notwithstanding the fire in this house was so fatal to its inhabitants, yet it is remarkable no other house received the least damage.

In order to shew the contempt with which the citizens held the conduct of the ministry, in having made up a peace so very inadequate to the glorious successes of the late war, it is only necessary to observe, that the common-council could by no means be prevailed on to address:
 and the greatest cavalcade which could be formed from the city for that purpose, consisted only of eight aldermen,* including the locum tenens at 5 F their

Guildhall to wait upon his majesty with an address on the peace:

Sir

their head, who, assuming the name of the Lord-mayor, and court of aldermen, waited on his majesty with the following :

“ Sir,

“ Your majesty’s faithful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London, desire to be permitted to pay their humble duty to your majesty, and to express their grateful sense of your majesty’s gracious and benevolent attention to your people, in relieving them from the increasing burdens of a long and expensive, though glorious and successful war.

“ They enter not into a particular consideration of the national advantages resulting from the treaty of peace, which your majesty has been pleased to conclude : These have been submitted to a constitutional examination ; but they beg leave thus publicly to declare to your majesty their entire acquiescence in a measure, which your majesty’s councils, and the great council of the nation, have seen reason to approve. And this they have thought it their duty to do at this time, when they have with concern observed a spirit of faction unhappily arising, and are apprehensive their silence might be interpreted an encouragement of practices, which their dutiful attachment to your majesty’s person and government leads them to detest and abhor.

“ They further beg leave to assure your majesty, that as magistrates to whom the executive power of the government of the city of London is intrusted, it shall be their constant endeavour to maintain and preserve domestic tranquillity, order, and government, and that true and perfect liberty, which has its foundation in obedience to the laws, and of which licentiousness, though it often assumes the name, is, in this country, the only enemy.

“ By a conduct so conformable to your royal example, they presume to hope they shall intitle themselves to the continuance of your majesty’s protection and favour.”

His majesty’s most gracious answer.

“ I return you my sincere thanks for this address, and for the satisfaction you express in the success of my endeavours to restore the public peace.

“ I receive with great pleasure the assurances you give me, of your abhorrence and detestation of those factious and licentious practices, which, alone, can endanger our present happy “ settlement, after the conclusion of peace with all our foreign enemies.

“ Your resolution to support, in opposition thereto, the true constitutional liberty of these kingdoms, is highly acceptable to me.

“ The city of London may depend upon my constant favour and protection.”

The fourth of June being his majesty’s birthday, the same was celebrated with more public demonstrations of joy than had been ever known on a like occasion. The principal buildings were grandly illuminated, as were almost all the private houses in the squares and streets of this metropolis ; each vying with the other to express their loyalty to their sovereign, however they disliked the measures of the ministry. A terrible accident happened in the evening on Tower-hill, where were exhibited grand fire-works at the public expence. The populace repaired thither in such shoals, and crowded so fast on each other, that the rails which surrounded a well, on the bank of the ditch, at the postern, gave way, and the multitude fell together about thirty feet deep. By which accident six were taken up dead, fourteen were so hurt that they died of their wounds, and many others were most dreadfully bruised.

About two o’clock in the morning on the 23d a fire broke out in King-street, Rotherhithe, which entirely consumed fifteen houses, besides damaging many others. And on the tenth of July following, about one in the morning, a most terrible fire began in a stable, or some out-house, near the east side of the plying-place called New-crane, in the parish of Shadwell, which communicated its flames to a loft adjoining, full of dry reeds for the use of the ship yard, in which it stood, and set fire to a ship in the dock. The wind being high, the flames immediately caught the back-fronts and out-buildings of the houses next the water in the street called Wapping-wall ; and so rapid was their progress, that before proper assistance could be brought, the fire crossed the street, and, in a few hours, the houses on both the south and the north sides were entirely consumed. Eighty-seven houses were burnt to the ground, and several persons perished in the flames.

On the nineteenth of August, about twelve o’clock at noon, began a very terrible storm of wind, rain, thunder, and lightning in this city, which was preceded by an almost total darkness. The air seemed greatly convulsed ; the heat was intense, and was felt by the people as like the heat of an oven. The appearance of it being much the same as preceded the great earthquake at Lisbon, many people expected the most direful consequences would follow : but it went off much

A great number of people assembled in Guildhall-yard to see them set out, who testified their displeasure by continued hissing &c. As the procession passed St. Bride’s church the great bell began to toll, and then a dumb peal struck up, which continued a considerable time ; and at their return they were treated in the same manner by Bow bells.

milder in the city of London than in other places; for about Chatham the darkness was accompanied with one continual rolling of thunder for the space of forty minutes, and the lightning was almost incessant, but at a great distance, for the same space of time. At Twickenham large trees were torn up by the roots, stacks of chimnies were blown down, and other damage done by the hurricane that accompanied the darkness. About Reading several trees were torn up by the roots, two sheep were killed, and several people were beat down and terribly frightened. At Brithelmstone the storm was very awful, and the oldest fishermen said they had never seen any thing like it in their memories. About Maidstone in Kent, the hops suffered considerably by the storm. But the most surprizing circumstance that attended this phenomenon was the sudden flux and reflux of the tide in Plymouth pool, which exactly corresponded with the like agitation in the same place at the time of the great earthquake at Lisbon. At Sheerness, some dreadful convulsions of nature were apprehended. The windows exposed to the fury of the storm were crushed to pieces; fowls were killed by the hail and much damage done.

Her majesty being safely delivered of a prince (afterwards christened Frederick) the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, on the twenty-fifth waited on his majesty with the following congratulatory address on the occasion:

To the king's most excellent majesty.

The humble address of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled.

" Most gracious sovereign,

" We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, most gladly embrace this joyful occasion of approaching your sacred person, with our sincerest and warmest congratulations on the safe delivery of the queen, and the auspicious birth of another prince; firmly trusting that every increase of your royal family will prove an additional security to our religion, and that great charter of liberty, which, in consequence of the glorious revolution, your illustrious house was chosen to defend.

" Your majesty's ever loyal and faithful citizens of London, exceeded by none of your subjects in honest and anxious zeal for your majesty's happiness, and the glory and prosperity of your reign, rejoice in every event, which augments your majesty's domestic felicity.

" Permit us, royal Sir, to intreat your majesty's acceptance of our faithful assurances, that we will, at all times, be ready, cheerfully to render your majesty every instance of allegiance and duty, which affectionate and loyal subjects can pay to the best of princes."

His majesty's most gracious answer.

" I thank you for this loyal address, and for the satisfaction you express on the increase of

" my family. The religion and liberties of my people always have been, and ever shall be, the constant objects of my care and attention. I shall at all times depend upon the assurances which you give me of your allegiance and duty."

On the eighth of September another terrible fire broke out at Shadwell-dock, which burnt thirty houses before it could be extinguished, among which was Stoker's brewhouse, and several others of great value.

On the twenty-ninth of September, William Bridgen, esq; alderman of Farringdon without, was elected Lord-mayor of London for the year ensuing; at which time Mr. Beckford, the then Lord-mayor, rose up, and addressed the livery as follows:

" Gentlemen, and fellow citizens,

" You were pleased to do me the honour of electing me your first magistrate this day twelvemonth, and I entered on that duty with diffidence and reluctance, being conscious to myself, that it was not in my power to execute so great a trust with the assiduity and attention that the dignity and importance of the office required; how far I have been able to go through it with any degree of propriety, you are the only judges. Very great assistance I have experienced from my brethren of the court of aldermen, and I shall always retain a grateful remembrance of their good-will towards me.

" The time of my mayoralty draws near a conclusion; and I can safely say, it will give me more comfort and satisfaction of mind to quit, than it ever did to receive this high honour, the greatest that can fall to the share of a citizen. That satisfaction is increased by the reflection of being succeeded by a very worthy alderman, for whose firmness, integrity, and resolution, I have the greatest veneration: and indeed firmness and resolution are at all times necessary in your first magistrate, especially in times so critical and difficult as the present seem to be; however, I trust, that the old good humour and good sense of this great city will set an example of moderation to the rest of the kingdom, and convince every impartial man that the duty and affection of the citizens of London to the best of kings, can be equalled only by their love of justice and of liberty, founded on the glorious principles of the revolution.

" Permit me to take this opportunity of returning my sincere acknowledgements to my fellow-citizens, for all their favours conferred on me; and of assuring them, that it shall be the study of my life to support the honour and dignity of the crown, liberty, and constitutional independency of the people, and the rights and privileges of my fellow-citizens, always keeping in remembrance that noble declaration of the great revolution patriots, That under the house of Hanover only they could, and under the house of Hanover they were determined they would be free."

On

On the sixteenth of November a duel was fought between Samuel Martin, esq; member of parliament for Camelford, and late secretary to the treasury, and John Wilkes, esq; when the latter was greatly wounded in the belly by a pistol bullet. The wound, however, not proving mortal, Mr. Wilkes soon after recovered.

On the eighteenth the tide in the river Thames at eleven o'clock, when it was flowing, suddenly stopped, and ebbed for the space of an hour; after which it returned, and flowed the usual time.

A most violent storm of wind and rain happened on the second of December, which did incredible damage in and about London, and in many other parts of the kingdom. Several houses were blown down, some people killed, many wounded, and business interrupted; chimnies in many parts of the town fell upon the roofs; the roofs were stripped, and the streets, during the violence of the storm, rendered impassable; part of the walls of Hyde-park and Sadler's-wells gave way; trees were blown up by the roots; and the river Thames rose so high, that in many places it overflowed its banks, filled cellars, and did immense damage to the shipping and craft.

The next day, when the executioner, by order of both houses of parliament, came to burn No. 45, of the North-Briton at the Royal-Exchange, there was such a multitude gathered together upon the occasion, that the officers appointed to put the order into execution, were greatly interrupted in the performance of their duty. Not only the executioner, the constables, and the inferior officers were pelted with filth and dirt, but the chief officers present were insulted in the grossest manner; the fore-glass of Mr. Harley's chariot, (one of the city sheriffs, and a member of parliament for the city of London, was broken by a billet thrown at his person, which was taken from the fire that was kindled to consume the North-Briton. Mr. Harley being slightly wounded, and observing the spirit of licentiousness that prevailed among the multitude, hastened to the Mansion-house to apprise the Lord-mayor of the danger.

The executioner thinking it his duty to follow the high sheriff, made his retreat likewise as soon after as he could; and the constables, most of their staves being broken by the furious resistance they had made, mixed among the crowd, and marched off without further opposition. The North-Briton, however, was partly consumed by means of a lighted link, on which it was placed, by the zeal of the proper officers, but the remains of it were rescued from the flames by the violence of the assailants, who carried them off in triumph, and in the evening displayed them at Temple-bar, where a bonfire was made, and a large jack boot committed to the flames instead thereof, amidst the acclamations of a great course of spectators.

Mr. Wilkes having commenced an action in the court of common-pleas against Robert Ward, esq; the under secretary, for seizing his papers, the same was tried on the sixth of December, before lord chief justice Pratt, and a special jury, at the defendant's request; when, after an hearing of near fifteen hours, many learned arguments on both sides, and a most masterly, pathetic, and eloquent charge given by his lordship, the jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff with one thousand pounds damages, and full costs of suit; on which the populace, as before, testified their joy in the most extravagant manner.

On the evening of the day on which this verdict was obtained, a person knocked at Mr. Wilkes's door, desiring to speak with him on particular business; but it appearing by his dialect that he was a Scotchman, and being besides an entire stranger, he was refused admittance, on which he went to a coffee-house near Parliament-street, where a person made affidavit, that he overheard him declare, that himself and ten more were determined to cut off Mr. Wilkes, let the event be what it would; and next morning gave information of it by a letter to Mr. Wilkes, desiring him to be on his guard. According to the information, the person sworn against, as was supposed, bringing a letter to Mr. Wilkes's house, signed Alexander Dun, the purpose of which was to beg an interview with him on an affair of the most interesting nature, he was desired to call again at one o'clock, which he did accordingly; and seven o'clock being then appointed, as he was going out at the parlour door, into Mr. Wilkes's bedchamber, two gentlemen who had placed themselves behind it, seized him by the arms, and threw him on his back. On searching him a new pen knife was found in his pocket, which he pretended he had purchased about nine months ago, but after many equivocations, owned he bought it at Chatham about a fortnight before. Upon this he was taken into custody by a tipstaff then present for that purpose, was carried next morning before one of the judges; and a complaint likewise exhibited against him in the house of commons, who thereupon ordered the officer in whose custody he was, to bring him to the bar; but when he was there, the house discharged him from any farther appearance, as it was evident from his behaviour, that he was disordered in his mind.

A little before this a complaint was exhibited against Mr. Wilkes in the upper-house, for affixing the name of a member of that house, to a book, intituled, "An Essay on Woman," which book was produced to the eternal disgrace of all concerned in it; but Mr. Wilkes could not prefer his answer, being at that time indisposed in consequence of the wound he had received in the duel with Mr. Martin. On which account the house gave him time for his appearance, and afterwards enlarged it on the report of his physician and surgeon; but beginning at last to suspect some collusion betwixt him and them, on the sixteenth of December they ordered doctor Heberden and Mr. Hawkins to attend him, in order to observe the progress of his cure, and to report the same to the house. Doctor Heberden acquainted the physician with this order, and desired him to communicate it to Mr. Wilkes, that the time of attendance might be settled. Mr. Wilkes, in consequence of the intelligence received by him from his physician, dispatched cards to the two gentlemen appointed to attend him, expressing his sense of the kind care of the house for his speedy recovery, intimating his perfect reliance on the gentlemen to whom he had committed his case, and assuring them, that though he did not wish to see them at present, he was impatient for an opportunity of shewing the just regard he would ever pay to distinguished merit.

After Mr. Wilkes had acted in this spirited manner, he thought proper, in justification of the characters of doctor Brocklesby his physician, and Mr. Graves his surgeon, to send for doctor Duncan, one of his majesty's physicians in ordinary, and Mr. Middleton one of his majesty's serjeant surgeons, who attended him accordingly. The reason Mr. Wilkes gave to those two gentlemen for sending for them was, that as he found the house thought it proper that he should be watched, he himself thought two Scotchmen most proper for his spies.

We will not pretend to say whether the attention of the house had any happy effect on Mr. Wilkes's health, but he recovered so fast, that on the twenty-fourth of December he suddenly set out for France to visit his daughter, as he himself gave out, then dangerously ill at Paris.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

Violent storm of wind. Marriage of princess Augusta. City address on the occasion. Mr. Wilkes expelled the house of commons. The common-council present lord chief justice Pratt with the freedom of the city. The silk weavers petition his majesty against the importation of foreign silks. Fire in St. James's-square. Remarkable storm of thunder and lightning. Election of a chamberlain. Freedom of the city presented to the duke of Gloucester. Great fire at Rotherhithe. Remarkable phenomenon in the air. Death of the duke of Cumberland.

THE year 1764 was introduced by a violent storm of wind, on the fourteenth of January, which did great damage to houses, trees, and shipping in the river. During the storm two dreadful fires broke, the one near Hyde-park corner, and the other in Ratcliff-Highway; at each of which seven houses were entirely consumed.

On the evening of the sixteenth the ceremony of the marriage of her royal highness the princess Augusta, eldest sister to his majesty, with his most serene highness the hereditary prince of Brunswick Lunenburgh, was performed in the great council-chamber, by his grace the archbishop of Canterbury, in presence of a great number of peers, peeresses, and foreign ministers. After the solemnization of the nuptials, their serene and royal highnesses repaired to Leicester-house, where was prepared an elegant entertainment; at which their majesties, the princess dowager of Wales, and the rest of the royal family were present. On this joyful occasion, the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, waited on his majesty, to whom being introduced by earl Gower, lord-chamberlain, James Eyre, esq; the recorder, made their compliments in the following address:

“ May it please your majesty,

“ Graciously to accept our sincere and dutiful
“ congratulations on the marriage of your majesty's eldest sister, her royal highness the princess Augusta, with his most serene highness the hereditary prince of Brunswick Lunenburgh.
“ It was with the utmost joy and satisfaction, that “ we saw your majesty's wisdom yield to the pro-

“ posals for an alliance with a protestant family so “ illustrious; and that a lady, whose amiable “ character is not more exalted by the dignity of “ her birth than her private virtues, was destined “ to be the happy partner of a prince, whose “ eminent and distinguished services, during a “ successful and glorious war, will ever be re“ membered by every friend of true religion and “ public liberty.

“ Your majesty's faithful citizens of London “ have seen, with gratitude, the constitution of “ this country, settled and established by our “ great deliverer king William, maintained and “ improved by the illustrious house of Brunf“ wick; and, therefore, they cannot sufficiently “ applaud your majesty's great wisdom and good“ ness in further strengthening it by this happy “ alliance.

“ May this marriage answer your majesty's “ warmest wishes and expectations; and may the “ prince and princess be blessed with an offspring “ truly worthy of so royal and illustrious a de“ scent!

“ Permit us to assure your majesty of our firm “ attachment to your majesty's sacred person
“ and government; and of our constant endea“ vours, within our sphere, to contribute to the “ happiness and prosperity of your majesty's “ reign.”

To which address his majesty was pleased to return the following most gracious answer:

“ My lord and gentlemen,

“ I return you my thanks for your dutiful “ congratulations on the marriage of my sister
“ the princess Augusta, with the hereditary prince

" of Brunswick Lunenburg; and am glad that " this happy alliance gives such general satisfac" tion.

" I receive, with pleasure, your assurances of " duty and affection to my person and govern" ment. The city of London may always de" pend on my favour and protection."

They afterwards waited on her royal highness the princess dowager of Wales, and their serene highnesses the prince and princess of Brunswick, to whom they respectively presented their compliments of congratulation.

On the twentieth of this month the commons, after long debates, expelled John Wilkes, esq; for a contempt of their authority, and publishing the North-Briton, being adjudged an infamous libel; and issued out a writ of election for Aylesbury in his room.

On the twenty-fifth his majesty went to the house of peers, and gave, among others, the royal assent to the bill for naturalizing his serene highness the prince of Brunswick, who was in the house during his majesty's stay. In the mean time her royal highness the princess of Brunswick remained at Leicester-house, taking leave of the ladies of quality her intimates with the greatest tenderness and fortitude. In the afternoon their highnesses took leave of the company; when the prince, on the populace expressing their ardent wishes for their highnesses happiness and prosperity, returned his prayers for the success of the British nation, for which he said he had already bled, and would again with pleasure, on any future occasion. Their highnesses then descended the stairs to their coaches, amidst an innumerable crowd of spectators, who were waiting for their last farewell of their amiable princess; and the people attended their departure with acclamations and tears.

On the twenty-first of February came on at the court of King's-bench, Westminster, the trial of John Wilkes, esq; for reprinting and publishing the North-Briton No. 45, at his own house. The trial lasted eight hours, and the jury, retiring an hour and three quarters, returned, and brought in their verdict guilty. The court then proceeded to the trial of Mr. Wilkes for printing and publishing the Essay on woman, of which also the jury, after withdrawing about half an hour, found him guilty.

At a court of common-council held at Guildhall the same day, the thanks of the court were ordered to be presented to the representatives of the city, for their zealous and spirited endeavours to assert the rights and liberties of the subject, by their laudable attempt to obtain a reasonable and parliamentary declaration. " That a general
 " warrant for apprehending and seizing the au" thors, printers and publishers of a seditious li" bel, together with their papers, is not war-
 " rantable by law;" and to exhort them, in the warmest manner, steadily to persevere in their duty to the crown, and use their utmost endeavours to secure the houses, papers, and persons of the subject from arbitrary and illegal violations. At the same time it was resolved, that, " as the in-
 " dependency and uprightness of judges is es" sential to the impartial administration of justice,

 " and one of the best securities to the rights and
 " liberties of the subject," this court, in manifestation of the just sense of the firmness and integrity of the right honourable Sir Charles Pratt, lord chief justice of his majesty's court of common pleas, doth direct, that the freedom of this city be presented to his lordship, and that he be desired to sit for his picture to be placed in Guildhall, in gratitude for the honest and deliberate decision upon the validity of a warrant which had been frequently produced to, but, so far as appears to this court, never debated in the court of King's-bench, by which he hath eminently distinguished his duty to the king, his justice to the subject, and his knowledge of the law. This example of the city of London in thanking and instructing their representatives, in regard to general warrants, and thanking Lord chief justice Pratt, and presenting him with the freedom of the city, was followed by a great many corporations and private companies in England.

On the twenty-fifth a treatise, intituled, " Droit
 " le Roy," a rhapsody of all the prerogatives at any time attributed to the kings of England, was burnt by the common hangman at Westminster-hall gate, and on the 27th at the Royal-Exchange, pursuant to an order of both houses of parliament.

About this time an act of parliament passed for the better regulating of buildings, and to prevent mischiefs that may happen by fire within the weekly bills of mortality, &c. by which so much of the act of 2. George I. for regulating buildings, &c. as relates to party walls, shall extend to all cases whatsoever within the city and liberty of Westminster, and within the parishes of St. Mary-le-Bone and Paddington, and Chelsea and St. Pancras, when it shall be necessary to pull down and rebuild any party-wall, whether either of the adjoining houses shall or shall not be, or require to be, rebuilt, or new built; except the city of London and liberties thereof, and party-walls of houses on the river Thames below bridge. It then directs a survey of the said walls, and that upon a disagreement of the surveyors it shall be lawful for two neighbouring justices of the peace to add another to them: and that the said wall viewed by them may be pulled down and rebuilt, if the majority signs a certificate of such wall being defective.

After which the said act enacts, " that all party
 " walls to be erected or built within the said city
 " or liberty of Westminster, and the parishes,
 " precincts and limits aforesaid, shall be two
 " bricks and an half thick at the least in the cellar,
 " and two bricks thick upwards to the garret
 " floor, and from thence one brick and an half
 " thick, at least, eighteen inches above the roofs
 " or gutters which adjoin to such party-walls; and " that the same shall be built of stone, or of good " sound burnt bricks, and none other.

" And that no timbers, except the timbers of
 " the girders, binding joists, and the templets
 " under the same, shall be laid into the party-
 " walls erected or built, or to be erected or built,
 " within the said city or liberty of Westminster,
 " and the parishes, precincts, and limits afore" said;

“ said ; and that no timbers of the roof be laid “ into such party-walls, (except the purloins or “ kerb thereof) and that the ends of girders, and “ binding joists, lying within such party-walls, “ shall not exceed nine inches ; and that none of “ the ends of the girders, or binding joists, in “ adjoining houses, shall meet, or be laid oppo“ site to each other ; and that the sides thereof “ shall be, at least, 14 inches distant from each “ other ; and that there shall be nine inches, at “ least, of solid brick-work left at or between the “ ends of all lentils, wall-plates, and bond-tim“ bers, which may or shall be laid in or upon
 “ the walls of the fore and back fronts of all “ houses which shall adjoin to each other, on the “ penalty of 50*l.* on the head builder.

“ That no timber or timbers whatsoever shall “ be laid or placed under the hearth or hearths
 “ of any room or rooms, or within nine inches
 “ of any funnel or flew of any chimney or chim“ nies, of any house or houses within the limits “ aforesaid ; and that no timber buildings what“ soever shall be built adjoining to any house or “ houses so as the timbers thereof shall be laid “ into the wall of any such house or houses al“ ready built, or hereafter to be built, within “ the limits aforesaid, under the penalty of 50*l.*

“ That after any party-wall or party-walls shall “ be erected or built pursuant to the directions “ of this act, no person or persons whatsoever,
 “ who shall build against such party-wall or par“ ty-walls, shall, on any pretence whatsoever, “ cut into or wound the same, for the convenience “ of making a chimney or chimnies, or for any “ other purpose whatsoever ; nor shall lay into “ the same any other timbers than are allowed by “ this act to be laid into new party-walls, under “ the penalty of 50*l.*

“ That every master-builder who shall erect or “ build any house within the limits above men“ tioned, shall, within fourteen days, after the “ same shall be covered in, cause the same to be “ surveyed by one or more surveyor or surveyors ;
 “ and such surveyor or surveyors shall make “ oath, before one or more of his majesty's jus“ tices of the peace for the said county of Mid“ dlesex or city of Westminster, that the same “ hath been (to the best of his or their judgment “ and belief) built and erected agreeable to the “ several directions in this act contained ; which “ affidavit shall be filed with the clerk of the “ peace for the said county of Middlesex, within “ ten days after the making thereof ; and if any “ master-builder shall make default in the pre“ mises, by neglecting to cause such survey to “ be made, or such affidavit to be made and “ filed as aforesaid, such master-builder shall, for “ every such neglect or default, forfeit the sum “ of 50*l.*

“ Provided always, that in all cases where any “ party-wall within the said city or liberty of “ Westminster, and the parishes, precincts and “ limits aforesaid, shall, by virtue of the act of “ the 11 George I. and of this present act, be “ pulled down and rebuilt, agreeable to the di“ rections of this present act, by the owner or “ occupier of one of the adjoining houses, the “ expence of such party-wall shall be estimated

“ and computed at and after the rate of 6*l.* 10*s.*

“ Provided also, That in all cases where any “ party-wall shall be erected or built, agreeable “ to the directions of this present act, in execu“ tion of any contract or contracts entered into “ with the builder or workman before the first “ day of July, 1764, the expence of such party-“ wall shall be estimated and computed at and “ after the rate of 6*l.* 10*s.* per rod ; any thing
 “ in such contract or contracts to the contrary “ thereof in any wise notwithstanding.”

And be it further enacted, “ That for the fur“ ther and better preventing the spreading of “ fires, all houses and other buildings, which “ shall be erected or built within the said city or “ liberty of Westminster, and the parishes, pre“ cincts, and limits aforesaid, shall be built of “ stone, or of good, sound, hard, well-burnt “ bricks, and none other, both in the fore front,
 “ and back front thereof, from the breast-sum“ mer upwards, (and likewise the party-walls “ thereof) and that such breast-summer, in all “ such houses or other buildings, shall not be “ higher than the floor of the one pair of stairs.”

This act concludes with a clause directing,
 “ That in all cases where any of the rewards “ shall be claimed by virtue of the statute of the “ 6th of queen Anne, for engines brought to “ help to extinguish fires, such reward shall be “ payable and paid in the same manner to the “ keeper of any other engine, though not a pa“ rish-engine, who shall bring in such engine in “ good order and complete, to help and extin“ guish such fire, in the same manner as if such “ engine was a parish engine.”

On the seventh of March Sir Thomas Harrison having waited on the right honourable the lord chief justice Pratt, and presented to his lordship the freedom of the city of London in a gold box, pursuant to the order of common-council, his lordship returned the following answer :

“ Sir,

“ It is impossible for me not to feel the most “ sensible pleasure in finding my behaviour in the “ administration of justice approved by the city “ of London ; the most respectable body in this “ kingdom, after the two houses of parliament.

“ If they have been pleased, from any part of “ my conduct, to entertain an opinion of my in“ tegrity (the best quality of a judge) my utmost “ ambition is satisfied ; and I may venture, with“ out the reproach of vanity, to take to myself
 “ the character of an honest man, which the city “ of London hath told me I am entitled to ;
 “ but they will give me leave, at the same time,
 “ to ascribe it only to my own good fortune, that “ I happened to be distinguished upon the pre“ sent occasion beyond the rest of my brethren ; “ since I am persuaded, that, if they had been “ called upon as I was, they would have acted “ with the like conscientious regard to their “ oaths, and to the law of the land.

“ Since, however, the city of London has “ now given me a reputation, I must take more than

" than ordinary care to preserve their gift by the " strictest attention to my duty, knowing, that " the best way of thanking the public for ho" nours like these is by persevering in the same " conduct, by which their approbation was first
 " acquired."

On the ninth of April many thousand journeymen silk-weavers went in procession from Spital-fields, and waited on his majesty at the queen's palace in St. James's park, with a petition, representing the miserable condition themselves and families were reduced to, by the clandestine importation of French silks. They waited before the court-yard, and two gentlemen, belonging to that manufactory, had the honour to be introduced to his majesty's presence; and present their petition, which his majesty received in the most gracious manner; and gave for answer that he would send immediate orders to put an entire stop to the importation of French silks; that an affair of so much consequence to the kingdom should be properly laid before the parliament, and that he would do his utmost to procure them redress.

A terrible fire broke out, on the fourteenth, at Mr. Nash's in St. James's square, which instantly consumed that house, and greatly damaged two others. The fire spread so rapid, that six persons perished in the flames.

On the eighteenth of June happened in and about London one of the greatest thunder storms in the memory of man. Some buildings were very much damaged, particularly the elegant spire of St. Bride's-church, Fleet-street, which was shattered so much, that it was obliged to be rebuilt. Several balls of fire were seen in the streets at the same time, but soon disappeared without doing any mischief. Many persons, however, were hurt by the stones that flew from the damaged buildings.

In the month of August about six hundred Palatines, and other German protestants were landed at the port of London, in the greatest distress; and were relieved with that generosity which does honour to the British nation. These unhappy people were prevailed upon to leave their own country, on the promise of a German officer, that on their arrival in England they should be immediately provided with a passage to British America, and appointed to settle some of our new acquisitions on that continent. This delusion arose from a pretence set up by one, who had no authority, as after appeared, to make a contract with them, or to procure them a settlement in any of our American plantations; though the poor deluded people had great reason to hearken to such proposals, as were tendered to them, in the name of a nation, which had always given them the preference in such cases, and could not possibly people and cultivate their new acquired deserts, without a vast number of new hands.
 However, they were deceived, and being embarked by the contractor's contrivance, and brought to the port of London, they who were in a condition to pay their passage, were permitted to land; such as had no money, were kept on board, and both were reduced to a starving condition; the contractor being left behind, and cast into a Dutch prison, for debts he imprudently contracted to carry this chimerical scheme into execution, without the least countenance even of a promise from the British court, to realize his agreement with the German emigrants: of which incident there appeared the following intelligence from the Hague gazette, on the thirty-first of August last.

" One — de S.—, who styles himself a colo" nel in the service of the king of Great-Britain,
 " having engaged a number of persons to go into
 " England, upon assurances which he gave them,
 " that he was authorized by his Britannic majesty
 " to promise them settlements in America; and " that they should be carried there at the king's " expence: in order to prevent his continuing to " impose upon the credulity of the public in this " respect, it is thought proper to advertise that
 " the said S.—was never authorized, as he pre" tends, to engage people for those settlements,
 " nor to make any promises on the part of the " British ministry."

The poor half starved Palatines, who were put ashore without a patron to provide for them, were not able to get entertainment or shelter from the intemperature of the rainy season, which, just at that time, (about the middle of August) was very heavy. The men, with their wives, children, and infants, even their very women in labour, were driven to the necessity of lying in the open fields, without provisions, without cover, and without any friend or assistance, but what could be collected during this exigency for them in German churches and chapels about this metropolis. All which is more fully and publickly described by the clergyman, whose piety led him to minister to them in their great distress, and to make their case known to the great and good, who had it in their power, and were ready to relieve their almost despairing German brethren.

This clergyman wrote a letter to the printer of the Daily-advertiser, who published it on the thirtieth of August, in these words:

" I hope you will permit me, by means of your paper, to inform those who have the power to redress it, of the very deplorable situation of the poor unhappy Palatines lately arrived here from Germany. They are in number, men, women, and children, about six hundred, consisting of Wurtzburghers and Palatines, all protestants, and were brought hither from their native country by a German officer, with a promise of being immediately sent to settle, at his own expence, in the island of St. John and le Croix, in America; but, by some inability, he has been obliged to decline the undertaking; so that instead of their being shipped off for those places, some of them have lain, during the late heavy rains, and are now lying in the open fields adjacent to this metropolis, without covering, without money, and in short, without the common necessaries of life; others lie languishing under the complicated evils of sickness and extreme want, at the Statute hall in Goodman's-fields; and more than two hundred remain on board the ship, which brought

them over on account of their passage not being paid for, where they are perishing for want of food, and rotting in filth and nastiness. Collections have been made at the German churches and chapels here several times, to afford them some relief; but as the number of these poor creatures are so considerable, it is impossible, by such means, to furnish them with a regular and continual supply, adequate to their wants; so that unless some provision is very speedily made for them, they must inevitably perish. These unfortunate people would think themselves inexpressibly happy, if the English government would be graciously pleased to take them under its protection, to allow them, for the present, some ground to lie on, tents to cover them, and any manner of subsistence, till it shall be thought proper to ship them off, and settle them in any English colonies in America; where, I doubt not, they will give their protectors and benefactors constant proofs of their affection and gratitude for such kindness, by behaving as becometh honest, industrious, and dutiful subjects, to the British government. I take the liberty of thus expressing the hopes and wishes of these wretched beings, as they have no friend to intercede for them, who has interest sufficient for such an undertaking, or even a knowledge of the proper method of application.

That their distresses are unutterably great, I myself have been too often a mournful witness of, in my attendance on them to administer the duties of my function; with one instance of which I shall conclude this melancholy detail. One of the poor women was seized with the pangs of labour in the open fields, and was delivered by the ignorant people about her in the best manner they were able; but from the injury the tender infant received in the operation, it died soon after I baptized it; and the wretched mother, after receiving the sacrament at my hands, expired, from the want of proper care and necessities suitable to her afflicting and truly lamentable condition.

That the Almighty may, of his infinite mercy, incline the hearts of the great and good of this kingdom, distinguished for its charity and hospitality, to take under their protection these their unhappy fellow-Christians, (who did not intrude themselves into this country, but were invited hither) and send them whithersoever they in their wisdom and goodness shall think proper, is the most ardent prayer of their and your most obedient servant."

G. A. WACHSEL,

Minister of the German Lutheran St. George's church, in Little Ayloffe-street.

This information reached the ears of the great, the noble, and the royal; and penetrated their hearts with such expedition and abundance of compassion, that testifies the truth of that passage in holy writ, "the mercy of God is over all his works." Of which the reverend Mr. Wachsel published the following account, September 5.

"Your readiness in giving a place to my letter of Thursday last, emboldens me to entreat that you would suffer me to communicate to the public, a brief account of the amazing success with which it hath pleased the Almighty God to bless my endeavours therein for the service of the distressed Palatines; and to testify their most grateful acknowledgments, as well as my own, to the very benevolent inhabitants of this metropolis; for their exceeding liberal and seasonable contributions. When I reflect on the situation of these poor people at the time their case was related to the public, and the change that immediately succeeded, I am really lost in wonder, and overcome with gratitude!

Before eleven in the morning, on which my letter appeared, we received from the Tower, by order of a great personage, one hundred tents, with all necessaries thereunto belonging; by the same bountiful hand the freight of those on board the ships was discharged, and they were released that day. The same morning a servant arrived express from a lady at Islington with twenty pounds. Mr. Baldero, banker in Lombard-street, sent twenty-pounds. Shortly after the earl and countess of Cardigan sent one hundred pounds, ten guineas came from his grace the archbishop of Canterbury, ten guineas from David Berkeley, esq; and sons: ten guineas signed M. W. C. S. From Batson's coffee-house, thirty-one pounds ten shillings, (nearly four hundred pounds have since been received from the same place): five pounds five shillings from the Bedford coffee-house: a bank note No. K. 280, for 100l. and a great number of smaller donations. The contributions since the above have still increased more abundantly."

Crowds of people resorted to the place of their encampment, and, with hearts melted to compassion, gave them what they could spare; to the honour of a benevolent baker, let it be remembered, that even before their case was known, passing by and perceiving their famishing condition, he bestowed upon them his whole basket of bread! By these means they were clothed, their subsistence provided for, physicians, surgeons, and midwives, offered their service for the sick and those in travail, for whom warm apartments were hired. The committee of gentlemen chosen to manage the subscription, upon application to his majesty, had a most gracious answer by Lord Halifax, purporting that the Palatines should be sent and established in South Carolina, and that 150 stands of arms should be delivered out for their use; upon which they contracted for proper vessels to carry them to that colony, and for their provision and maintainance in the voyage, and for a time after their arrival.

The city of London in particular, and the nation in general, having, about this time preferred complaints in parliament, concerning the exorbitant price of provisions; his majesty, in order to prevent all unlawful combinations for enhancing the price of provisions, and encourage those who might discover any concerned in such illegal practices, promised to all persons who should discover, or cause to be discovered such offenders, so as to be convicted, a reward of one hundred pounds, to be paid out of the treasury, without any other warrant in that behalf. When the merchants petition, touching the above complaint, was presented to one of the secretaries of state, a council was immediately called, and after an examination of evidence, his majesty directly ordered his royal proclamation to be issued as abovementioned.

On the twenty eighth of September, there was the highest tide in the river Thames that had been known for many years. Great damages were done by the filling of cellars, and overflowing of the low marshes. Several ships were dashed against each other by the violence of the wind; and in many houses near the river the waters rose two feet in the ground floors.

About ten o'clock at night, on the twenty-fourth of November, a dreadful fire broke out in the workshop of a snuff-maker in Aldersgate-street, which consumed that and several other houses, together with the timber-yard of Mr. Hatton, valued at several thousand pounds. Many persons were hurt, and some lost their lives.

On the fourth of December her royal highness the princess Augusta, sister to his majesty, and consort to his serene highness the hereditary prince of Brunswick, was safely delivered of a princess, to the great joy of that ancient line, as well as universal pleasure of her native country.

During the course of this month, the weather proved extremely boisterous, by which many ships were wrecked, and other very considerable damage was sustained both by sea and land.

The first remarkable circumstance which happened in the year 1765, was, the election of a chamberlain of the city of London, in the room of the late Sir Thomas Harrison, which came on at Guildhall the fifteenth of January. The candidates were, Mr. alderman Janssen, Mr. alderman Turner, Mr. Bonus, Mr. deputy Ellis, Mr. Freeman, Mr. deputy Long, and Mr. Till. On holding up of hands, the sheriffs said they were doubtful which of the two aldermen had the majority, and therefore desired they might be put up a second time, which being done, they declared in favour of Mr. alderman Janssen; but a poll was demanded in behalf of Mr. alderman Turner, Mr. Ellis, Mr. Freeman, Mr. Long, and Mr. Till. After which Mr. alderman Janssen made a very polite speech to the livery, returning them thanks for the great honour conferred on him, and hoped they would support their choice by the poll.

When Mr. Janssen had finished his speech, Mr. alderman Harley (who had been called upon in an advertisement on the Monday preceding, to declare whether he had not received or been promised the general receivership of the land-tax for this city and county of Middlesex) rose up and addressed himself to the livery as follows:

"Gentlemen, and fellow-citizens,

"I am always happy to meet you, when assembled here; particularly when any part of my conduct is called in question. I now find myself called upon in a very extraordinary manner, by a news-writer in the name of the several candidates for the office of chamberlain of this city,

"publicly to declare, whether I have got, or have been promised, the receivership of the land-tax." Now, gentlemen, this is a question that no man has a right to ask me. As to answer the public news-papers any thing I find relative to me, it is my determined resolution never to do it, unless it is signed by a reputable person: but, gentlemen, if it will be the least satisfaction to any one of the candidates, or to any particular liveryman, it is a respect that I shall be glad to shew them, and am both willing and ready to declare here, what I have repeatedly done both publicly and privately for this week past, that I have neither myself, or any person for me, to my knowledge, solicited for the receivership of the land-tax; nor has it ever been offered me. But that I may be clearly understood, (for in every part of my conduct I love to be open and explicit) I do declare that if it should be the intention and resolution of administration to separate the receivership of the land-tax, from the office of chamberlain of London, and it should be offered to me, I shall think myself as much at liberty to accept of it, as any one citizen of London."

On casting up the books at the close of the poll on the twenty-fifth the numbers appeared as follows:

For Mr. Alderman Janssen	1316
Mr. Alderman Turner	1202
Mr. Till	250
Mr. Deputy Ellis	229
Mr. Freeman	180

In consequence of which the former was declared duly elected.

Mr. Alderman Janssen then came forward, and addressed the livery, to the following purpose:

"Gentlemen and fellow citizens,

"The honour you have conferred, by electing me to the important office of chamberlain of this city, calls for my most grateful acknowledgments for so signal a mark of your favour.

"While many of you, gentlemen, have most affectionately recollected my former endeavours to deserve your notice, and have been pleased to call me forth, to offer my services on this occasion, I must confess I was backward in complying; and not for want of an ardent desire to accept your kind invitation, but from a diffidence, natural to one in my situation.

"It was therefore an additional honour to me, to have been thus roused in my state of obscurity, and to have been compelled (as it were) into your service; an obligation greatly heightened by the uncommon unanimity, and remarkable generosity, manifested towards me at so interesting a juncture; it having been out of my power to bias, or in the least to influence, the suffrage of any one of you in my behalf.

"It has given me a still greater satisfaction, that your fortitude alone could have afforded

"me the opportunity of disproving the falsity of those many base and inveterate aspersions of my private enemies, to lessen and depreciate me in the esteem of my fellow citizens; but I am inclined to hope, that even those will now become my friends, who, through misinformation, were before induced to be my enemies."

"I shall trouble you no further, gentlemen, than to assure you, I will do my utmost to convince you, by a faithful and assiduous attention to the trust you have so generously reposed in me, that you have not misplaced your confidence."

This gentleman having reduced his circumstances, by his connections with several public spirited plans, had for some years lived in obscurity, and abridged himself of every superfluity, gradually to compensate the loss of his creditors. Such was his modesty, that he was not without much difficulty prevailed upon to offer himself a candidate for the vacant post; but merit overcame every obstacle, and his grateful fellow-citizens exulted in an opportunity of publicly honouring a man, who had given such abundant and uncommon proofs of his integrity.

On the fourteenth of February Mr. John Williams, bookseller, was, pursuant to his sentence, brought from the King's bench prison, to stand in the pillory in New-palace-yard, Westminster, for re-publishing the North Briton in volumes. A few minutes after twelve he mounted amidst the acclamations of upwards of ten thousand people, who maintained an incessant shout during the hour of his standing. Opposite to the pillory were erected four ladders, with cords running from each other, on which were hung a jack boot, an axe, and a Scotch bonnet. The two latter, after remaining there some time, were burnt, and the boot beheaded. During his stand also, a purple purse ornamented with orange-coloured ribbons, was produced by a gentleman eminent for his patriotism, who began a collection for the benefit of the culprit; after which, the purse being carried round, every one contributed according to pleasure, to the amount in the whole, as was supposed, of more than two hundred guineas. He had a sprig of laurel in his hand all the time, and received, on this occasion, greater and louder marks of the public applause, than would, perhaps, have been given to a foreign prince, at the head of a victorious army.

In the month of April, William, lord Byron, was tried by his peers in Westminster, for the murder of Mr. Chaworth, in a duel at the Star and Garter tavern in Pall-mall; when, after a learned discussion of the case, the peers adjourned to their own house, and after some consideration returned, when they found his lordship guilty of felony, but not of murder.

The law having declared by the 11 and 12 William III. c. 15. sec. 5. "That every mayor, or chief officer of every city, town corporate, borough, or market town, shall, on request to him made, cause all ale-quarts and ale-pints, made of wood, earth, glass, horn, leather, pewter, or other good and wholesome metal, which shall be brought to him, to be measured and sized with the standard in his custody, and shall then cause the same, and every of them, to be plainly and apparently signed, stamped, and marked with W. R. and a crown, for which they shall not receive above one farthing for each measure, on pain of 5l. to be recovered as aforesaid; and he shall also pay to the party grieved treble damages, with costs, by action at law;" the Lord-mayor, in pursuance of this act, summoned the publicans under his jurisdiction, for selling beer in pots that were not sealed with the city mark, according to law. On which occasion a great number of publicans were obliged to pay the penalty of 10s. each.

On the first of May, a great number of journeymen weavers, (jealous that they should not receive the aid they petitioned for to both houses of parliament) with a black flag carried before them, accompanied by their wives and children, went up to St. James's, to represent to his majesty their distressed condition for want of work, occasioned by the importation of French silks, and other foreign goods. Their majesties being gone for Richmond before they reached St. James's, most of them went to Richmond, where one of the lords in waiting, brought them word from his majesty, that he would do all in his power for their relief.

The lord-mayor and court of aldermen, at Guildhall, having notice of the above large body of weavers going up to St. James's, dispatched orders to the beadle of the several wards, to give notice to the constables in every parish, to repair to their respective watch houses, with assistance, and there to remain till further orders, to prevent any riots that might happen.

On the sixteenth they proceeded to St. James's again; and, possessed with an opinion, that the good effect of their petition had been prevented, in a great measure, by his grace the duke of Bedford, they went in a very riotous manner to Bloomsbury-square, with such threatenings of vengeance, that it was thought necessary to send for a strong military force, to prevent their mischievous intentions. They, by this means, were dispersed; but on the seventeenth, in the morning, they assembled again, by beat of drum, in Spital-fields, to the number of more than thirty thousand, from whence they proceeded, in three large bodies, to Westminster. One corps took the rout of Gracechurch-street and London-bridge; from whence they passed over St. George's-fields. Another corps marched along Ludgate-hill, and the Strand, while the third proceeded by way of Holborn and Covent-garden. When united again in Westminster, the crowd was so great, that the members could hardly get to their respective houses. All Old Palace-yard, New Palace-yard, and the streets adjoining, quite as far up as Westminster-bridge, were filled with these poor petitioners, besides multitudes of others that were in the Park. Before them, in their march, flags of various colours were borne by the women, particularly a French silk handkerchief, with a golden border on it, and a cross of gold in the middle; a large piece of French spotted silk, said to have been procured from the shop of a mercer a mercer in town, and three or four pieces of French lace, &c. The men wore red cockades and shreds of silk in their hats. In Westminster, they stopped the carriages of the members, as they went to the house, praying them to take pity on the poor weavers, but behaved in all other respects with the greatest good order. To prevent any tumult, however, the first troop of horse-guards, with a party of horse-grenadiers, and three companies of the foot-guards, all under arms, and headed by their proper officers, were ordered from the parade to Old Palace-yard, where they were drawn up in two lines before Westminster-hall, to clear the passage for the members to get to the house. They continued assembled till near four o'clock, when being informed by their heads, that hand-bills would be distributed next day, which would allay all their fears, and every other necessary step be taken for their advantage, they were recommended to separate peaceably, and accordingly began their march home again; so that by five, the streets round Westminster-hall were entirely cleared of them. Sir John Fielding, and his brother justices had attended at the New Guildhall all the time; at which place there was also a conference between the chieftains of the weavers, to the number of about four hundred, their masters, and the mercers, when it was agreed by the latter, immediately to recall all their contracts for foreign goods, and set the journeymen instantly to work. But though this had so good an effect, that it contributed, perhaps, more than any thing else, to disperse them; yet, in their return, they said they should not depend entirely upon promises, and talked of getting the watermen to join them. A body of them even went to Bloomsbury-square, where they pulled down the stone posts, and part of the wall, before the duke of Bedford's house, with the rails in the road to Figg-lane, besides ploughing up the ground in the middle of the square, and doing other damage. These outrages being apprehended to be dangerous, a party of the horse-guards had been added to the foot, which had been placed there the night before; but the mob was so unruly, that they tore up the very pavement to supply them with stones to pelt the guards: in consequence of which much mischief was done, many of the soldiers were cut and wounded, and several of the people trampled down by the horses. These outrages continued a great part of the night.

Another party went to Mr. Carr's, a silk mercer, on Ludgate-hill, where they demolished the windows, broke the lamps at the door, and did other mischief. In consequence of this, between seven and eight o'clock, the lord-mayor, attended by the sheriffs, recorder, city-marshal, and sword-bearer, with a number of peace-officers, repaired to the spot; but his lordship was obliged to leave his coach in St. Paul's church-yard, from whence he proceeded on foot to Mr. Carr's, when the recorder told the populace, that unless they dispersed, the riot act should be read. His lordship then repaired to the Globe-tavern in Fleet-street, and attended there with his brethren for some time. About nine in the evening, a strong party of horse, with another of foot, were drawn up before Mr. Carr's house, but happily the night passed without any farther disorder.

A court of aldermen had previously met the morning before, to consult on proper methods for preventing the ill consequences that might arise from so large a body of people daily assembling, a party of guards from the Tower, did duty all the night of the sixteenth, in Moorfields; another party had been sent for the same night to Spitalfields, on account of the mob breaking the windows there of some master-weavers, who were reported to have had French silks in their houses, particularly of one in Princess-street, whose windows were entirely demolished. And early on the seventeenth, another party of guards, attended by a great number of constables, headboroughs, &c. marched from Hicks's-hall to Moorfields, to be at hand against any further riots.

Their principal orator was one Jones, a Welshman. This person received the message when they were at St. James's, after which he drew his brethren off to the Green-park, and signified what had passed from a tree. He also made a long harangue to them in Old Palace-yard, persuading them to disperse, and seemed to conduct himself with a good deal of modesty and decorum; he personally having no other view in taking the lead on that occasion, but to keep his brethren from running into any excess that might be construed a breach of the laws, or disaffection to the government, as he himself declared.

About this time the court of common-council voted the freedom of the city, in a gold box, to the duke of Gloucester; previous to which the Grocers presented his royal highness with the freedom of their company.

Between six and seven o'clock in the evening, on the first of June, a dreadful fire broke out in a maff-yard near Rotherhithe church, which in a few hours consumed upwards of two hundred and six houses. It also burnt the inside of a brigg; but the wind driving the flames off from the water-side, there was no other damage done to the shipping, which otherwise, in all probability, would have greatly suffered. The fire was said to have been occasioned by a pitch-kettle boiling over, which set the masts and timber in the yard all in flames. Great contributions were made in the city for the relief of the sufferers; and so generously, that it exceeded the sums required to restore their losses. And on the twenty-first, about ten o'clock at night, another dreadful fire broke out in the sail-cloth warehouse of Mr. Bovan, at Gun-dock, Wapping, which, in a few hours, destroyed that and about thirty dwelling-houses, besides warehouses and other out-buildings. A ship in Gun-dock took fire, but by cutting away the masts, &c. was saved. Most of the poor inhabitants lost their all, and several had their arms and legs broke in endeavouring to save their children.

By a general act of parliament passed this session, all waggons and carts, with nine inch wheels, passing through any turnpike gate or bar, after the twenty-fourth of June, are to pay full toll, unless they are so constructed as to roll a surface of sixteen inches, and in that case only half toll; and all narrow wheels are to pay one-half toll more more than the nine inch wheels, except carts and carriages drawn by one horse and two oxen, and no more, having six inch wheels. And no person, by virtue of any act of parliament, is to have claim, or take the benefit or advantage of any exemption from tolls, unless the fellys of the wheels are nine inches broad.

About this time the inhabitants of the city of London and its suburbs were greatly alarmed, by many incendiary letters, threatening fire and destruction, which had been dropped in many parts of London. No less than seven or eight trains laid for this desperate purpose, were discovered and defeated within a few weeks. Several of the incendiaries were taken into custody, and the utmost precaution used to prevent the execution of their horrid designs.

Her majesty being safely delivered of a prince on the twenty-first of August (afterwards christened by the name of William Henry) the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council waited on his majesty the twenty-eighth with the following congratulatory address on the occasion :

The humble address of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled.

“ Most gracious sovereign,

“ We your majesty’s ever loyal and faithful subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, humbly beseech your majesty to accept our most sincere and dutiful congratulations on the safe delivery of the queen, and the auspicious birth of another prince.

“ The joyful event of an increase in your majesty’s illustrious family, will always be gratefully considered by us as a further substantial security to the civil and religious liberties of this your majesty’s free and native country.

“ Every addition to your majesty’s domestic happiness fills our hearts with the highest pleasure and satisfaction ; and fully confiding that your majesty’s royal sentiments ever coincide with the united wishes of your faithful people, we gladly embrace every opportunity of testifying our joy, and laying our congratulations at your majesty’s feet.

“ Permit us, therefore, royal Sir, to assure your majesty, that your faithful citizens of London, from their zealous attachment to your royal house, and the true honour and dignity of your crown, whenever a happy establishment of public measures shall present a favourable occasion, will be ready to exert their utmost abilities in support of such wise councils as apparently tend to render your majesty’s reign happy and glorious.”

To which address his majesty was pleased to return this most gracious answer :

“ I thank you for this dutiful address. Your congratulations on the further increase of my family, and your assurances of zealous attachment to it, cannot but be very agreeable to me. I have nothing so much at heart, as the welfare and happiness of my people ; and have the greatest satisfaction in every event that may be an additional security to those civil and religious liberties upon which the prosperity of these kingdoms depend.”

The above address was but ill received by the new ministry, who thought themselves highly reflected on.

On the twenty-fifth, about four o’clock in the morning, a fire broke out at a house opposite the Ship tavern, Ratcliff-cross, which consumed between twenty and thirty houses, and did considerable damage to many others. The flames were so rapid, that most of the inhabitants lost all their effects, to the amount of twenty thousand pounds.

About nine o’clock at night, on the eighth of October, a most extraordinary phenomenon appeared in the air over the city of London. At first a strong light was seen on the gravel and paved walks in the Temple, bright enough to pick up a pin ; which surprize was encreased on the beholders looking upwards, when a globe of ruddy fire was seen descending from a great altitude over Temple-bar, as large as the full moon a little after her rising ; and taking its course obliquely towards the river Thames, as if it would have fallen therein ; but coming low and over the same, it shot itself into a sheet of fire, with one edge turned towards the water, in the form of a boy’s kite, with head, wings and tail, appearing half as long, and in one part twice as broad, as Fleet-street. It fell or vanished on the Southwark side of the water, in a yellow fire, to the surprize not only of all the watermen there on that part of the river, but of all the spectators, who declared they had never beheld the like appearance before.

At a court of common-council held at Guildhall, on the fifteenth of October, it was resolved to present the freedom of the city, in a gold box, to his serene highness the hereditary prince of Brunswick. And on the twenty-second they agreed to grant, as a benefaction to the society of arts and sciences in the Strand, the sum of five hundred pounds.

To so great a height was the spirit of monopoly and oppression got at this time, that the very retailers of milk, in and about this metropolis, attempted to raise the price of that commodity from three-halfpence to two-pence halfpenny a wine quart, which they purchase at a penny Winchester measure ; and in some parts they carried their point ; though the price was afterwards settled at two-pence the quart.

At a very numerous meeting of the grand jury, and other principal inhabitants of the borough of Southwark, at their Town-hall, it was unanimously agreed to give the following instructions to their members :

To Sir Joseph Mawbey, bart. and Henry Thrale, esq; representatives in parliament for the town and borough of Southwark.

5 I

Gentlemen

" Gentlemen,

" We, the grand jury for the town and borough of Southwark, and others the inhabitants thereof, this day assembled in the Town-hall, sensibly touched with the just complaints of the poor of this borough, as well as of those of the nation in general, occasioned by the present enormous price of every necessary of life, and the almost total stagnation of many valuable branches of our manufactures in consequence thereof, think we should be wanting in the duty we owe to our fellow-inhabitants, did we not employ every means in our power to procure a removal of this national evil.

" Actuated by these motives, gentlemen, we take this early opportunity to instruct you, our representatives in the great council of the land, to use your utmost efforts, and influence to attain this salutary purpose, and as we apprehend nothing will so readily effect this, as the immediate prohibition of the exportation of all sort of grain, that of bread corn more especially (to the current price of which indispensable necessary of life, that of every other article bears so great a proportion) we do hereby require and intrust you to exert your best endeavours in parliament to obtain such prohibition, or such other wholesome law as the body of the legislature shall in its wisdom judge most expedient to put a stop to this crying grievance.

" In giving you these instructions, gentlemen, we firmly believe that we speak your own sentiments, who, as persons of generosity and humanity, cannot but feel for the distresses of the poor."

On the thirty-first of October, between seven and eight o'clock in the evening, his royal highness William, duke of Cumberland, died suddenly at his house in Upper Grosvenor-street. His royal highness was at court in the morning, dined with lord Albemarle in the afternoon, and drank tea with the princess of Brunswick at St. James's; from whence he came to his own house in the evening, to be present at a council to be held on affairs of state. As soon as he came in, he complained of a pain in the shoulder, with a cold and shivering fit, and desired to be laid on the couch, which was done; but in about twenty minutes after expired without the least struggle.

On opening the body there was found in the right ventricle of the brain, a coagulation of extravasated blood, about the size of a pigeon's egg, which was the cause of his death. All the noble parts were sound, except the membrane between the lobes of the brain, which was ossified.

His royal highness gave near six thousand pounds a year in private charity: and though he did not allow his workmen at Windsor (where he generally resided) greater wages than the rest of the country, he allowed them every day at noon table beer, and bread and cheese, and generally twice a week a hot dinner. This his royal highness called Old English hospitality.

On the eighth of November, the body and urn of his royal highness were conveyed from Grosvenor-square to the prince's chamber in the house of lords, in a hearse drawn by six white horses, adorned with white feathers. The next evening, about ten o'clock, a signal from Westminster-bridge, by the firing a sky-rocket, was given, that the funeral procession of his royal highness was begun, which signal being answered by another from the centre arch of London-bridge, minute guns were immediately fired at the Tower, and so continued, until, by second signals from the same places, it was known the funeral ceremony was ended. The great bells in several of the churches in London and Westminster also continued to toll, until the funeral was over.

The procession was made through Old Palace-yard to the south-east door of the abbey, upon a floor railed in, covered with black cloth, and lined on each side with a party of the foot-guards.

At the entrance of Westminster-abbey, within the church, the dean and prebendaries attended by the choir, received the body, falling into the procession just before the officer of arms, who conducted the lord-chamberlain; and so proceeded into king Henry VIIIth's chapel, where the body was deposited on tressels, the head towards the altar: the coronet and cushion being laid upon the coffin, and the canopy held over it, while the service was read by the dean of Westminster; the chief mourner and his two supporters, sitting on chairs, at the head of the corpse; the lords assistants, and supporters of the pall sitting on stools on either side.

The part of the service before the interment being read, the corpse was deposited in the vault, and the dean having finished the burial service, Garter proclaimed his royal highness's style as follows:

Thus it hath pleased Almighty God to take out of this transitory life, unto his divine mercy, the late most high, most mighty, and most illustrious prince William Augustus, duke of Cumberland, and duke of Brunswick and Lunenburgh, marquis of Berkhamsstead, earl of Kennington, viscount Trematon, baron of the isle of Alderney, knight of the most noble order of the garter, and first and principal companion of the most honourable order of the bath, second son of his late most excellent majesty king George the second.

Twenty-one pieces of artillery were drawn into the park, and fired minute guns during the ceremony; and three battalions, viz. one of each regiment of guards, were drawn up in St. Margaret's church-yard, and fired volleys, on a signal given, as soon as the corpse was deposited.

A very eminent historical writer gives the following character of the above illustrious prince:

" A review of his life, says he, will afford a most shining example of patriotism, valour, justice, friendship, sincerity and humanity. Inflexibly attached to the interest of his country, he braved every danger, nor indulged a thought of life, when called on his sovereign's duty. Patriotic from principle, he gave sanction to wise and constitutional measures; nor feared

to

“ to discountenance the schemes of oppression, ambition and avarice. Conscientiously just, he rewarded merit irrespective of rank, nor suffered the dignified minion to escape his resentment. Refined in his friendship, he sweetened life by a judicious selection of worthy men to partake at his hospitable board, and amuse his leisure hours with an unreserved affability of converse. Inviolably sincere, he never promised without deliberation, or the most punctual performance of his engagements. Above all, sympathetically humane, and extensively generous, his royal heart never failed to feel, nor his royal hand to relieve the distresses of his fellow creatures, of every age, sex, and condition. Nay, he sought opportunities for doing good, and studied plans for the employment of the poor. With these virtues preponderate, his foibles may be easily assigned to oblivion, especially when it is remembered, that to err is the lot of humanity, but to do good is the property of piety. If some from prejudice may deem our description exaggerated, we presume others from justice will allow it but adequate, nor refrain a tributary tear at the loss of so eminent a compound of all that was great, excellent, and amiable in human nature.” See Clarendon's History of England, vol. II. page. 552.

About three o'clock in the morning, on the seventh of November, a most terrible fire broke out at a peruke-makers, near the end of Bishopsgate-street, next Cornhill; when the wind being high and westerly, the flames soon spread to the corner house, and from thence to the opposite side, and set fire to a millener's; and it being some time before assistance could be got, the fire soon communicated itself to all the four corner houses, which was burning at one time: the pastry-cook's house at the head of Cornhill was greatly damaged; the opposite pastry-cook's the corner of Gracechurch-street was destroyed; all the houses from the corner of Cornhill to the church of St. Martin Outwich, the corner of Threadneedle-street, excepting the parsonage house, were consumed; and the said church likewise taking fire, a part of the steeple was soon burnt down, whereby the great bell in it fell with a prodigious noise; the inside of the church was next consumed, and the flames spread to the back of Threadneedle-street, where several houses were entirely burnt down to the ground; every house in White-lion-court; among them the White-lion tavern, which was bought but the evening before, at nine o'clock, for between two and three thousand pounds. The back part of Merchant-tailors-hall received some damage. Five houses on the Exchange-side of Cornhill, and upwards of twenty in Leadenhall-street, were entirely consumed. On the whole, it was computed that this fire destroyed upwards of one hundred houses, and did more damage than the memorable fire, which broke out opposite the Royal-Exchange on the twenty-fifth of March 1748, the loss being computed at 100,000*l.* of which a considerable part was uninsured.—A gentleman who attended at this fire, thinking that many persons might be still alive under the rubbish, ventured among them the next day, before the fire was quite extinguished, and, waving his hat upon the top of a pile of ruins to engage the attention of the spectators, declared that he was sure many were actually under the spot on which he stood. Upon this the firemen, with their pick-axes, came to their assistance, and dug out alive two men, three women, a child about six years old, a dog and two cats. The next day as some workmen were clearing out the cellar of a tobacconist, whose house had been burnt, a stack of chimnies fell suddenly, by which eight persons lost their lives, and several had their limbs crushed in a most shocking manner. Subscriptions were immediately set on foot for the relief of the uninsured sufferers by this fire, and soon produced 3000*l.* of which his majesty was pleased to contribute 1000*l.* the grocers and ironmongers company one hundred pounds each, and the Lord-mayor fifty pounds, a handsome part of which was distributed amongst the unfortunate widows and children of the men who were killed by the falling of the stack of chimnies.

On the twenty-seventh the right honourable the lord Cambden gave his opinion upon the granting of general warrants by secretaries of state, which some days before had been learnedly argued in his presence. After enlarging upon and explaining numbers of cases, which lasted upwards of two hours, his lordship declared it, as the unanimous opinion of the court, that such warrants (except in cases of high treason) were illegal, oppressive and unwarrantable.

The court of common-council having referred to the commissioners of sewers and pavements the consideration of the most effectual way to correct the complaints of bad pavements and other nuisances within the limits of the city jurisdiction, they made a representation of what they had considered in the manner and form following:

To the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled.

The humble representation of the commissioners of the sewers and pavements within the said city and liberties,

Sheweth,

That they, the commissioners of the sewers, having received frequent complaints of bad pavements, and other nuisances, within the limits of our jurisdiction, and having found our repeated endeavours to correct the same ineffectual, we think it incumbent on us to represent to this honourable court:

1. That the pavements are in general rough and irregular, and in many of the principal streets very defective and bad, chiefly owing, as we conceive, to their being partially and at different times, and with different materials, repaired by the several inhabitants themselves, to the frequent breaches made therein by the different water companies, and to their slight and insufficient manner of patching up the same.

2. That

2. That the prevailing method of placing the channels in the middle of the streets, which are generally made very deep, and in many cases (sometimes necessarily) attended with cross channels, renders the coach-way very disagreeable and unsafe to passengers, as well as highly detrimental to horses and carriages.

3. That the too common practice of the lower sort of inhabitants, and servants, throwing ashes, rubbish, broken glass, and earthen ware, offals, and other offensive things, into the streets, stops the current of the channels, makes the highway very inconvenient, and sometimes dangerous to coach, horse and foot passengers, and even to the health of the neighbouring inhabitants.

4. That the passage of some of the greatest thoroughfares is often obstructed by the loading and unloading of stage coaches, stage-waggons, and country carts, and by the washing of butts, casks, and barrels, in the highway.

5. That the foot-ways, by not being raised above the level of the streets, are much annoyed with mud, and frequently overflowed with water, which renders them disagreeable and slippery in moist, and very dangerous in frosty weather; a nuisance every day accumulated by the neglect of the householders to cause their servants to scrape and sweep away the mud from before their houses.

6. That posts intended for the security of passengers, do but in part answer that intention, considerably lessen the passage on both sides, in streets already too narrow, and, by their irregularity and aptness to decay, offend the eye, at the same time that they occasion an expence which might be entirely saved by raising the foot-way a little higher.

That several of the foot-ways are encumbered with goods and packages, and others of them streightened by the unwarrantable projection of shop-windows, bulks, and shew-boards, or the more dangerous encroachments of vaults and cellar doors.

8. That the daily increasing rivalry in the size and projection of signs in a great measure defeats the purpose of them, obstructs the free circulation of the air, (so desirable in a large and populous city) in times of high wind often proves dangerous, and in rain always an annoyance to foot-passengers, and at night, more or less, intercepts the light of the lamps.

9. That foot-passengers are likewise greatly annoyed, in rainy weather, by the water conveyed from the tops of old houses through spouts projecting into the streets.

10. That for the want of the streets and courts being properly marked and distinguished, and the houses regularly numbered, strangers are often put to great trouble and difficulty to find their way to places and persons they have occasion to resort to.

From this view of the many nuisances and defects which lessen the beauty, neatness, and convenience of this great and famous metropolis, we humbly conceive, that every person (not bigotted to ancient forms and customs, or biased by narrow considerations of immediate interest) must be convinced of the necessity of a speedy reformation, without which the little of our retail trade that remains will in time be totally lost, our wards and parishes depopulated, and the burthen of our offices and taxes proportionally increased.

To obviate the objection which, in the minds of some, may arise from a dread of the expence attending the proposed regulations, and which can only be defrayed by a new tax, we humbly beg leave to offer it as our opinion, that a very moderate tax, little exceeding the average of the present ordinary repairs, might, by borrowing a sum of money upon the credit of it, be sufficient to answer the expence, not only of the first outset, but of all necessary reparations for many years to come; that the difference (if any) would be more than amply compensated by the preservation, not to say recovery, of our retail trade, and that every ground of complaint of oppression or partiality might be effectually removed, if the proposed reformation was limited to streets, the major part of whose inhabitants should apply for and request it.

To enable ourselves to form this conjecture, as well as others to judge of its probability, we have enquired the prices contracted for by the commissioners for the new pavement at Westminster, have caused the streets from Temple-bar to Aldgate-church to be surveyed and measured, and different estimates to be made of the proposed improvements within that distance; from all which we have formed the following computation:

AN ESTIMATE of the expence of altering all the paving from Temple-bar, proceeding eastward up Fleet-street, Ludgate-hill, Ludgate-street, all round the south-side of St. Paul's, along Cheapside, the Poultry, Cornhill, Leaden-hall-street, and home to Aldgate-church.

GEORGE DANCE.

A tax of 12d. in the pound upon the rents of the front houses, which we find to amount to the sum of 47,800l. and upwards would raise the yearly sum of.

And as it seems reasonable that the neighbouring inhabitants, whose houses do not front the high streets, ought to contribute towards the expence of improvements of which they will equally enjoy the benefit, we think the proposed tax should extend to all houses in the adjoining yards, courts, and alleys, but with a power of mitigation in favour of the inferior and poorer sort of householders; which discretionary tax we estimate at the yearly sum of 150 0 0

Total of the tax per annum —

2540 0 0

On the other hand the interest of 17000l. (which is more than the larger estimate requires) at 4l. per cent. would amount to the yearly sum of

680 0 0

We estimate the future annual repairs at 400 0 0

And the proportionable share of the additional salaries of offices, surveyors, &c. at 200 0 0

1280 0 0

Which total charge being deducted from the amount of the tax, will leave a surplus of 1260l. per annum, applicable to a gradual discharge of the principal money borrowed, which it would compleat in about eleven years; and, if parliament (who have been so liberal in their encouragement to the improvements at Westminster) should be prevailed on to grant us the benefit of a Sunday's toll, the whole debt might be paid off, and the tax reduced, in a much shorter time.

It remains only to be considered what further powers will be requisite for the execution of the plan in question, in case it should meet with the approbation of this honourable court; for which purpose we humbly conceive that we cannot better inform or direct their judgment than by a faithful enumeration of the many defects we have experienced in the exercise of our present authority: we therefore beg leave to represent,

1. That, whatever might have been the original intention and legal construction of our authority as to pavements, at the time of its creation, we are advised, that the constant and uniform method in which it hath been exercised for near a century, as well as the implied interpretation of it by some late statutes, restrain it wholly to the ordering, designing, and regulating, the manner of the paving; so that (except in two cases, viz. that of untenanted, or where a defect complained of continues unreformed) we have no power to interfere with the paving itself, or (the former of those cases only excepted) to assess or levy any tax for the doing of it.

2. That we have no authority to try or punish even the most petty offenders in a summary way; the paviours and rakers, who are by law enjoined to obey our orders, and who we may fine for disobedience, having it in their election whether they will submit to such fine or not; so that, in fact, we have no other way to enforce our orders, or to remove nuisances of any kind, but by indictment at the sessions, which, as it generally proves a very tedious and expensive (and sometimes a fruitless) remedy, without any fund appropriated to support the charge of it, is seldom pursued.

3. That we have no particular controul over the water companies, to compel them to repair, in a proper and sufficient manner, or within a reasonable time, the several breaches which their workmen are daily making in the pavement of some or other of our most frequented streets.

4. That we have no authority to pull up or remove any posts, though found to be ever so inconvenient to the public.

5. That we have no kind of jurisdiction over signs, nor authority to affix any marks to houses; whereby to distinguish them or the streets they stand in.

Having presumed to trouble this honourable court with our sentiments upon a subject with which the duty of our office seems in some sort connected, and in which the honour of this city, and the interest of its inhabitants, appears to us to be greatly concerned, we humbly submit it to their superior wisdom, how far they will think proper to adapt a plan so successfully pursued in the city of Westminster, and what measures it may be expedient to take for carrying the same into execution. Dated at Guildhall, the fifteenth day of November 1765. By order of court.

John Smith, clerk to the commissioners.

An act of common-council being soon after passed, a petition was presented from the corporation to the house of commons, praying that a bill might be brought in to pave the city of London, pursuant to the said order. The last circumstance which closes the year 1765 was the death of his royal highness prince Frederick William, youngest brother to his present majesty, which happened on the twenty-ninth of December, at his house in Leicester-square. His royal highness, at the time of his death, was in the sixteenth year of his age.

CHAPTER XLIX.

The American stamp-act repealed. Great rejoicings on the occasion. Weavers relieved by parliament. Act for new paving the city of London. City gates pulled down. Riots occasioned by the high price of provisions. Proclamation against forestallers. Marriage of her royal highness princess Carolina Matilda. Remarkable storm of thunder and lightning. Great frost. Violent hurricane. Fire in the Strand. State of the city hospitals. Death of the duke of York.

THE year 1766 began with a very warm contest in the house of commons respecting the repeal or continuance of the American stamp-act; and perhaps there scarce ever was any affair debated in a British parliament, in which the public thought themselves more deeply interested, or for the result of which they felt a more impatient anxiety. Petitions were received from the merchants of London, Bristol, Liverpool, Lancaster, Hull, Glasgow, &c. and indeed from most of the trading and manufacturing towns and boroughs in the kingdom, setting forth the great decay of their trade, owing to the new laws and regulations made for America. Petitions were likewise received from the agents for Virginia and Georgia, setting forth their inability to pay the stamp duty. But neither the arguments nor facts contained in the petitions could prevail on the party who had resolved to support the stamp act at all events, to remit in the least of their ardor.

No matter of debate was ever more ably and learnedly handled in both houses. The subject was of the highest importance, and it was not without difficulties both constitutional and political, in the discussion and in the consequences. On the question being put, the power of the legislature of Great Britain over her colonies, in all cases whatsoever, and without any distinction in regard to taxation, was confirmed and ascertained without a division. And this was, perhaps, the only question that could have been thought of, upon which the ministry, and their antagonists in the opposition, would have gone together on a division.

The grand committee who had passed the resolutions on which the foregoing question was debated, had also passed another for the total repeal of the stamp-act; and two bills were accordingly brought in to answer these purposes. By the resolutions on which the former was founded, it was declared, that tumults and insurrections of the most dangerous nature had been raised and carried on in several of the colonies, in open defiance of government, and in manifest violation of the laws and legislative authority of this kingdom. That these tumults and insurrections had been encouraged and inflamed by several votes and resolutions which had passed in the assemblies of the said colonies, derogatory to the honour of government, and destructive to their legal and constitutional dependency on the crown and parliament.

By the bill itself, all votes, resolutions, or orders, which had been passed by any of the general assemblies in America, by which they assumed to themselves the sole and exclusive right of taxing his majesty's subjects in the colonies, were annulled, and declared contrary to law, derogatory to the legislative authority of parliament, and inconsistent with their dependency upon the crown.

The opposition, far from being dispirited, seemed to gather fresh vigour, and still opposed the repeal in every part of its progress: but notwithstanding all their endeavours, the bill passed upon a division, by a majority of 275 to 167, and was carried up to the house of lords by above two hundred members of the house of commons, where it met with a strong opposition; thirty-three lords entered a protest against it at the second reading, as did twenty-eight at the third. At last, however, it was carried through by a majority of thirty-four; and on the eighteenth of March his majesty went to the house of peers, and gave his royal assent to the same.

On this occasion the American merchants made a most numerous appearance to express their joy and gratitude; the ships in the river displayed their colours; great numbers of houses in the city were illuminated; and every decent and orderly method was observed, to demonstrate the just sense that was entertained of his majesty's goodness, and the wisdom of parliament in conciliating the minds of the people on this critical occasion.

On the fourteenth of May, his majesty having given the royal assent, among others, to "the bill to prohibit the importation of foreign wrought silks and velvets for a limited time," several thousand weavers went to St. James's, with colours flying, drums beating, and music playing, playing, and testified their gratitude by loud acclamations of joy.

At the same time his majesty signed the act for better paving, lighting and cleansing the city of London, and to prevent annoyances therein, and for other purposes. The particulars of which act run thus :

“ That, from and after the passing of this act, the sole power and authority of pitching, paving, cleansing and enlightening the streets, &c, is vested in the mayor and commonalty of London, to be executed by such persons as they, in common-council assembled, shall appoint to be commissioners of the sewers, which commissioners of the sewers shall be constituted commissioners for carrying this act into execution.

“ The recorder and common-serjeant of the said city of London, for the time being, are to be commissioners, and seven commissioners are to be a quorum.

“ The commissioners are to meet on or before the twenty-fourth of June 1766, with power to adjourn; and the mayor may appoint special meetings.

“ The commissioners shall and may appoint clerks, surveyors, and as many other officers as they shall find necessary; and the said commissioners shall take such security as they shall think proper, and may remove any of the said officers at their will and pleasure, and appoint others in their room, with such salaries as they shall judge reasonable.

“ The penalty on exactions of clerks, surveyors, and other officers, is, that every person so offending shall from henceforth for ever be incapable of being employed under this act, and shall, over and above, forfeit and pay the sum of 50*l.* to any who shall sue for the same, within six calendar months next after the offence committed.

“ Non-freemen may be employed in paving, cleansing, &c. any of the streets, &c. and may contract for the performance of the said works, or any of them, as the commissioners shall think fit. No common-council-man shall be concerned in any contract.

“ The general powers granted to the commissioners are, that they may cause all or any of the streets, lanes, squares, yards, courts, alleys, passages, and places, to be new paved, or repaired, when, and as often, and in such manner, and with such materials, as they shall think fit, and may cause such posts, as they shall think useless or inconvenient, to be taken up and removed; and likewise all steps, bulks, shew-glasses, and shew-boards, incroaching upon the foot-ways; as also all steps and doors, opening or leading from the foot-ways into vaults or cellars, to be removed or altered.

“ The streets that are to be first paved and enlightened are the great streets from Temple-bar to Whitechapel-bars, and they are to be paved with the stone known by the name of whyn quarry stone, or with rock stone, or with stone of a flat surface. And a passage for carriages

“ is to be open on the north side of St. Paul's, whilst the south side is repairing.

“ The commissioners are also hereby impowered to have taken down and removed all signs, or other emblems, used to denote the trade, occupation, or calling of any person or persons, together with the sign-posts, sign-irons, pent-houses, shew-boards, spouts, and gutters, and all other incroachments, projections, and annoyances whatsoever, within the said city or liberties; and for the future all such signs, &c. are to be fixed on the fronts of the houses, and not otherwise; and every person, offending contrary to these directions, for every such offence, is to forfeit and pay the sum of 5*l.* and the further sum of 20*s.* for every day such offence shall continue.

“ Cranes shall be kept close to the walls of warehouses; and, after the 24th of June, 1766, no waggon shall, for the purpose of loading and unloading the same, stand in the streets above an hour; nor any cart, waggon, dray, or other carriage, be suffered to stand athwart or across any street, &c. or otherwise, longer than is necessary for the loading or unloading thereof; nor any goods, materials or things whatsoever, to be laid or placed in any street, &c. so as to obstruct the passage thereof: and in every such offence, any one of the commissioners, or officers by them appointed to remove nuisances, may seize the waggon, cart, dray, or other carriage, so placed together with the horse or horses; or the goods, materials, and things so laid and left, and remove the same to the common pound of the city, commonly called the Greenyard, till claimed by the owner or owners, on payment of the sum of 20*s.* with the charges of removing and keeping the same; and, in case of non-claiming and payment within the space of three days next after such seizure, it shall be lawful for the commissioners to appraise and sell the same, and the monies arising therefrom are to be applied to the purposes of this act. This clause extends to seizing, pouncing, and selling in like manner, any posts, bars, rails, boards or other thing, by way of inclosure for the purpose of making mortar, or depositing bricks, lime or other materials for building or repairing houses, or other works, if suffered to remain any longer time than is necessary. The claiming of them before sold is limited to the space of eight days.

“ No lime is to be slacked in the foot or carriage way of the streets, &c. nor in any house, but only on vacant sites, where any house or houses are totally pulled down in order to be rebuilt, on the penalty of forty shillings.

“ The penalty of driving any bier, wheel or wheels, sledge, wheel-barrow or other carriage whatsoever, or wilfully riding, leading, or driving, any horse, coach, or other carriage whatsoever, upon any part of the foot-pavements, is 10*s.* for the first offence; 20*s.* for the second; and 40*s.* for the third, and every other time of offending. Any person whatever, without any other warrant, who shall see any such “ such offence committed, may seize the offender, “ and convey him to the custody of a justice of “ peace, before whom he must be convicted upon “ oath.

“ The names of streets, &c. are to be put up, “ painted, engraved, or described in stone or “ otherwise at or near each end, corner or en“ trance, of each of the streets, &c. and the “ houses are to be numbered, in order to the di“ stinguishing them; and the penalty of malici“ ously defacing or obliterating the same, for “ every such offence, is 40s.

“ The form of the new pavement is not to be “ altered without authority from the commission“ ers, on the penalty of 5l. over and above the “ expence of relaying and reinstating the same.
 “ But the pavements are to be repaired on com“ plaint; and, when water-pipes are broken,
 “ and the pavement taken up for repairing them,
 “ the ground must be filled up within four days “ after, upon the penalty of the paviour of the “ water-company, to whom the pipes belong, “ paying 5l. or the owners of such pipes, not “ belonging to any of the water-companies, pay“ ing forty shillings. The pavours of the water-“ companies are to give notice of their names, “ &c. and the water companies are to pay the “ expence of new laying the pavement, when “ the pipes are broken, &c. The expence of “ alterations in the pipes is to be defrayed out of “ the monies arising or to arise by virtue of this “ act, and lifts of the turn-cocks are to be de“ livered to the householders.

“ The commissioners shall have full power to “ cause the streets to be watered as often as they “ shall think fit, and to have wells sunk and “ pumps erected in proper places, for that or any “ other purpose; likewise dust holes erected,
 “ where the occupiers of houses and tenements “ are required to have all their dust, ashes, and “ other filth to be deposited, till the same shall be “ carried away by the respective rakers or sca“ vengers. The person offending contrary to “ this clause is to forfeit ten shillings for every “ offence.

“ The foot-ways are to be cleaned daily by the “ occupiers of houses or tenements, under the “ penalty of two shillings.

“ The commissioners are empowered to direct “ the setting up of lamps in such a manner, and
 “ at such distances, as they shall judge proper,
 “ and at what time they are to be lighted, and “ how long to continue so; the commissioners are “ also to direct the placing of private lamps.

“ The property of the pavements, &c. are “ vested in the mayor, commonalty, and citizens, “ of the city of London, and all actions and “ indictments are to be preferred in their name.

“ From and after the 29th of September, “ 1766, rates are to be collected half-yearly, or “ oftener, as the commissioners shall think fit to “ order, and not to exceed 1s. 6d. in the pound
 “ in any one year, in the whole of the yearly “ rents of lands, houses, shops, warehouses, “ cellars, vaults, or other tenements or heredi-“ taments respectively, as shall be situate in any “ street, &c. actually begun to be new paved;
 “ and 1s. in the pound of the yearly rents of “ such of the lands, houses, &c. as shall not be “ so situate. Those lands, houses, &c. are such “ as are actually rated towards the relief of the “ poor in the respective parishes; and the owners “ of large warehouses, &c. and poor tradesmen, “ manufacturers, &c. upon petition to the com“ missioners, are intitled to relief, as they shall “ think just and reasonable. The parties con“ cerned, thinking themselves aggrieved, by the “ award of the commissioners, may appeal to the “ court of mayor and aldermen, who shall finally “ determine what relief to be granted.

“ The several aldermen of the city or their “ respective deputies, are empowered to examine “ poor's rates and land-tax books. Duplicates “ of the rates are to be made out and signed; and “ collectors are to be chosen annually, on St.
 “ Thomas's-day. 50l. is the penalty on refusing “ to serve, and, notwithstanding, the party or “ parties continue liable to be chosen again the “ year following, or at any other time; and are “ liable to the like penalty so often as they refuse “ or neglect to take and duly execute the same.
 “ In case of death, or refusal, the alderman of “ each respective ward may appoint others, under “ the like penalty; and the only persons exempt“ ed are those who are so by the laws now in be“ ing from serving any ward office.

“ Inmates, or the occupiers of houses in lodg“ ings or tenements, are to pay the rates, but “ are to be allowed the same out of their rents
 “ by the owners.

“ Public buildings, hospitals excepted, may “ be rated at 4d. per square yard, and dead walls
 “ at 6d. per yard running measure. St. Paul's “ church and yard are to be rated by the alder“ man of Castle-baynard ward, or his deputy, at “ such rate as the major part of his common-“ council-men shall judge reasonable, not exceed“ ing the rate of 1s. 3d. by the year for every “ square yard of the said pavement: wharfs, “ warehouses, &c. are not to pay more than two-“ thirds of the rates herein before directed: the “ rates on meeting-houses are to be paid by those “ officiating therein; and of unoccupied houses,
 “ &c. by the first tenants or occupiers thereof, “ allowance in the rent to be made by the land“ lords or owners.

“ The collector is to distrain in case of non-“ payment; and, if distress followed, the war“ rant is to be backed. The penalty on the neg“ lect of granting or executing such warrants, is “ 40s. Nothing in this act shall be deemed to “ make void any agreement between landlord and “ tenant, concerning the paving, cleansing, or “ enlightening any part of the said streets, &c.

“ Freemen, not paying the rates, are incapa“ ble of voting; and persons aggrieved may ap“ peal to the commissioners, within 30 days next “ after such rates shall have been demanded, and “ the commissioners are to hear and determine “ complaints.

“ The money collected is to be paid into the “ chamberlain's office; and the collector, upon “ demand, is to give in an account of all monies “ collected. The penalty on refusal to account, “ or make payment, is distress and sale of the “ collector's goods and chattels; and if none such, “ sufficient

" sufficient to satisfy the said money, can be " found, with the charges of distress and sale,
 " then the collector may be committed to one of " the compters, there to be detained till he shall " pay the same, or such composition as the com" missioners shall agree to accept.

" The collector dying, or becoming bankrupt,
 " his estate is liable to payment; but if insolvent,
 " the money is to be again assessed.

" The chamberlain is to pay all sums of mo" ney, by order of the commissioners, and to " make entries.

" The present contracts for lighting, &c. the " streets, are not hereby vacated.

" The commissioners may borrow money on " the credit of the rates, and 100,000l. may be " borrowed by annuities on lives, at 8l. per cent.
 " to be paid by four equal quarterly payments
 " during the full term of the natural life of the " annuitants, being of the age of 45 years, or " upwards. The clerk is to enter all securities.
 " The annuities are not liable to taxes, and the " securities are transferrable. The money bor" rowed is charged on the rates; and persons " charged towards these rates are not liable to " any former rates, in pursuance of any former
 " acts of parliament, towards paving, cleansing,
 " &c. of the said city and liberties, but arrears
 " of former rates are still recoverable.

" The surplus remaining in the chamber of " London, under act 17. George II. is to be ap" plied to this act.

" And that the purposes of this act may the " better be carried into execution, the following " tolls are to be taken at the turnpikes at " Mile-end, Bethnel green, Hackney, Kingland,
 " Ball's pound or pond Islington, Holloway, end
 " of St. John's-street, end of Goswell-street, and " the turnpike on the City-road; all which Turn" pikes are in the county of Middlesex; viz. For " every coach &c. drawn by six or more horses,
 " the sum of 10d. For ditto drawn by four " horses, 8d. For ditto, drawn by three, or two " horses, 6d. For every chaise, chair, calash,
 " or other carriage, drawn by one horse, 3d.
 " and for every horse, &c. 1d."

At a court of common-council held at Guildhall the sixteenth of May, commissioners were chosen for executing the purposes of the above act, who met, on the twenty-third, and settled the appointments to their respective officers and servants, as follows: To the chief clerk, 100l. per annum; first-assistant-clerk, 60l. Junior assistant-clerk, 50l. Surveyor, 200l. Three inspectors, 60l. each.

The following is the substance of the instructions given by the commissioners of the pavements for the city of London to their officers.

GENERAL DUTIES.

1. They must give security for the due execution of their offices as the commissioners shall require.

2. They must not accept any fee or reward (other than salaries and rewards allowed by the commissioners) for any thing done, or to be done, for forbearing to do any thing, or on any account whatsoever, relating to the execution or non-execution of this act.

3. They must not be interested in any bargain made by the commissioners, on forfeiture of 50l.
 and perpetual disability.

4. They must be active, and pay ready obedience to the commissioners.

5. They must behave with good manners towards their superiors, and every inhabitant; and, upon all occasions, manifest a disposition to oblige them as far as their trust will permit.

DUTY of the three INSPECTORS.

1. The city and its liberties to be divided into three districts, as nearly equal as possible; and such inspector is to act within his own district as deputy to the principal surveyor, and to follow his direction.

2. He is, in a book to be by him kept, to enter an alphabetical list of all the streets and places within his district, with an account in four separate columns, of the quantity of paving in the carriage and footways, (distinguishing each sort) the number of lamps, the situation of the grates, or gully-holes, and the courses, dimensions and declivities of the sewers.

3. He is frequently to preambulate his district both day and night; and to observe whether the contractors for cleansing and lighting do their duty; whether the foot-ways are daily scraped and cleansed; whether any posts, spurs, or kennels, are inconvenient; whether any pavement is out of repair; whether any water-pipe appears to be decayed; whether any sewer is broken, or stopped up; whether any privies communicate with the common-sewer; whether any of the grates or gullyholes are too narrow or ill-placed; whether any lime is flaked in any street, place or house; whether any carriage or horse is driven upon the foot-pavements; whether any marks for distinguishing the streets, or houses, shall be defaced; whether the form of any pavement new made, shall be altered; whether any signs or gutters shall be placed otherwise than in the fronts of houses; whether any cranes are to project over the highway when not in actual use; whether any occupiers of tenements shall cause to be deposited any dust in any street, except in some box, or conveniency, provided by the commissioners;
 whether any of the lamps are broken, or the light extinguished, or the irons damaged; whether any private lamps are placed otherwise than directed by the commissioners; and, lastly, whether there are any nuisances in the highway: and he shall make a minute of each observation on the left hand pages of a book, called The register of the district; marking the place and time, proposing the remedy, and estimating the expence, if incumbent on the commissioners.

4. He is, on the right hand of his register, (corresponding with his observations on the other side) to make fair distinct minutes of what is done in consequence thereof, marking the time, and totals of the charges.

5. He

5. He is to attend every meeting of the commissioners with his register, and be ready to answer all questions.

6. He is, immediately upon receipt of orders for any repairs, to cause the same to be done, if the expence shall not exceed five pounds. But where the expence is likely to exceed that sum, he is to carry the order to the principal surveyor, that he may view, and report.

7. He is to employ such workmen only as the commissioners shall direct.

8. He is, upon the bursting of any pipe belonging to the water company, to give immediate notice thereof to the paviours of the company; and, upon the bursting of any other pipe, to give the like notice to the owner, requiring an immediate repair; and if such defect is not repaired, and the ground filled up within four days he is to report the same to the commissioners.

9. If after Midsummer, 1766, any common-stage-waggon shall stand in any street, &c. above an hour at a time; or any cart or other carriage, shall be placed across any street, &c. or stand in any part thereof longer than is necessary for loading and unloading; or if any goods shall be left in any street, &c. so as to obstruct the passage; he is, upon complaint by any two reputable housekeepers, to remove such carriages, with the horses, and such goods, to the Green-yard.

The commissioners, having thus adjusted the necessary preparations for so capital an undertaking, immediately applied to parliament for leave to pull down what obstructed the free air, and to make and widen such streets as should be found necessary. And in consequence of an act passed for that purpose, Ludgate, Aldersgate, Cripplegate, Moorgate, Bishopsgate, and Aldgate, with the posterns within their limits, were taken down; and the city wall, between the site of Cripplegate and Moorgate, and in several other places, was razed from the foundation by the people who rent the adjacent ground from the city on a building lease. Narrow passages, which before were dangerous, were opened and widened, and new streets formed on the ruins of the old. The signs, sign posts and irons, together with all spouts and projections, were entirely removed; and, in short, such extensive amendments have been, and still are making, as must in the end form the city of London the most elegant (as well as the most opulent) city in the world.

At a court of common-council held the 30th of July, the report of Mr. Recorder was read, touching the city of London's rights to import 4000 chaldrons of coals for the benefit of the city-poor; by which opinion it appeared, the corporation are by charter entitled to that quantity, at 1s. per chaldron less duty than is the custom to pay in the port of London.

This month great outrages were committed by the poor in various parts of the kingdom, on account of the high price of provisions. They assembled in large bodies, when they pulled down, burnt, or otherwise destroyed flour mills, seized on corn and other provisions, which they sold at a moderate price and delivered the produce to the owners. At some places they were so exasperated that they ripped open the sacks, and scattered the corn about, seized butter, cheese and bacon, in the shops, and threw it into the streets, and committed numberless other violences.

On the first of August, about four o'clock in the morning a terrible fire broke out at Mr. Smith's, cheesemonger, in Blackmoor-street, Claremarket, which entirely consumed that house, greatly damaged two others in front, and burnt backwards as far as Craven-buildings in Drury-lane. The fire was so rapid, that an elderly woman, who lodged in the house, perished in the flames; and it was with the greatest difficulty the family escaped sharing the same fate.

In order to prevent the dreadful consequences which had been, and still were like to continue on account of the high price of provisions, a proclamation was published on the eleventh of September for putting in force an act of parliament of the fifth and sixth of Edward VI. and likewise an act made in the fifth of queen Elizabeth, against forestallers, regrators, and engrossers of corn, &c. and that all judges, justices of the peace, mayors, sheriffs, bailiffs, &c. within England and Wales, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, should put the said act (as well as all other acts relating to the same matter) into execution, on pain of his majesty's high displeasure, and of such pains and punishments as might by law be inflicted upon the contemners of his royal authority.

The following melancholy circumstance, which happened this month, is of so singular a nature, that we think its insertion in this place needs little apology. A soldier being sentenced to be shot at Plymouth-dock for desertion, the marine companies and fourth regiment were ordered to attend the execution. After having received the sacrament, the prisoner was brought out of the barracks, escorted by an officer's guard, and attended by a clergyman; his coffin was carried before him, which made the procession appear more dreadful and solemn. About ten he got to the field of execution, where he repeatedly knelt and prayed. About eleven o'clock the commanding officer ordered him to march round the troops to admonish them, and the clergyman dictated what he should say, after which he returned to his place. There were nine men who were formerly deserters, ordered to shoot him: he knelt, and was bid by the officer to pull his cap over his face, which he did; and whilst the officer turned round, the man dropped a handkerchief out of his hand, which being understood as a signal to shoot him, three of the men instantly fired through his body. The officer had a reprieve in his pocket, but by heightening the scene of horror too much, and by some unaccountable fatality, the poor man lost his life. The dreadful confusion of the officer may be more easily conceived than expressed.

The committee for building Black-friars bridge being met at Guildhall on the nineteenth, agreed to transfer to the watermen's company the sum of 13,650l. three per cent. Bank annuities, which produces 409l. 10s. per annum, and which the said company was annually to receive, in consideration deration of the ferry at Black-friars being removed to admit the opening of the temporary bridge.

On the evening of the first of October, her royal highness princess Carolina-Matilda was married to the king of Denmark at the chapel royal at St. James's; the duke of York being proxy for his Danish majesty; and the next morning her majesty set out from Carlton-house, in order to embark for Denmark. She was attended by his royal highness the duke of Gloucester, right hon. lady Mary Boothby, and count de Bothmar, her majesty's vice-chamberlain, in a train of three coaches, escorted by parties of light-horse, horse-grenadiers, and life-guards, and a numerous train of domestics and attendants. The parting between the queen of Denmark and her royal highness the princess of Wales, was extremely tender: the young queen was observed on getting into her coach, to shed tears, which greatly affected the populace assembled in Pall-mall, to see her departure.

About two o'clock in the morning of the fifth of this month, there happened in London one of the greatest storms of rain, thunder and lightning, that had been ever known in the memory of man. A watchman in High Holbourn declared, that about three o'clock a ball of fire fell near his stand, that the earth trembled under him, and that there was so great a smell of sulphur that he was near being suffocated.

Her majesty having been delivered of a princess on the twenty-ninth of the preceding month, (who was afterwards baptized by the names of Charlotte-Augusta-Matilda) the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council waited on his majesty the eighth of October with the following address on the occasion:

" Most gracious sovereign,

" We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, with the most zealous ardour and affection, embrace the earliest opportunity of approaching the throne of the best of princes, with our joyful congratulations on every event pleasing to your majesty and salutary to your kingdoms.

" The safe delivery of the queen, a princess endeared to your majesty and the whole nation by every royal and virtuous accomplishment, fills our hearts with the utmost thankfulness to divine providence.

" An increase of your majesty's august family by the birth of a princess royal, cannot fail of diffusing universal joy amongst all your faithful subjects, as it farther secures to them and their posterity, a long continuance of those inestimable blessings, which they have hitherto enjoyed under the protection of your majesty's illustrious house.

" The auspicious marriage of your majesty's royal sister, the princess Carolina Matilda, with that great potentate the king of Denmark, (on which we beg leave to felicitate your majesty)

" must afford the most interesting satisfaction, not only to us and all your majesty's loyal subjects, but also to every protestant power in Europe.

" Permit us, royal Sir, to assure you, that your faithful citizens of London are ever ready to evince to all the world, that their hearts and affections are sincere oblations of gratitude to your majesty, for your constant paternal care, and especially for the recent instance of your tender attention to the necessities of your people."

To which address his majesty was pleased to return the following most gracious answer:

" Your loyal and affectionate professions upon the happy events of my queen's safe delivery, and the marriage of my sister to my very good ally, the king of Denmark, cannot but be most acceptable to me.

" It is with pleasure that I see the just sense which the city of London entertains of those measures, which the necessity of the occasion obliged me to take for the relief of my people; and I hope they will have the desired effect of quieting mens minds, and removing the distresses which seemed daily to encrease."

Towards the end of December a violent frost began, which continued to increase, and was very severe till the sixteenth of January following; when, on that and the two following days, there was an appearance of its breaking; but on the nineteenth it returned with increased vigour, and continued till the twenty-second, when a kindly thaw removed the dismal apprehensions of the people.

During the continuance of this frost the distresses of the poor in town and country were truly pitiable, though the generous hand of charity was held forth by numbers of worthy persons, and several public bodies. Fuel, and all other necessaries of life were remarkably dear: the river Thames was frozen so hard as to stop the navigation both above and below the bridge: many persons retarded, or jammed in by the ice, perished with cold, in boats, or other craft; and the wherries in the river where wholly unemployed. In the cities of London, Westminster, and their suburbs, many melancholy accidents happened, such as numbers of people perishing with cold, or breaking limbs by the slipperiness of the streets; and it was with the utmost difficulty the draught cattle could keep their feet. Many fatal accidents likewise happened to those who were pursuing the diversion of skating on the ice. In the country the snow lay so deep, and so filled up the roads, hollows and valleys, that many people losing their way, died through the severity of the weather. Sheep and cattle perished in considerable numbers: the roads were almost impassable, and the stages and mails performed their several journeys with the utmost difficulty, danger, and loss of time.

On the first of January 1767, about a quarter past ten at night, a most uncommon change of weather weather happened in London. The evening, which till then had been a bright star-light, and remarkably serene, varied on a sudden to cloudy, and in an instant a most terrible burst of wind was heard, attended with a furious storm of hail from the north east. During this hurricane, windows shook, houses trembled, and a strange rustling was perceived as if in the inside of the buildings with the persons who inhabited them. Though many people were too much engaged to perceive it, yet such as did, particularly those, who by their situation lay exposed to the north and the north-east, were not less surprized than alarmed. The gable end of a house in Westminster, with some chimnies there, and in other parts of the town, were blown down. Great damages were sustained near the Thames, by goods being spoiled in cellars and warehouses on each side the river. Several boats were overfet, and twenty-seven persons lost their lives. The whole damage arising from this violent hurricane (which did not continue above two minutes) was computed at fifty-thousand pounds.

On the nineteenth of this month one Williamson, a shoemaker, was executed in Moorfields for the murder of his wife by starving her to death. The poor unhappy woman was a kind of idiot, who having a sum of money left for her maintenance, Williamson, to possess himself of the money, found means to marry her. They were first asked in church, but her trustee forbid the banns; the villain, however, procured a licence, and about eight months before her death, they were married; after which time the usage the unhappy creature met with was one continued scene of cruelty. He drove a strong staple into the wall of a closet in the room where they lodged; and to this staple he daily tied her with a rope which he drew round her middle, her hands being fastened behind her with iron handcuffs, and the little sustenance she received was laid upon a shelf just within the reach of her mouth, so that if she dropped any part of it, she could not again recover it; and to such a height did he carry his barbarity, that he often tied her up so tight that her toes only reached the ground; and if his daughter endeavoured to alleviate her misery by setting a stool for her to stand on, he would beat her unmercifully. In this manner she languished till she became a mere skeleton; and when she was so far reduced that her stomach loathed food, he released her, let loose her hands, set coarse meat before her, and tempted her with tender words to eat, with a view to screen himself from justice. In a day or two after this she died a shocking spectacle, having no flesh upon her bones, and the skin that enclosed them covered with vermin. There were not less than eighty thousand people, who attended the execution of the inhuman wretch; and it was with great difficulty that the resentment of the populace was restrained; for they were prepossessed that the punishment of hanging was too mild for so heinous a crime. He seemed apprehensive of being torn in pieces, and hastened the executioner to perform his office. We have mentioned this circumstance, as we think it a duty incumbent on us to transmit to posterity the infamy of a wretch, who could be capable of acting so contradictory to every principle of humanity.

At a court of common-council held the 23d it was unanimously resolved, that, on account of the distresses of the poor (which at that time were very great, occasioned by the inclemency of the season) one thousand pounds should be subscribed out of the chamber of the city; and that a subscription book should be opened in the chamberlain's office for the donations of all well-disposed persons; which money should be appropriated to the relief of such poor persons inhabiting within the city and liberties as did not receive alms of the parish: and a committee was appointed, consisting of the Lord-mayor, and all the aldermen, and fifty-two commoners, who immediately withdrew, and began a subscription among themselves; to which the Lord-mayor gave one hundred pounds, and the rest of the gentlemen very liberally. By this noble plan great numbers of people were happily relieved from the most abject state of distress.

Between two and three o'clock in the morning of the twenty-fifth, a terrible fire broke out at a baker's in the strand, opposite Hungerford-market, which in a short time consumed the same, with the house adjoining. The flames were so rapid, that the inhabitants could not preserve any of their effects. The apprentice and servant maid perished in the flames, as likewise a young woman big with child. A youth about sixteen years of age, apprentice to a jeweller, who lodged in the said house, in order to avoid being burnt, jumped out of a two pair of stairs window into the street, by which means his scull was fractured, and his arm, two of his ribs, and his back broke; of which he expired in great agonies the morning following. Six persons lost their lives, besides a great number that were shockingly bruised and wounded.

On the seventh of February a large house adjoining to the gate-way of the Saracen's-head-inn, on Snow-hill, suddenly fell to the ground, together with part of another house which went over the gate way. The house was only occupied by the family of Mr. Dodd, and that of Mr. Jarvis, a case-maker in the three pair of stairs forward. Mr. Dodd's family happily escaped unhurt; but Mrs. Jarvis and one of her children perished in the ruins.

The following calculation was made about this time of the number of cattle, &c. killed in one year in the city of London: sheep and lambs 711,121; bulls, oxen, and cows, 78,254; calves, 104,760; hogs for pork, 146,932; for bacon, 41,000; sucking pigs, 52,600.

At the spital sermon preached at St. Bride's, in Fleet-street, before the Lord-mayor, aldermen, &c, as governors of the city hospitals, was read the following report of the state of those hospitals for the year 1766:

At a court of common-council held at Guildhall the twenty-second of May, a proposal from the lords of the treasury was laid before the court for taking Gresham-college, in order to pull it down, and build on that ground an Excise-office. The plan was agreed to, and a committee appointed to carry the said work into immediate execution. Since which the college has been taken down, and the Excise-office is now building with all possible dispatch.

On the fourth of June an uncommon inundation happened in the road between Newington and Clapham, occasioned by heavy rains which had been falling three days before; the waters collected in the road meeting with a high tide, running up Vauxhall creek, swelled to such a degree, that they soon covered Kennington-common, and entering some low grounds, destroyed the brick-works, and did other damage to the amount of two hundred pounds.

At another-court of common-council held at Guildhall the seventeenth of June, the freedom of this city was voted to be presented to the right honourable Charles Townshend, chancellor of the exchequer, in a gold box, as an acknowledgment of his kind and successful endeavours to serve them in their application to parliament for the several improvements to be made in the metropolis. At the same time the report which had been made relating to London-bridge, was taken into consideration; when Mr. Milne, the surveyor, being examined, it was after a long debate agreed, that the proprietors of the London-bridge water-works should be allowed the fifth arch of the said bridge, agreeable to the terms contained in the city lands report, but under the express conditions, that should this grant be hereafter found prejudicial to the navigation of the river, the city should have liberty to revoke their grant, upon paying the said proprietors their whole expence in occupying the said arch.

On the fourteenth of September, Elizabeth Brownrigg (wife of James Brownrigg, painter in Fetter-lane, Fleet-street) was executed at Tyburn for the murder of Mary Clifford her apprentice. It appeared upon the trial that this infamous woman had occasioned the death of the child by a series of barbarities, which, if they were not well attested, would seem incredible to a compassionate mind: that she had beaten her on the head and shoulders with the stump of a riding whip and other weapons: that the child sometimes lay on the boards in the parlour, sometimes in the passage, and sometimes in the cellar; but that her general lodging was in the cellar, under the kitchen stairs, a place about the bigness of a closet: that sometimes she had a piece of sack with some straw in it to lie on, sometimes had a bit of a blanket to cover her, and sometimes quite naked: that she had been sometimes tied to a water-pipe, and at others to a hook, and being stripped naked, whipped till the blood came: in a word, it appeared from the depositions of an apothecary and surgeon, that this poor child was beaten so as to occasion almost one continued wound from head to foot, and that these wounds were the cause of her death. The husband and son of the woman, who were in some degree concerned in the cruelties inflicted on the child, being acquitted of the murder, were afterwards tried for the assault, and sentenced to be imprisoned in Newgate six months, and enter into recognizance for their good behaviour for seven years. Before she left Newgate, her husband and son took leave of her in the cell. She appeared very penitent in the way to, and at the place of execution, where the crowd was so great, that many persons were considerably hurt. Her body was afterwards carried to Surgeon's-hall, and dissected.

On Sunday the twenty-seventh captain Wrottesly arrived in London with the melancholy news, that his royal highness Edward August, duke of York and Albany, died of a malignant fever, at Monaco, the capital of a principality of the same name, in the territories of Genoa, in Upper Italy, on the seventeenth.

The particulars of his royal highness's sickness and death were as follow.

His royal highness had danced rather too much at the chateau of a person of fashion, which had not only fatigued him, but occasioned a very strong perspiration. As soon as the ball was finished, the prince gave orders for his carriages to be got ready immediately, to set off for Toulon, from whence he was distant some three or four leagues. The gentlemen of the train, colonels Morrison and St. John, and captain Wrottesly, earnestly represented to his royal highness the necessity of his remaining where he was, if not to go to bed yet till he was cool and had shifted himself: The prince declared there was no actual occasion for such caution, that he would wrap himself up in his cloak, and that would be sufficient; he did so, and stepped into his carriage. The next day his royal highness complained of a slight chillness and shivering; the indisposition, however, appeared so trifling, that he went at night to the comedy; but before it was over, his royal highness found himself infinitely worse, and was obliged to withdraw. He was feverish, thirsty, and complained of an immoderate heat all over his body. By proper care, and drinking plentifully, the duke was much better in the morning, and therefore set forward for Monaco, the prince of which (who was personally acquainted with his royal highness in his former tour to Italy) was waiting there in expectation of the honour of a visit from him; and the duke was rather inclined to accelerate his journey thither, as in that prince's palace he might naturally look for an assistance and accommodation superior to what he could reasonably hope to meet with in common places.

The weather happened to be uncommonly hot, which not a little incommoded his royal highness: he nevertheless arrived at Monaco in good spirits, but yet feverish, and with an head-ach; the latter of which he imputed principally to the intense heat of the sun that whole day. The next day the duke was worse, and took to his bed entirely. In hopes of a recovery, and unwilling to alarm the king, his royal parent, and relations, he enjoined his attendants on no account to write concerning his illness to England. All possible advice and assistance was given, but to no purpose; the fever was unconquerable. His royal highness now saw the danger of his situation; and he saw it with a fortitude and resignation rarely to be met with, when bloom of youth and dignity of station are united. Convinced that without some unexpected turn in his distemper he must die, his royal highness with the utmost calmness and composure of mind, adjusted every step consequent of the fatal event himself. He ordered that captain Wrottesly should bring the news to England, and in what method it should be disclosed. The captain was first to wait on Mr. Le Grand, of Spring-Gardens, and with him to go to Leicester-house, and then to Gloucester-house, and having communicated the event to the dukes his brothers, to proceed to their majesties, submitting it to the king and queen in what manner and by whom it should be imparted to his royal parent. After his royal highness had settled this arrangement, he seemed remarkably easy. He declared himself perfectly resigned to the divine will; and he spoke of his dissolution with all the piety and resolution of a christian and a man; acting up to those exalted characters to his latest breath. His royal highness, through the mercy of the great creator, was sensible to his last moment; and the very morning of his death dictated a letter to their majesties, his illustrious parent, and the royal family, desiring the writer to expedite it, as he had but a few minutes to spare, and those to employ in still more momentous concerns.

Before his royal highness died, he ordered all the gentlemen of his retinue to his bedside, where he took a very affectionate leave of them, and desired, that as he could not possibly live many hours longer, his blisters might be taken off to give him a little ease in his last moments, which was accordingly done.

As soon as his royal highness was dead, the prince of Monaco ordered a cannon to be fired every half hour, till the body should be deposited on board the ship, and the chambre ardente to be prepared for lying in state, according to the custom of that country, with his body guard to attend, and a guard from the regiment. Accordingly, the preparations were made in the largest apartment of the palace, hung with black: a high canopy in the middle, of black and silver, with a representation of a coffin of the same, upon the top of six stages or steps of black, on each of which was a row of tapers, in large gold and silver candlesticks; on the coffin a silver pillow, with a coronet upon it, the sword next to the coffin, and then the garter, george and star; on the ground, a row of torches round the whole; under the canopy behind the stage, was placed the coffin, which was made as near as possible in the English manner, covered with the pall: on each side were two mutes; and behind, colonel St. John, colonel Morrison, commodore Spry, and Mr. Schutz, attended. The whole lighting consisted of near two hundred tapers. The procession from thence to the water-side was fixed for Sunday, at four o'clock in the afternoon, and the chambre ardente was opened at nine o'clock that morning. At the setting out of the procession a signal was made for the ships to fire minute guns, till the body should be aboard. As it came out of the palace the regiment was drawn up, their drums in black, and officers in crapes; at the water-side was the long boat, with a canopy for the body, covered with black, and the royal standard hoisted half height; and this was towed by the captain's barge with mutes in it; behind was the commodore's barge, with his royal highness's servants, and two more barges for the remaining officers. The prince of Monaco continued at the water-side till the whole was on board, when the royal standard was hoisted half high on board the ship, and the minute guns ceased: the garrison then fired two rounds of cannon, and the regiment two rounds of running fire; and the whole was conducted with the greatest regularity and solemnity.

The order of the procession was as follows:

- The guard.
- Sailors with flambeaux.
- All the duke's servants.
- Two surgeons a-bread.
- Four mutes.
- Gentlemen who carry the ensigns of the garter.
- Lieutenants, two by two.
- The coffin, supported by sailors.
- Four pall-bearers, two on each side.
- Six canopy bearers, three on each side.
- Colonel St. John.
- Colonel Morrison.
- The prince of Monaco.
- Gentlemen his attendants.
- The rest of the English gentlemen, two by two.

Such were the last honours paid to the duke of York in a foreign country, by a catholic prince, a circumstance which proves, that politeness and humanity are of all nations.

His royal highness's remains arrived at London in in the ship Montreal on the first of November, and on the third was deposited in the royal vault in king Henry the VIIth's chapel, with the accustomed pomp and solemnity. The coffin in which his remains were brought home was changed for one made by the king's upholsterer, on which his highness's titles were elegantly engraved.

About noon on the second of November the queen was safely delivered of a prince, who, on the first of December following, was baptized at St. James's by the name of Edward. And on the eleventh the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, waited on his majesty; and being introduced to his majesty by the right honourable the earl of Hertford, lord chamberlain of his majesty's household, James Eyre, esq; the recorder, made their compliments in the following address:

" May it please your majesty,

" We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, happy in every occasion of approaching your royal presence with our most dutiful congratulations, beg leave to express our unfeigned joy on the safe delivery of that most excellent princess the queen, and further increase of your royal family by the birth of another prince.

" We cannot but feel ourselves deeply interested in every event which affects the illustrious house of Hanover, under whose mild government the British subjects have, for more than half a century, been blessed with a full enjoyment of their civil and religious rights, and a series of happiness unknown to the same extent in any former period.

" Permit us, therefore, royal Sir, at the same time, humbly to offer our sincere condolence on the much lamented death of your majesty's royal brother the duke of York, whose many eminent and princely virtues have most justly endeared his memory to all your majesty's loyal subjects, and made the private loss of the royal family a public misfortune.

" May the divine providence long preserve your majesty; and may there never be wanting one of your majesty's royal descendants to be guardian of our most happy constitution."

To which address his majesty was pleased to return this most gracious answer:

" I thank you for this loyal address, and for the satisfaction you express in the increase of my family: those expressions of your zealous attachment cannot but be agreeable to me. The religion and liberties of my people always have been and ever shall be, the constant objects of my care and attention; and I shall esteem it one of my first duties to instill the same principles into those who may succeed me.

" I regard your condolence on the melancholy event of the duke of York's death, as an additional proof of your attachment to me, and my family; and I take this first opportunity of expressing my thanks for it."

At a court of aldermen held at Guildhall the sixteenth, the sum of one hundred pounds was ordered to be paid to the widow of the late worthy alderman Cockayne, as a testimony of the sense they entertained of his ever being ready and willing to serve his fellow-citizens;

On the twenty-eighth the tide ebbed and flowed about five in the morning, twice in an hour and a half, at London-bridge and Greenwich.

A body of weavers, armed with rusty swords, pistols and other offensive weapons, assembled on the thirtieth at a house on Saffron-hill, with an intent to destroy the work in the looms of an eminent weaver near that place, but were happily dispersed without much mischief. Some of them were apprehended, and being examined before the justices at Hicks's-hall, it appeared that two classes of weavers were mutually combined to distress each other; namely, the engine and narrow weavers. The former were supposed to be ruinous to the latter, because, by means of their engines, one of them could do as much in one day as six of the other, and the same kind of work equally good; for which reason the narrow weavers were determined to destroy them. The men who were taken up were engine weavers, and they urged in their favour that they only assembled in order to defend themselves from a party of the others who were expected to rise. As they had done no mischief, they were all dismissed with a severe reprimand for not having applied to the civil magistrate for protection.

At a court of common-council held at Guildhall the fifteenth of December, the sum of two hundred pounds a year additional salary was voted to the recorder of London; and one hundred and fifty pounds a year to the common-serjeant.

On the twenty-first a severe frost set in from the E. S. E. which was followed by a deep snow, by which the navigation of the river Thames was greatly obstructed, and the posts retarded all over the kingdom. This frost was so severe in the West of England, that a carpenter at work there, having put a key into his mouth, lost the skin of his lips by taking it out again.

About eight o'clock in the evening of the twenty-fifth, a dreadful fire broke out adjoining to a cabinet-maker's in Houndsditch, which consumed that house, a large stock of timber, new furniture, &c. and also two other dwelling-houses adjoining, with many out-houses, workshops, and warehouses. Among the goods consumed was 1000l. of furniture just finished for Mr. David Barclay, and intended to have been carried home in a few days. It was remarkable that a fire broke out the same day at the said Mr. Barclay's stables at Hackney, and destroyed two fine hunters, with three other horses.

His majesty having been graciously pleased to signify his intention of filling up the vacant stall of the principal companion of the most honourable able military order of the bath, in the room of his late royal highness the duke of Cumberland; the several officers of the order attended at St. James's on the thirtieth for that purpose. The ceremony was performed in his majesty's closet, after the levee in the following manner: The sovereign wearing the ribbon, with the symbol of the order pendant to it, Henry Hill, esq; gentleman usher, bearing the scarlet rod, and habited in the mantle of the order, and Samuel Horsey, esq; Bath king of arms in his mantle, bearing on a cushion the ribbon, with the badge of the order, preceded his royal highness prince Frederick, supported by the earls of Cholmondeley and Breadalbane, the two senior knights of the order, a gentleman usher, daily waiter, carrying the sword of state. The sword being delivered by the earl of Breadalbane to the sovereign, his royal highness, kneeling, was knighted: after which the earl of Cholmondeley having received the ribbon from Bath king of arms, presented it to the sovereign, who put the ribbon over his royal highness's right shoulder: his royal highness then kissed his majesty's hand, and, rising up, retired. His majesty was afterwards pleased, in consideration of the tender years of his royal highness, to grant a dispensation under his royal sign manual and seal of the order, declaring it to be his royal pleasure, that the conferring the degree of knighthood by the sword of state should be sufficient to invest his royal highness fully and effectually with this order, in as ample manner as if his royal highness had personally performed all the accustomed solemnities.

CHAPTER L.

Great frost. Election of the city representatives. Mr. Wilkes's address to the livery. Is chosen member for the county of Middlesex. Riots occasioned thereby. Remarkable low tide. Disturbances among the coalbeavers. Mr. Wilkes committed to the King's-bench prison. Fire in Whitechapel. The sailors petition his majesty to raise their wages. Riot in St. George's-fields. Another in the Borough. Great fire at Dockhead. Fray between the coalbeavers and sailors. Farther proceedings against Mr. Wilkes. Violent storm of thunder and lightning. Remarkable fall of rain. Mr. Wilkes elected alderman. Twice re-chosen member for Middlesex. Petitions presented to his majesty from the livery of London, and counties of Middlesex and Surry, &c. &c.

As this last chapter of the History will contain many circumstances of a very peculiar nature, we shall, for the sake of perspicuity, give them as near as possible in the order in which they occurred.

THE year 1768 began with a very severe frost, which greatly contributed to the calamity of the lower sort of people, who were already severely distressed by the exorbitant price of provisions. And on the ninth of January the river below bridge carried all the appearance of a general wreck; ships, boats, and small craft lying in a very confused manner, some on shore, and others sunk or overset by the ice. A fishing boat was discovered near Deptford creek close choaked in with ice; the people were all frozen to death; the youngest of them, a youth about seventeen, was found sitting as erect almost as if alive.

On the second of March, between five and six o'clock in the morning, a fire was discovered in the library of the right hon. Henry Seymour Conway, in Warwick-street, which consumed a great number of books and writings, and greatly damaged the apartment. On examining the drawers in the writing table, bank notes to the value of 925l. were missing, one of which for 500l. was the same morning received at the bank: this circumstance left no room to doubt but that the library had been wilfully set on fire; the general himself went therefore to the bank to see, if from the hand writing on the note received, any discovery could be made; and by a peculiar character in the assumed name, the gentleman was led to suspect a young fellow who had married a servant of the lady's, on whom he had lately conferred a genteel place. This young fellow had been at first recommended to the general by the duke of Richmond. He therefore waited upon his grace, and desired that the clerks of the bank who were concerned in paying the money would attend him there. They did so; and the young man, being sent for, came, and on his first appearance was known, and positively charged with being the person who changed the note: on which he confessed the fact, with all its circumstances; and for which he was afterwards executed.

On the sixteenth of March came on at Guildhall the election of members to represent this city in parliament; when the right hon. Mr. Harley, Lord-mayor, Sir Robert Ladbroke, William Beckford, esq; John Wilkes, esq; Sir Richard Glyn, Barlow Trecothick, esq; and John Paterfon, esq; offered themselves as candidates. The four first were declared to have the greatest shew of hands; but a poll being demanded, the same commenced immediately, and was finished on the 23d when the numbers appeared as follow:

The Lord-mayor	3279
Sir Robert Ladbroke	3678
William Beckford, esq;	3402
Barlow Trecothick, esq;	2957
Sir Richard Glyn	2823
John Paterfon, esq;	1269
John Wilkes, esq;	1247

After

After the poll was over, Mr. Wilkes addressed himself to the livery in the following speech :

" Gentlemen and fellow-citizens,

" The poll being now finished, I return my sincerest thanks to those disinterested and independent friends, who have so generously and steadily stood forth in my favour. The want of success, out of your power to command, has not in the least abated my zeal for your service. You cannot be unacquainted with the various circumstances which have contributed to it. My friends were of opinion that I should wait a dissolution of the last parliament, while the other candidates had been for many months soliciting your interest. Ministerial influence, assisted by private malice, has been exerted in the most arbitrary and unconstitutional manner, and by means of the basest chicanery and oppression.

" But, though disappointed, I am not in the least dispirited : on the contrary, I reflect with pride and gratitude on the many instances of regard and affection I have received from the livery of London.

" I beg leave to make my best acknowledgments to the sheriffs, who have shewn the utmost candour and impartiality during the election, accompanied with a dignity of character becoming their station in this great metropolis.

" And now, gentlemen, permit me to address you as friends to liberty, and freeholders of the county of Middlesex ; declaring my intention of appearing as a candidate to represent you in parliament, and still hoping, by your means, to have the honour of being useful to you in the British senate.

" Gentlemen of the livery, I recommend it to you in the strongest manner, to exert yourselves to preserve the peace and quiet of this great city."

The populace, on Mr. Wilkes's return from Guildhall, to shew their zeal, took the horses from his carriage, and drew it themselves.

The contest, during this election, was very warm ; and papers and addresses to the public were every day published, as usual, for and against the several candidates. Mr. Wilkes seemed to be the darling of the populace, and some indecencies were committed in and about the hall. A subscription was set on foot, successfully, for paying that gentleman's debts ; and there appeared the following copy of a letter from him, to Messrs. Nuthall and Francis, solicitor and deputy solicitor of the treasury.

Sir,                      London, March 22, 1768.

I take the liberty of acquainting you, that in the beginning of the ensuing term I shall present myself to the court of King's-bench. I pledge my honour as a gentleman, that on the very first day I will there make my personal appearance.

I am, Sir,
Your most humble servant,
JOHN WILKES.

The election for Middlesex having been appointed on the twenty-eighth, Sir William Beauchamp Proctor and Mr. Wilkes, two of the candidates for the said county, set out for Brentford, where the election came on about ten in the morning. Mr. Cooke, the other candidate, could not attend, being confined to his room with the gout. Mr. Wilkes went in a coach drawn by six long-tailed horses, and was attended by a prodigious number of people to the place of election, which was held in the middle of Brentford Butts, a temporary booth being erected there for that purpose. The majority of hands appeared in favour of Sir William Beauchamp Proctor and Mr. Wilkes, who were accordingly returned ; but a poll being demanded in behalf of Mr. Cooke, the same came on immediately ; and at five in the afternoon Mr. Wilkes had polled six to one more than that gentleman. At nine o'clock the poll finally closed, when the number for each candidate appeared as follows :

For John Wilkes, esq;	1292
Sir W. B. Proctor	807
George Cooke, esq;	827

Accordingly George Cooke, esq; and Mr. Wilkes were declared duly elected.

The mob behaved in a very outrageous manner at Hyde-Park Corner, where they pelted Mr. Cooke, son of the city marshal, and knocked him from his horse, took off the wheels of one of the carriages, cut the harness, and broke the the glasses to pieces ; and several other carriages were greatly damaged. These violent proceedings were occasioned by a flag being carried before the procession of Mr. Wilkes's antagonists, on which was painted, No Blasphemer. Exclusive of the assault made upon Mr. Cooke, son of the city marshal, some other gentlemen, and more particularly the two old members, were affronted by the populace.

At night likewise the rabble were very tumultuous : some persons who had voted in favour of Mr. Wilkes, having put out lights, the mob paraded the whole town from East to West, obliging every body to illuminate, and breaking the windows of such as did not do it immediately. The windows of the mansion-house, in particular, were demolished all to pieces, together with a large chandelier and some pier glasses, to the amount of many hundred pounds. They demolished all the windows of lord Bute, lord Egmont, Sir Sampson Gideon, Sir William Mayne, and many other gentlemen and tradesmen in most of the public streets of both cities, London and Westminster. In short, the whole evening was one continued scene of noise and tumult.

The next day orders were given to the guards on duty at St. James's, to be in readiness at the beat of drum, to march to suppress any riot that might happen. And the day following, a court of common-council was summoned on purpose to consider of the most proper and effectual means to prevent for the future, as well as to punish, all such as should be found to have been guilty of the late riots and disturbances in this city, and the court came to a resolution to prosecute, cute, with the utmost vigour, all and every person who should be convicted of having been active in the riots, and to offer, by advertisement, a reward of fifty pounds for the discovery of every offender, to be paid on their conviction; and ordered the same to be inserted in every daily and evening paper, and a large number of the said resolution to be printed and posted up in the most public places of this city, and the liberties thereof. They also directed, that such prosecutions as should arise from their resolution should be referred to the committee appointed to direct their law proceedings. It was referred to the mansion-house committee to order the immediate reparation of all such damages as the said house might have sustained by the said riots and tumults.

On the tenth of April the tide in the river Thames was so remarkably low, that it was with difficulty even a wherry could cross it. The sand banks on both sides London-bridge were entirely dry.

On the fifteenth a desperate fray happened at Wapping among several gangs of coalheavers, in which many persons were wounded, and three houses almost destroyed. And on the twentieth, a great body of them assembled at Wapping, and beset the house of Mr. Green, a publican, who defended the same all night; and a great many shot were fired on both sides, wherein three of the assailants were killed, and several dangerously wounded.

On the twentieth Mr. Wilkes appeared before the court of King's-bench, Westminster, and declared his surrender in the following speech:

" My lords,

" According to the voluntary promise I made to the public, I now appear before this sovereign court of justice, to submit myself in every thing to the laws of my country.

" Two verdicts have been found against me. One is for the re-publication of the North Briton, No. 45; the other for the publication of a ludicrous poem.

" As to the re-publication of the number of the North Briton, I cannot yet see that there is the smallest degree of guilt. I have often read and examined that famous paper. I know that it is in every part founded on the strongest evidence of facts. I find it full of duty and respect to the person of the king, although it arraigns, in the severest manner, the conduct of his majesty's then ministers, and brings very heavy charges home to them. I am persuaded they were well grounded, because every one of those ministers has since been removed. No one instance of falsehood has yet been pointed out in that pretended libel, nor was the word false in the information before this court. I am, therefore, perfectly easy under every imputation respecting a paper, in which truth has guided the pen of the writer, whoever he was, in every single line; and it is this circumstance which has drawn on me, as the supposed author, all the cruelties of ministerial vengeance.

" As to the charge against me, for the publication of a poem, which has given just offence, I will assert that such an idea never entered my mind. I blush again at the recollection that it has been at any time, and in any way, brought to the public eye, and drawn from the obscurity in which it remained under my roof. Twelve copies of a small part of it had been printed in my house, at my own private press. I had carefully locked them up, and I never gave one to my most intimate friend. G——t, after the affair of the North Briton, bribed one of my servants to rob me of the copy, which was produced in the house of peers, and afterwards before this honourable court. The nation was justly offended, but not with me, for it was evident that I had not been guilty of the least offence to the public. I pray God to forgive, as I do, the jury, who have found me guilty of publishing a poem I concealed with care, and which is not even yet published, if any precise meaning can be affixed to any word in our language.

" But, my lords, neither of the two verdicts could have been found against me, if the records had not been materially altered without my consent, and, as I am informed, contrary to law. On the evening before the two trials, ——— caused the records to be altered at his own house, against the consent of my solicitor, and without my knowledge; for a dangerous illness, arising from an affair of honour, detained me at that time abroad. The alterations were of the utmost importance; and I was in consequence tried the very next day on two new charges, of which I could know nothing: I will venture to declare this proceeding unlawful. I am advised that it is so, and that it renders both the verdicts absolutely void.

" I have stood forth, my lords, in support of the laws against the arbitrary act of ministers. This court of justice, in a solemn appeal respecting general warrants, shewed their sense of my conduct. I shall continue to reverence the wise and mild system of English laws, and this excellent constitution. I have been much misrepresented; but, under every species of persecution, I will remain firm and friendly to the monarchy, dutiful and affectionate to the illustrious prince who wears the crown, and to the whole Brunswick line.

" As to all nice, intricate points of law, I am sensible how narrow and circumscribed my ideas are; but I have experienced the deep knowledge and great abilities of my counsel. With them I rest the legal part of my defence, submitting every point to the judgment of this honourable court, and to the laws of England."

When Mr. Wilkes had finished this speech, Mr. Attorney general moved for his immediate commitment on the outlawry. He was answered by Mr. Serjeant Glyn, Mr. Recorder of London, Mr. Mansfield, and Mr. Davenport, successively; who all moved the court for a writ of error, which Mr. attorney-general, on being applied to the Saturday week before, had refused to grant. They specified several particulars in which the process of the outlawry was erroneous, as sufficient ground for for the motion, and offered to give any bail for Mr. Wilkes's appearance. The court then proceeded to give their opinions: and first, lord M. spoke long and forcibly on the impropriety of the procedure on both sides; observing, that the attorney-general could not, with the least appearance of reason or of law, move for the commitment of a person who was not legally in court; nor had the counsel for the defendant any better plea for their motion in favour of a man who appeared gratis before them: He added, that had Mr. Wilkes been brought thither by a writ of capias utlegatum, the motion might then have been made with propriety, and the court might have exerted, had they pleased, their discretionary power in accepting or refusing his bail. His lordship farther expressed himself as very happy in having an opportunity of explaining his sentiments publicly, before so large an audience, with regard to the charge brought against him by Mr. Wilkes, of granting an order for the amendment in the information against him, in substituting the word tenor instead of purport; declaring, repeatedly, that he thought himself bound in duty to grant it; that he conceived it to be the uniform practice of all the judges to grant such amendments; that he had himself frequently repeated the same practice in other causes, without the least objection being ever offered against it. The rest of the judges agreed with the chief justice in opinion, that, as Mr. Wilkes was not legally before the court, no proceedings could be had upon his case. And it was particularly remarked, that the officers of the crown had no right to throw upon that court the business of committing Mr. Wilkes upon his gratis appearance, out of the common course of law, when they might have brought him before it legally by a writ of capias utlegatum, which it would have been very easy to have executed, since he had notoriously appeared in publick for several weeks past; and in that case the attorney-general might have made his motion with propriety.

These arguments being adjusted, Mr. Wilkes, about two o'clock, left the court; and though there was a very great crowd, not the least disturbance happened. Information indeed had been given to the Lord-mayor, that some persons at a public-house in Duke's-place were preparing to raise a mob; and his lordship ordered the proper officers to enquire into the truth of that information, who found a blue flag with No. 45 upon it, a hanger and hatchet lying by it, and two men as a guard to defend it, whom the officers apprehended, and his lordship committed them to the compter.

Westminster hall was very full on the occasion, as well as both the palace-yards; but the populace behaved very quiet, except huzzaing Mr. Wilkes when he came to the window of a coffee-house, where he retired after he quitted the court. The magistrates of Westminster divided themselves in the several liberties, and the constables attended at call in every part, two battalions of the guards lay on their arms in St. James's-park, others were in St. George's-fields, also those at St. James's, the Savoy and the Tower, were all kept in readiness to march at a minute's warning; as were also several troops of horse, in case of any disturbance. Proper precautions were likewise taken in the city, by the constables being ordered to be in readiness, all of whom, both in Westminster and the city, together with the military, were ordered to be in waiting till two o'clock the next morning.

On the twenty-fifth a large body of coal-heavers assembled in a riotous manner in Wapping, went on board the colliers, and obliged the men who were at work to leave off. These men complained of their masters, the undertakers; that they opposed them in various shapes; that they curtailed their wages, paid them not in money, but in liquor and goods of a bad quality; and that these undertakers got fortunes, while they, who did the work, were starving. This riot was attended with much bloodshed: the rioters having met with opposition, fought desperately, and several lives were lost.

To return to the affair of Mr. Wilkes. On the 27th Mr. Wilkes's attorney acquainted the attorney-general, that Mr. Wilkes was in custody by a writ of capias utlegatum, and prayed that the writ of error might be granted, but the attorney-general not thinking that information sufficient (though he doubted not that gentleman's veracity) for him to grant it, the under-sheriff waited on him in consequence, and acquainted him, that Mr. Wilkes was in custody, and would appear in court by his Habeas; whereupon the attorney-general admitted the writ of error; and, about three o'clock in the afternoon, Mr. Wilkes was introduced in a legal manner into the court of King's-bench: when his counsel moved, as the writ of error was granted, that Mr. Wilkes might be admitted to bail; but the court were of opinion that neither he nor any person could be admitted to bail after conviction, and accordingly ordered Mr. Wilkes into custody by the proper officers of the court; but as he was conveying to the king's-bench prison in a hackney coach, attended by Mess. Stichall and Holloway, tipstiffs to lord Mansfield, the mob stopped the coach on Westminster-bridge, took out the horses, and drew it along the Strand, Fleet-street, &c. to Spital-fields. When they came to Spital-square, they obliged the two tipstiffs to get out, and let them go very quietly away: they then drew Mr. Wilkes to the Three Tuns tavern in Spital-fields, where, from a one pair of stairs window, he earnestly entreated them to retire, which they did accordingly. After which he went in a private manner, and surrendered himself to the marshal of the King's-bench prison. Many justices of the peace, and a prodigious number of constables attended in and near Westminster-hall, but not the least noise or riot ensued.

The next day he was visited by many of his friends, and the prison was surrounded by a numerous concourse of people, who it was expected would have offered some outrage; but all remained quiet till night, when they pulled up the rails which enclosed the footway, with which they made a bonfire, and obliged the inhabitants of the Borough to illuminate their houses; but a captain's guard of 100 men arriving, about twelve, they all quietly dispersed.

On

On the thirtieth a dreadful fire broke out in Whitechapel-road, occasioned by laying wet sawdust on the oven to dry, which taking fire, soon communicated itself to a coach-makers adjoining; from whence the flames spread so rapidly, that six houses were intirely consumed, and the inhabitants lost all their effects.

On the second of May some thousands of sailors assembled in Stepney-fields, where certain articles relating to an increase of wages, and a petition intended to be presented to parliament, were read; after which, a numerous party of them paraded to the Royal-exchange, and joined in repeated huzzas, but on remonstrances from a gentleman there to one of their chieftains, they were immediately drawn off, and a deputation appointed to attend some merchants, assembled at the King's-arms tavern in Cornhill, in order that their complaints might be taken into consideration. On the seventh a great number of them assembled in St. George's-fields, and went to St. James's, with colours flying, drums beating, and fifes playing, and presented a petition to his majesty, setting forth their grievances, and praying relief.

The following address was at this time issued from Mr. Wilkes to the freeholders of the county of Middlesex.

" Gentlemen,

" In support of the liberties of this country
" against the arbitrary rule of ministers, I was " before committed to the Tower, and am now
" sentenced to this prison. Steadiness, with, I " hope, strength of mind, do not however leave
" me; for the same consolation follows me here,
" the conscientiousness of innocence, of having " done my duty and exerted all my poor abilities,
" not unsuccessfully for this nation. I can submit
" even to far greater sufferings with cheerfulness,
" because I see that my countrymen reap the " happy fruits of my labours and persecutions,
" by the repeated decisions of our sovereign
" courts of justice in favour of liberty. I there" fore bear up with fortitude, and even glory that " I am called to suffer in this cause, because I con" tinue to find the noblest reward, the applause
" of my native country, of this great, free, and " spirited people.

" I chiefly regret, gentlemen, that this con" finement deprives me of the honour of thank" ing you in person, according to my promise;
" and at present takes from me, in a great degree,
" the power of being useful to you. The will,
" however, to do every service to my constituents
" remains in its full force; and when my suffer" ings have a period, the first day I regain my " liberty shall restore a life of zeal in the cause
" and interests of the county of Middlesex.

" In this prison, in any other, in every place,
" my ruling passion will be the love of England " and our free constitution. To these objects I " will make every sacrifice. Under all the op" pressions which ministerial rage and revenge
" can invent, my steady purpose is, to concert
" with you, and other true friends of this coun" try, the most probable means of rooting out

" the remains of arbitrary power and star-cham" ber inquisition, and of improving as well as " securing the generous plans of freedom, which " were the boasts of our ancestors, and I trust
" will remain the noblest inheritance of our po" sterity, the only genuine characteristic of Eng" lishmen.

" I have the honour to be, with affection
" and regard, gentlemen, your obliged
" and faithful humble servant,

JOHN WILKES.

" King's-bench prison,
" Thursday, May 5, 1768."

On the tenth, in the afternoon, a great body of people assembled about the King's-bench prison, in expectation that Mr. Wilkes was to go from thence to the parliament-house, (it being the first day of opening the new parliament) and designing to convey him thither. They demanded him at the prison, and grew very tumultuous; whereupon the riot act was begun to be read, but the populace threw stones and brick bats while it was reading, when William Allen, son of Mr. Allen, master of the Horseshoe-inn, in Blackman-street, Southwark, being singled out, was pursued by one of the soldiers, and shot dead on the spot. Soon after this, the crowd increasing, an additional number of the guards were sent for, who marched thither, and also a party of horse-grenadiers; when the riot continuing, the mob was fired upon by the soldiers, and five were killed on the spot, and about fifteen wounded. Two women were among the wounded, one of whom afterwards died in St. Thomas's-hospital. The next day an inquisition was taken by the coroner for Surry, on the body of the above William Allen, when the verdict was given by the jury, that Donald MacLane was guilty of wilful murder, and Donald MacLaury, and Alexander Murray, the commanding officer, were aiding and abetting therein.—This inquest was held at the house of Mr. Allen; and it appeared on the examination that the deceased was only a spectator, and, on seeing some persons run, he ran also, but was unhappily mistaken, and followed by the soldiers five hundred yards into a cow-house, where he was shot. Donald MacLane was committed to prison for the murder, but his associates were admitted to bail. Two inquisitions were afterwards taken in the Borough, on persons killed by the soldiers in quelling the above riot; one on the body of Mary Jeffs, who, having a basket with oranges to sell, was shot dead in removing them; the other on William Bridgeman, who was shot on the top of a hay-cart, as he was looking at the fray at a distance: on both these inquisitions the jury brought in their verdict chance medley. It appeared, by the evidence, that, on the justices taking down a paper that had been fixed against a wall of the prison, the mob grew riotous, and cried out, "give us the paper; which the justices not regarding, stones began to be thrown; and the cry, "give us the paper," grew louder; the drums beat to arms; the proclamation was read, the justices were pelted who read it; great pains were taken to persuade the people to disperse; the horse-horse-guards were sent for, and it was not till the last extremity that the soldiers received orders to fire. But what was very remarkable, not one concerned in the riot was hurt by the firing, in the open fields. Donald MacLane was afterwards tried at the Surry assizes held at Guilford, and acquitted.

The next day the mob assembled before the house of Edward Ruffel, esq; distiller in the Borough, broke open the door, staved some casks of liquor, drank it immoderately, and began pulling down the house; but the military interposing, four of the most intoxicated were seized, and the rest made their escape. At the same time the front of the house of Richard Capel, esq; in Bermondsey was demolished, and Mr. Capel himself wounded. These outrages were occasioned by the activity of the above two gentlemen, in suppressing the tumults in St. George's-fields.

The same day upwards of fifteen thousand sailors went through the city to petition the parliament for an augmentation of their wages. When they were in Palace-yard, they were addressed by two gentlemen, mounted on the roof of a hackney-coach, and were told, that they could receive no immediate answer to their petition; but that it would be considered in due time: on which they gave three cheers and dispersed. Their chiefs afterwards waited on a committee of merchants, and matters were accommodated to their general satisfaction.

A very considerable body of coalheavers assembled in Stepney-fields, and proceeded from thence to all the coal-wharfs from Shadwell to Essex-stairs, carrying with them a writing, which they presented to the masters of the wharfs to sign, signifying their consent to raise their wages; which having accomplished, they next day waited on the Lord-mayor at the Mansion-house, to obtain a confirmation of this agreement; but his lordship thought proper to decline intermeddling with their affairs.

On the thirteenth died much lamented, after a long and painful illness, her royal highness princess Louisa Anne, daughter of her royal highness the princess dowager of Wales, and second sister to his present majesty. And on the twenty-second the corpse of her royal highness was privately interred in the royal vault in king Henry the seventh's chapel.

On the nineteenth a terrible fire broke out in a tar-yard at Dock-head, occasioned by a tar-copper boiling over, by which upwards of 2000 barrels were consumed, and near thirty houses burnt to the ground.

A terrible fray happened on the twenty-fifth between the coalheavers and sailors belonging to the colliers in the river, in which many were killed. The sailors, having been long detained in the river by the coalheavers refusing to work, had begun to deliver their ships themselves; upon which a body of coalheavers fell upon some of the sailors by surprise, and killed several of them. The sailors took the alarm, the quarrel became general, and the consequences were, the loss of many lives.

On the seventh of June another fray happened in Stepney-fields between the coalheavers and sailors, wherein several of the latter were killed. The coalheavers marched off in triumph; with colours flying, drums beating, &c. offering five guineas for a sailors head. The ships below bridge were obliged to keep constant watch, day and night, crying, "all is well." In short, to so great a height was this insurrection got, that the inhabitants of Wapping were perpetually under the most direful apprehensions. A party of guards constantly attended for some days; during which several disturbances arose, and many coalheavers were taken up by the soldiery, and carried before Sir John Fielding, who, on examination, committed them to Newgate. Two of them were afterwards tried at the Old-Bailey for the murder of one Battie, a seaman, and being convicted, were executed at Tyburn, as were seven others (in the Sun tavern fields, near where the riot was committed) for shooting at Mr. Green, the master of the Round-about-tavern in Shadwell. This example produced a happy effect; the tumults immediately ceased, and peace and industry supplied the place of resentment and mischief.

On the fifteenth Mr. Wilkes was brought to the court of King's-bench, Westminster-hall; when the arguments on the arrest of judgment was entered on by Mr. Attorney-general, Mr. Thurloe, and Sir Fletcher Norton, on behalf of the crown; and by Mr. Serjeant Glyn, Mr. Recorder of London, and Mr. Davenport, on the part of the defendant. Mr. Serjeant Glyn, entered further than he had before done on the impropriety of the information being filed by the solicitor-general; but the court were so clearly of opinion, the business of the attorney-general (in case of there being a vacancy in that office) must necessarily devolve on the solicitor-general, that it was judged needless to say more on that head. The whole that Mr. Wilkes then had to avail himself of was, the alteration of the record; which having been very learnedly and elaborately canvassed, the court declared themselves fully of opinion, that the alteration of the record at the judge's chambers was what they had an indispensable right to in the course of practice. After this the informations against Mr. Wilkes were read; and lord Mansfield stated to the court the evidence as it stood on the former trial, when Mr. Attorney-general and Sir Fletcher Norton gave their opinions in aggravation of the case, and Mr. Serjeant Glyn answered in extenuation. Mr. Wilkes then desired that judgment might be passed; but was told, that the court having heard the opinion of council on both sides, and some material objections having been offered, it was necessary to take these into consideration; but was assured, that, though no day could then be fixed for that purpose, no time should be delayed to bring it to an issue.

Among other proceedings, Mr. Serjeant Glyn took notice that as a writ of error was intended to be brought before a higher court of justice, before the house of lords, he desired that the case of the alteration of the records, under such peculiar circumstances, might be stated on the back of the record, to be transmitted to the lords; otherwise that important point could not come before the house. This was absolutely refused by the court. He concluded by entreating their lordships, for the sake of the safety of every subject of this nation, to fix some limits to the discretionary power of altering records; that counsel might know for the future when they can be certain of the cause they are to plead; and that the subject might not be liable to ruin at the discretion of a judge.

The decision of the matter being postponed to the eighteenth, Mr. Wilkes, on that day, attended the court again; when Mr. justice Yates, after enlarging on the malignant nature and dangerous tendency of the two publications of which Mr. Wilkes had been convicted, proceeded to pronounce the judgment of the court, which was as follows: That, for the republication of the North Briton, No. 45, in volumes (of which two thousand copies had been printed for public sale) he should pay a fine of five hundred pounds, and be imprisoned ten calendar months: and for publishing the Essay on Woman (of which only twelve copies were printed for the private use of so many particular friends) that he should pay likewise a fine of five hundred pounds, and be imprisoned twelve calendar months, to be computed from the expiration of the term of the former imprisonment: and that he afterwards find security for his good behaviour for seven years, himself to be bound in the sum of a thousand pounds, and two sureties in five hundred pounds each. A writ of error returnable before the house of lords was afterwards moved for, in order to reverse the judgment, on account of the alteration of the record; and the court recommended to the attorney-general to grant it on the first application.

In an address to the freeholders of Middlesex, published after the event of the outlawry, Mr. Wilkes made this remarkable declaration. "In the whole progress of ministerial vengeance against me for several years, I have shewn, to the conviction of all mankind, that my enemies have trampled on the laws, and been actuated by the spirit of tyranny, and arbitrary power. The general warrant, under which I was first apprehended, has been judged illegal. The seizure of my papers was condemned judicially. The outlawry, so long the topic of virulent abuse, is at last declared to have been contrary to law; and, on the ground first taken by my learned counsel, Mr. serjeant Glyn, is formally reversed." It was thought necessary to insert this, as it had been said in all the papers, that the error on which the outlawry was reversed was discovered by Mr. Wilkes's enemies.

On the first of July a most dreadful storm of thunder and lightning happened in and about London. Two persons on the road leading to town were struck dead by the lightning, which was so powerful, that a leaden statue, in the garden of a gentleman at Camberwell, was melted, and reduced to a heap of dross. By this storm the water of the river Thames was so driven out of its usual channel, above bridge, as had never been remembered by the oldest man living; one half of the bed of the river remaining uncovered with water two tides. And on the second of August another storm happened, in which the thunder rolled so terrible, and the lightning flashed in such dreadful streams, in the neighbourhood of London, that several houses were set on fire with it, and one man was struck dead upon his coach-box, on the Kent street road. It was very remarkable, that his watch was found shivered in his pocket in a thousand pieces, a small hole in the crown of his hat, and a kind of seam down his breast.

The next day a terrible fire broke out in the King's-arms-inn yard, near Holbourn-bridge, which was attended with the most melancholy circumstances. Mr. Green, at whose house it broke out, saved his life by jumping out of a window; but his wife, his child and sister perished in the flames; his neighbour jumped out of a window seemingly unhurt, but died in less than ten minutes; a porter belonging to the inn, having lost his wife and child, died raving mad; a clerk to a merchant in Bread-street, after saving his wife and child, returned for a box, in which was money and writings belonging to his master, but not being able to reach it, fell a sacrifice to the flames. Of those who endeavoured to escape by jumping out of the windows, three were killed upon the spot; the shrieks of those who were burnt were piercing; in short, a more horrid scene was never beheld.

On the first of September, the heaviest rain fell at London and the country round, it that had ever been known in the memory of man. It began in the evening, and in a few hours the waters poured down Highgate-hill with incredible violence; the common sewers in several parts of the town not being able to carry off the torrent, the adjacent houses were filled almost to the first floors; immense damage was done, and as it happened in the night, many were awakened from sleep in the greatest consternation. The serpentine river in Hyde-park rose so high, that it forced down a part of the wall, and poured with such violence upon Knightsbridge, that the inhabitants expected the whole town to be overflowed; the canal in St. James's-park rose higher than ever was known; in short, no man living remembered so much rain to fall in so short a time. About Bagnigge-wells the waters rose eight feet perpendicular height, though the rain did not continue to fall with violence more than eight hours. Several people in Cold Bath fields, Mutton-lane, Peter-street, and those parts, sustained great damage; some publicans had several butts of beer carried out of their cellars; three oxen and several hogs were carried away by the drain, and drowned; and in Mutton-lane, and the lower part of Hockley in the Hole, the inhabitants were obliged to quit their ground-floors, and go up stairs, for fear of being drowned. Many butts of beer were carried away from the cellar at the Cheshire Cheese at Mount Pleasant, and conveyed quite to Fleet-ditch, where they were taken out. The water in the canal in St. James's-park swelled so high, that it flowed up to the garden wall belonging to the treasury, and was so deep, that foot-passengers could not pass; the lower parts of some houses near the Treasury were overflowed, as was the wilderness; the sentinel placed near the little gate leading into Duke-street, was obliged to quit his box; the cellars in several parts of Westminster

Westminster were filled with water, and considerable damage was done.

Upwards of forty small craft, on the river below bridge, were sunk, drove on shore, or bulged, by the violence of the storm; and a collier in Long reach was drove from her anchors, and beat her keel off: several ships also received damage by running foul of each other. The late duke of Cumberland's fine water-works, in Windsor-forest, were intirely destroyed; several persons were drowned in different places, as well as horses, oxen, and hogs. In short, almost every part of England sustained very considerable damage.

About this time the king of Denmark arrived on a visit, and fixed his abode in the apartments which had been previously prepared for him at St. James's. He was entertained by their majesties and the royal family in the most splendid manner, as likewise by the principal part of the nobility. During his stay, among many other places, he visited the universities of Oxford and Cambridge; from the latter of which he went to Tadcaster, Wentworth-castle, York, Leeds, Derby, Liverpool, Manchester, the duke of Bridgewater's canal, Leicester, Harborough, &c. And

On the twenty-third of September his Danish majesty having previously condescended to dine with the Lord-mayor, Sir Robert Ladbroke, knt. locum tenens (the right honourable the Lord-mayor being indisposed) together with the aldermen and sheriffs, attended by the city officers, set out from Guildhall for the Three Cranes, the locum tenens being in the state coach, accompanied by deputy John Paterfon, esq. (who was desired to act as interpreter on this occasion) and the aldermen and sheriffs in their respective carriages. At eleven o'clock they embarked on board the city state barge, the streamers flying, a select band of water-music playing in the stern, the principal livery companies attending in their respective barges. At the stairs leading to New palace yard, a detachment of grenadiers of the honourable artillery company attended, to receive the locum tenens, aldermen and sheriffs, who, upon notice of his Danish majesty's approach, immediately landed to receive and conduct him on board. As soon as his majesty entered the barge he was saluted by several pieces of cannon, and the joyful acclamations of the several livery companies, and a vast surrounding multitude.

The locum tenens, in order to give his majesty a more compleat view of the cities of London and Westminster, and of the river and the several bridges thereon (which as well as the river itself, and the shore on both sides, were crowded with innumerable spectators) ordered the state barge to take a circuit as far as Lambeth, from whence she was steered down as far as to the steel-yard, through the centre arch of Westminster-bridge, and thence up to the Temple-stairs, his majesty being saluted at the New-bridge, both at his going and returning through the great arch, by fifes and drums, with the shouts of the several workmen above, and french horns underneath.

During the course of this grand procession on the water, his majesty frequently expressed himself highly pleased, and his admiration of the several great and beautiful objects round him; and sometimes condescended to come forward in order to gratify the curiosity of the people, who eagerly endeavoured to get a sight of his royal person, though at the hazard of their lives.

At the Temple, his majesty (being landed on a platform erected and matted on purpose, and under an awning covered with blue cloth) was received by some of the benchers of both societies, and conducted to the Middle-Temple-hall, where an elegant collation had been provided for him.

His majesty, after taking some refreshment, and thanking the two societies for their polite reception and entertainment, was conducted to the city state coach, in which his majesty took his seat on the right hand of the locum tenens, being accompanied by his excellency count Barnsdorff and Mr. deputy Paterfon, attended by the sword and mace, and followed by nine noblemen of his majesty's retinue, and by the aldermen and sheriffs in a long train of carriages. From the Temple his majesty (preceded by the artillery company, and worshipful company of Goldsmiths, the city marshals on horseback, and the rest of the city officers on foot) was conducted to the Mansion-house: the several streets through which his majesty passed, viz. Fleet-street, Ludgate-hill, St. Paul's church yard, Cheapside, and the Poultry, being crowded with an innumerable populace, while the windows and tops of houses were equally crowded with spectators of both sexes, whose acclamations, together with the ringing of bells, and the shouts of the multitude, loudly expressed their joy at his majesty's presence; his majesty expressing his surprize at the populousness of this city, and his satisfaction at the kindness of the citizens.

At the Mansion-house, his majesty was received by the committee (appointed to manage the entertainment) in their mazarine gowns: who with white wands, ushered his majesty into the great parlour, where, after he had rested himself a few minutes, Mr. Common Serjeant (in the absence of Mr. Recorder) made him the city's compliments in the following words:

" Most illustrious prince,

" The Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons
" of the city of London, humbly beg leave to " express their grateful sense of your very oblig" ing condescension, in honouring them with " your presence at the Mansion of their chief " magistrate.

" The many endearing ties which happily
" connect you, Sir, with our most gracious sove" reign, justly entitle you to the respect and " veneration of all his majesty's faithful subjects.
" But your affability and other princely virtues,
" so eminently displayed, during the whole course
" of your residence amongst us, have in a par" ticular manner, charmed the citizens of Lon" don; who reflect with admiration on your " early and uncommon thirst of knowledge, and " your indefatigable pursuit of it by travel and " observation; the happy fruits of which they " doubt not will be long employed and acknow" ledged

" ledged within the whole extent of your influence and command.

" Permit us, Sir, to express our earnest wishes, that your personal intercourse with our amiable monarch may tend to increase and perpetuate a friendship so essential to the protestant interest in general, and so likely to promote the power, happiness and prosperity of the British and Danish nations; and that the citizens of London, in particular, may ever be honoured with a share of your remembrance and regard."

To this compliment his majesty was pleased to return a most polite answer, in the Danish language; which, by his majesty's permission, was interpreted to the company, by Mr. Deputy Paterfon, as follows:

" Gentlemen,

" I am highly sensible of the kindness of your expressions to me; I desire you will accept my best thanks in return, and be fully persuaded that I can never forget the affection which the British nation is pleased to shew me, and that I shall always be disposed to prove my grateful sense of it to them, and in particular to you, gentlemen, and this great, celebrated, and flourishing city which you govern."

Upon notice that the dinner was served, his majesty, with the locum tenens on his left, was conducted by the committee into the Egyptian-hall; where his majesty condescended to proceed quite round, that the ladies (who made a most brilliant appearance in the galleries) might have a full view of his royal person; and all the gentlemen of the common-council below, an opportunity of personally paying him their respects.

His majesty being seated in a chair of state, on the right hand of the locum tenens, at a table placed upon an elevation across the upper-end of the hall, with his noble attendants on the right, and the aldermen above the chair on the left, was saluted by a band of above forty of the best performers, in an orchestra fronting his majesty's table.

During the dinner, the following toasts were drank, being proclaimed by sound of trumpet:

1. The king.
2. The queen, prince of Wales, and royal family.
3. His majesty of Denmark and Norway.
4. The queen and royal family of Denmark.
5. Prosperity to the kingdoms of Denmark and Norway.

After which his majesty was pleased to propose the following toasts, which were proclaimed in the same manner:

1. Prosperity to the British nation.
2. Prosperity to the city of London.

Mr. Deputy Paterfon having the honour to attend his majesty as interpreter, his majesty, thro' him, repeatedly expressed to the locum tenens how much he admired the grandeur of the Egyptian hall, the brilliancy of the illuminations round it, the magnificence of the dinner, the excellence of the music, and the good order and decorum of the whole entertainment.

After dinner, his majesty was reconducted into the great parlour, where he was presented with tea and coffee, and entertained with Solos on different instruments, by several capital performers.

At eight o'clock in the evening, his majesty and his retinue, after taking leave of the locum tenens and the corporation, were ushered to their coaches, the committee going before his majesty with wax lights. His majesty then returned to his apartment in St. James's palace, amidst the same crowd and acclamations as before, with the addition of illuminations in almost every window, that the people might have the pleasure of seeing his majesty as long as possible.

The disposition of the lights, (which were at least 2000) the arrangements of the tables, the erection of the temporary orchestra, and the whole of the ornamenting the Egyptian-hall were executed with the utmost propriety and elegance, under the direction of Mr. George Dance, clerk to the city works.

On the tenth of October, his majesty the king of Denmark gave a most superb masked ball at the Hay-market, at which were present the greatest number of the nobility and gentry ever assembled together upon any occasion of the like nature. The illuminations were particularly splendid and elegant. His Danish majesty went in a private manner, to the theatre, accompanied only by his excellency Count Holke, in his own coach and pair and afterwards robed himself in masquerade in one of the dressing-rooms. A little after ten the noblemen of his majesty's retinue followed in chairs, in their masquerade dresses, extremely rich and elegant. The ball was opened by his Danish majesty and the duchess of Ancafter. The principal grotesque characters were a conjuror, a black, and an old woman; there was also a methodist preacher, a chimney-sweeper, with his bag, shovel and scraper, and a boor with a bull's head, all which were supported with the highest honour imaginable.

On the twelfth the king of Denmark took leave of their majesties, and all the royal family. And the next day, after having breakfasted, he took a respectful leave of the earl of Hertford and lord Talbot, who attended him, and set out for Dover, to embark for Calais, in his way to Paris. Before his departure, he made a present to the right honourable the earl of Hertford, lord chamberlain, and to the right honourable lord Talbot, lord Steward, of a ring each, valued at 1500l. and left 1000 guineas to be distributed among the domesticks at the king's palace.

The expense of the king of Denmark's table at St. James's was defrayed by the king of Great Britain. Besides inferior ones, there were two principal tables; that of his Danish majesty was sumptuous, the most elegant and superb; and the whole daily cost was estimated at eighty-four pounds exclusive of wines.

Her majesty being happily delivered of a prince on the eighth of November (afterwards baptized tized by the name of Augusta Sophia) the right honourable the Lord-mayor, aldermen and commons, of the city of London, waited on his majesty; when James Eyre, esq, the recorder, made their compliments in the following address:

" Most gracious sovereign,

" We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council assembled, most humbly beg leave to express our sincere and hearty congratulations on the safe delivery of the queen, and the auspicious birth of another princess.

" Every increase of domestic happiness to your majesty and most amiable consort will always fill the hearts of your faithful citizens of London with joy and gratitude to the divine goodness.

" Permit us, Sir, to offer you our most unfeigned assurances of duty and affection to your royal person; and we most ardently pray, that your reign may be long and prosperous; that loyalty to your majesty, submission to the laws, the love of true constitutional liberty, and a well-governed zeal for the common welfare, may animate your majesty's subjects throughout every part of your extensive empire."

To which address his majesty was pleased to return the following most gracious answer:

" I receive with the greatest pleasure this dutiful and affectionate address, and return you my hearty thanks for your congratulations on the happy delivery of the queen, and the birth of a princess, as well as for the repeated assurances you give me of your loyalty and attachment to my person and family.

" The preservation of the religion, laws and liberties of my people, in every part of my dominions, is essential to their true happiness, and is, therefore, the great object of my attention. These are the principles which ever have been, and ever shall be, the sole rule of my government."

There being at this time a vacancy in the house of commons by the death of Mr. Cooke, member for Middlesex, Mr. serjeant Glyn and Sir William Beauchamp Proctor offered themselves as candidates for the said county. And on the eighth of December, about eleven o'clock in the morning, the election began at Brentford, which was carried on with much tranquillity till about a quarter after two; at which time it was generally thought that Mr. serjeant Glyn had polled a greater number than Sir William Beauchamp Proctor, when on a sudden a great riot ensued; the mob mounted the hustings; attempted to seize some of the poll-books, and entirely put a stop to the business. On this, great numbers of freeholders were hurt in trying to get away, others came home directly, and the remainder of the day was a scene of confusion.

The following spirited address which appeared in the papers, together with the ensuing consequences of this riot, will sufficiently serve to shew the nature and design of it.

" To the gentlemen, clergy, and freeholders of the county of Middlesex.

" Gentlemen,

" The warm professions of gratitude, so frequently uttered by those who feel no gratitude to their constituents because the means by which they succeed take off all obligation, make me at a loss for terms to express myself on so signal, so generous, and so glorious a support as I have met with from you.

" Every means employed, every influence exerted during a six months canvass, have not been able to divert a great majority of you from espousing the cause of a candidate, whom you supposed a friend to the cause of the people, and in whom you hoped to find a zealous defender of the rights and liberties of his country.

" Honour or infamy will deservedly attend me, in the same manner as my future conduct shall answer or disappoint your expectations. I do not owe your support to any personal friendship or connections; and am therefore free, even from the temptation of leaning to them: my obligations are to the public, and to the public I will return them.

" For my conduct in the course of this election, I can appeal even to my adversaries; and the truth of my declaration to you has been most convincingly proved, by the infamous behaviour of my opponents, in their lawless interruption of the poll, when a mob of hired ruffians were at a signal let loose upon the peaceable, unarmed, and inoffensive freeholders of the county of Middlesex, in order to destroy those whom they could not corrupt, and to wrest from them by violence that freedom of election, which every undue and unconstitutional interposition has failed to overthrow.

" The sheriffs, and every person present, were witnesses of a scene never before exhibited at an election. A desperate set of ruffians, with Liberty and Proctor in their hats, without the least opposition, without the least provocation, or cause or quarrel, destroying those who did not lift up a hand in their defence. Sir William, to whom I called to go with me and face this mob, made me no answer, and left me: I remained last man upon the hustings.

" However, I live, gentlemen, to assert not so much my election, as your rights; and I pledge myself to you, that your blood so wantonly shed yesterday, shall be vindicated, and the charge brought home both to the hired and the hirers. The more exalted their stations, and the more privileged their persons, the louder is the call for justice; and the more necessary its execution. Whether as your representative, or as a private gentleman, I pledge myself to you to go through with this business, or to perish in the attempt.

" The freedom of a county election is the last sacred sacred privilege we have left; and it does not become any honest Englishman to survive it. For my own part, I will not. And if by this declaration I may seem to depart from that moderation which has always particularly marked my character, it is because I think tameness in a cause like this, is infamy. There is virtue still left in this country; we are come to a crisis, and the consequence of this struggle will determine whether we shall be freemen or slaves.

"It is at present depending before the house of commons, what measures shall be next pursued in regard to this election. When they have decided, I will give you the earliest notice possible; and I promise you that no discouragement shall ever make me desert you, who have shewn that you will not desert yourselves.

I am, gentlemen,
Your most grateful, and faithful humble servant,

Bloomsbury-square,
Dec. 9, 1768.

JOHN GLYN,

The election was renewed on the fourteenth, and carried on with the utmost tranquillity, without the least appearance of disorder, except that a few snow-balls were thrown at the friends of one of the candidates; but the constables interfering, all was quiet: and at the close of the poll, the number for each candidate appeared as follows:

For Mr. serjeant Glyn	1542
For Sir W. B. Proctor	1278

In consequence of which the former was declared duly elected.

The next day Edward Umfreville, esq; one of the coroners for the county of Middlesex, took an inquisition on the body of John Clarke, a young gentleman, then lying dead, at the White-Hart, in Welbeck-street, in the parish of Marybone, before a respectable jury of neighbours, summoned to enquire how he came by his death; when it appeared to them, from very clear and positive evidence, that it was occasioned by a blow given him by a stick or bludgeon at Brentford election, on the eighth instant, from a person or persons, of the mob concerned in the riot on that day, at the time of the said election. The jury desired to have the assistance and opinion of a surgeon, when a very eminent one was sent for, and, after opening the head of the deceased, examining him in a very particular manner, and giving his opinion, that the said blow was the cause of his death, the jury, without the least hesitation, unanimously gave in their verdict to be wilful murder, by some person or persons unknown.

Soon after this two persons (Lawrence Balfe, and Edward M<sup>c</sup> Quirk) were taken up for the said murder, and being tried at the Old Bailey, were capitally convicted; but in the intermediate time between their conviction, and that appointed for their execution, a respite was sent to Newgate during pleasure; after which they both received his majesty's free pardon.

On the third of January 1769, came on at St. Bride's-church Fleet-street, the election for an alderman of the ward of Farringdon without (vacant by the death of Sir Francis Gosling.) The candidates were John Wilkes, esq; and Mr. Bromwich, paper stainer. The shew of hands appeared in favour of Mr. Wilkes, but a poll being demanded by the latter, the same began immediately, at the close of which (for that day) the numbers appeared as follow:

For Mr. Wilkes	255
For Mr. Bromwich	60

Whereupon Mr. Bromwich declined the election, and Mr. Wilkes was declared duly elected.

At a numerous and respectable meeting of freeholders of the county of Middlesex, held at the Mile-end assembly room on the twelfth, the following instructions were unanimously agreed to, and directed to be transmitted to the knights of the shire:

To John Wilkes, esq; and John Glyn, esq; knights of the shire for the county of Middlesex.

Gentlemen,

We the freeholders of the county of Middlesex, direct and instruct you our representatives in parliament,

1. To endeavour to continue to us, and to confirm our old constitutional and only rightful trial by jury.
2. To promote a strict parliamentary enquiry into the transactions of the military in St. George's-fields on Tuesday the tenth of May last.
3. To promote a like enquiry into the riot and murders committed at Brentford, on the eighth of last December.
4. To examine into the administration of justice in this county; particularly into the present state of the commission of the peace.
5. And, as far as in your power, to promote an enquiry into the rights of the public to the territorial revenue arising from the conquests in India.

The like instructions were presented by the electors of Westminster, to the right honourable the earl Percy, and the honourable Edwin Sandys, representatives in parliament for that city and liberty, with the following additional article:

"And we do strongly insist, that you never "cease your endeavours to promote an enquiry "into the case and grievances of John Wilkes, "esq; and to vindicate and support the rights of "the people who have elected him their representative."

After various debates in the house of commons respecting the legality of Mr. Wilkes being member for the county of Middlesex, it was determined on the fourth of February that he was not a proper person to sit as member, and was therefore expelled the said house.

On the tenth, a common hall of the livery of the city of London was held at Guildhall, when Mr.

Mr. Clavey, an eminent linen-draper, and one of the common-council of Farringdon-ward within, was appointed chairman. Soon after which the livery being informed, that Mr. alderman Beckford was in the council-chamber, some of the gentlemen were deputed to wait on him to desire his presence, with which he complied; when they presented the following instructions:

To Sir Robert Ladbroke, knt. William Beckford, esq; The right hon. Thomas Harley, esq; and Barlow Trecothick, esq; aldermen, the representatives in parliament for the city of London.

Gentlemen,

We, your constituents, assembled in the Guild-hall of London, fully sensible of the value of the laws and constitution transmitted to us by our ancestors, and firmly resolved to preserve this inheritance entire, as we have received it, think it our indispensable duty at this time, as well as our undoubted right, to instruct you, our representatives in parliament, as follows:

1. We recommend that you exert your utmost endeavours, that the proceedings in the case of libels, and all other criminal matters, may be confined to the known rules of law, and not rendered dangerous to the subject by forced constructions, new modes of enquiry, unconstitutional tribunals, or new and unusual punishments, tending to take away or diminish the benefit of trial by juries.

2. That you carefully watch over the great bulwark of our liberties, the Habeas Corpus act, and that you enquire into, and censure any attempt to allude, or enervate the force of that law.

3. That you preserve equally inviolate the privilege of parliament, and the rights of the electors in the choice of their representatives.

4. That you do not discourage petitions, by selecting such parts thereof as may tend not to relieve, but to criminate the petitioner, so as to prevent all approach to your house, by which means the most essential article of the declaration of rights may be eluded, or rendered of the less effect.

5. That you endeavour to prevent all application of the public money to influence elections of members to serve in parliament.

6. That you give no countenance to the dangerous doctrine of constructive treasons, or to the application of doubtful or uncertain laws to this interesting object, nor suffer ministers to be invested with a vague and discretionary power of judging on, or prosecuting this offence, and that you will vigorously oppose any measures tending to introduce modes and circumstances of trial, which may render it difficult or impossible for the party accused to obtain full and equal justice.

7. That you will, as the representatives of this great commercial city, be particularly attentive to the interest of the manufactures, and the trade of this kingdom in all parts of the world, and more especially in the British American colonies, the only profitable trade this kingdom enjoys unrivalled by other nations; for which purpose we recommend your utmost endeavours to reconcile the unhappy differences subsisting between the mother country and the colonies, the fatal effects of which have, in part, been severely felt by the manufacturer, and commercial part of the kingdom.

8. That you will, at this time particularly, attend to the preservation of public faith, the sole foundation of public credit; and that you do not, upon any pretence of public good whatsoever, concur in any measure that shall tend to weaken or destroy that faith.

9. That you use your utmost endeavours, that the civil magistracy of this kingdom be put on a respectable footing, and thereby remove the pretence of calling in a military force, and preserve this nation from a calamity which has already been fatal to the liberties of every kingdom round us, and which we, at this day, are beginning to feel.

10. That you promote a strict enquiry into the use which has lately been made of military power, whether any encouragement has been given to premature or injudicious military alacrity, and whether any undue measures have been taken to prevent or elude the course of public justice on such an occasion.

11. That you use your best endeavours for having a standing committee appointed, from time to time to examine, and to state the public accounts.

12. That if any demand should come before parliament for payment of the debts of the civil list, you will diligently enquire how these debts have been incurred, to the prejudice of the subject, and the dignity of the crown.

13. That you will promote a bill for limiting the number of placemen and pensioners in the house of commons; for preventing the peers of Great Britain from interfering in elections for members of parliament, and that an oath to prevent bribery and corruption be taken not only by the electors, but also by the candidates; at the opening of the poll.

14. That you use your utmost endeavours to obtain an act to shorten the duration of parliaments; and lastly, we submit it to your consideration, whether a change in the present mode of election, to that of ballot, would not be the most likely method of procuring a return of members, on the genuine and uncorrupted sense of the people.

Mr. Wilkes having been expelled the house of commons, a new writ was issued out for the election of a knight of the shire for the county of Middlesex, which came on at Brentford the 17th; when John Wilkes, esq; being put in nomination by James Townshend, esq; member for West-Loo, in Cornwall, and seconded by John Sawbridge, esq; member for Hithe, the freeholders were unanimous in their approbation of the gentleman nominated, and accordingly Mr. Wilkes was returned without opposition.

Notwithstanding this the house of commons rejected Mr Wilkes, as not being a proper person son; and issued out a writ for a new election, which came on the sixteenth of March, when Mr. Wilkes was re-chosen without opposition. Mr. Dingley, who had offered himself as a candidate by advertisement in the papers, appeared on the hustings, but was not proposed by any gentleman present; and though the sheriffs repeatedly went round the hustings to ask if any gentleman would offer himself as a candidate, no one was nominated; whereupon Mr. Wilkes was declared duly elected.

The house, however, still persevered in their objections to Mr. Wilkes, and that very evening declared the election null and void; after which they issued out a new writ for another election.

Addressees were at this time presented to his majesty from almost every part of the kingdom; among which was that of the merchants of the city of London, who waited on his majesty the twenty-second, and being introduced by the earl of Hertford, lord-chamberlain of the household, they presented the same, and were most graciously received. When they set out from the Royal-Exchange, in order to present the address, the populace shewed their resentment by the throwing of mud, &c. they shut the gates at Temple-bar, and did every thing possible to impede their progress. When some of the coaches got to Exeter-change, a hearse came out of Exeter-street, and preceded them, drawn by a black and a white horse, the driver of which was dressed in a kind of rough coat, resembling a skin, with a large cap, on one side black, the other white, whose whole figure was very grotesque. On one side of the hearse was painted on canvass a representation of the rioters killing Mr. Clarke at the Brentford election; and on the other side was a representation of the soldiers firing on young Allen in the cow-house. The populace were so outrageous, that some of the merchants were obliged to quit their carriages, and take shelter in the houses; and others, whose clothes were entirely covered with mud, retired home to shift themselves before they could proceed with the address.

When Mr. Boehm (in whose possession was the original address) was obliged to get out of his coach at Nando's coffee-house, to avoid the mob, in his hurry he left the address under the cushion on one of the seats in the coach, and immediately ordered the coachman to go home: some of the mob opened the coach door, and began to search for the address, but the coachman declaring it was sent before, they were less diligent in their search, and missed laying hold of it, by not feeling six inches farther on the seat. The coachman then drove back; but instead of going home, he drove to the coach-makers in Bishopsgate-street. As soon as Mr. Boehm was safe in the coffee-house, some gentlemen went to St. James's to inform the lords in waiting of the occasion of their delay, and that Mr. Boehm would follow when the crowd was a little dispersed; but after waiting an hour or more, and no address arriving, a messenger was dispatched back to the coffee-house for the address, where Mr. Boehm having missed it, remained in great suspense, and had sent to his house to have the coach searched; but no coach was arrived there, which for some time caused great confusion. At last, however, they sent to the coach-makers, and luckily found the address under the cushion, which was immediately forwarded to St. James's. This accident retarded the presenting the address upwards of two hours. In the mean time, those gentlemen who had arrived at St. James's, and were waiting for it, had begun to sign a copy, which one of the gentlemen had with him, in order to present; when luckily the address came, after about a dozen had signed the copy.

On the fourteenth of April came on again at Brentford the election of a knight of the shire for the county of Middlesex. The candidates were, Mr. Wilkes, Mr. Luttrell, Mr. Roche, and Mr. serjeant Whitaker. At four o'clock in the afternoon the poll was closed, when the numbers for each candidate appeared as follow:

For Mr. Wilkes	1143
Mr. Luttrell	293
Mr. Whitaker	5
Mr. Roche	0

Whereupon Mr. Wilkes was declared duly elected.

The next evening the house of commons, after very considerable debates, determined that Mr. Wilkes was still incapable of being a member in this parliament; and that colonel Luttrell should be sitting member for the county of Middlesex. In consequence of which the next day colonel Luttrell took the oaths and his seat in the house of commons, as knight of the shire for the said county.

The freeholders of Middlesex finding themselves thus deprived of their right of election, immediately set about means for the recovery of their lost privileges. For which purpose various meetings were held at the assembly room, Mile-end; the most material of which was on the twenty-eighth of April, when it was resolved that John Glyn, esq; Walpole Eyre, esq; George Bellas, esq; James Adair, esq; John Sawbridge, esq; James Townshend, esq; the Rev. Dr. Wilson, George Prefcot, esq; Arnold Wallinger, esq; and Francis Ascough, esq; be desired to wait upon his majesty with a petition, which was read to and approved by all the freeholders. Mr. Townshend desired that it might be understood, that no other freeholder should attend the delivering of this petition, because it might give a pretence to administration, to misrepresent to his majesty an act of their innocent curiosity as tumult, insurrection, and open rebellion. The petition was then signed by above five hundred freeholders, and on the twenty-fifth of May was presented to his majesty at St. James's by the following gentlemen: Mr. serjeant Glyn, Mr. Sawbridge, Mr. Townshend, Mr. Bellas, Mr. Ellis, Mr. Ascough, and the rev. Dr. Wilson. They were very graciously received, and all had the honour of kissing his majesty's hand.

This petition being of a very singular nature, and of the highest importance to the liberty of the subject, we shall, for the satisfaction of our readers, insert it at large.

To

To the king's most excellent majesty.

The humble petition of the freeholders of the county of Middlesex.

Most gracious sovereign,

We, your majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the freeholders of the county of Middlesex, beg leave, with all affectionate submission and humility, to throw ourselves at your royal feet, and humbly to implore your paternal attention to those grievances, of which this country and the whole nation complain, and those fearful apprehensions with which the whole British empire is most justly alarmed.

With great grief and sorrow, we have long beheld the endeavours of certain evil minded persons, who attempt to infuse into your royal mind, notions and opinions of the most dangerous and pernicious tendency, and who promote and counsel such measures as cannot fail to destroy that harmony and confidence, which should ever subsist between a just and virtuous prince and a free and loyal people.

For this disaffected purpose, they have introduced into every part of the administration of our happy, legal constitution, a certain unlimited and indefinite discretionary power; to prevent which is the sole aim of all our laws, and was the sole cause of all those disturbances and revolutions, which formerly distracted this unhappy country; for our ancestors, by their own fatal experience, well knew that in a state where discretion begins, law, liberty, and safety end. Under the pretence of this discretion, or, as it was formerly and has been lately called—Law of State—we have seen

English subjects, and even a member of the British legislature, arrested by virtue of a general warrant, issued by a secretary of state, contrary to the law of the land—

Their houses rifled and plundered, their papers seized, and used as evidence upon trial—

Their bodies committed to close imprisonment—

The Habeas Corpus eluded—

Trial by jury discountenanced, and the first law officer of the crown publicly insinuating that juries are not to be trusted—

Printers punished by the ministry in the supreme court without a trial by their equals, without any trial at all—

The remedy of the law for false imprisonment barred and defeated—

The plaintiff and his attorney, for their appeal to the law of the land, punished by expences and imprisonment, and made, by forced engagements, to desist from their legal claim—

A writing determined to be a libel by a court where it was not cognizable in the first instance; contrary to law, because all appeal is thereby cut off, and inferior courts and juries influenced by such predetermination—

A person condemned in the said court as the author of the supposed libel unheard, without defence or trial—

Unjust treatment of petitions, by selecting only such parts as might be wrested to criminate the petitioner, and refusing to hear those which might procure him redress—

The thanks of one branch of the legislature proposed by a minister to be given to an acknowledged offender, for his offence, with the declared intention of screening him from law—

Attachments wrested from their original intent of removing obstructions to the proceedings of law, to punish, by sentence of arbitrary fine and imprisonment, without trial or appeal, supposed offences committed out of court—

Perpetual imprisonment of an Englishman without trial, conviction, or sentence, by the same mode of attachment, wherein the same person is at once party, accuser, judge, and jury—

Instead of the ancient and legal civil police, the military introduced at every opportunity, unnecessarily and unlawfully patrolling the streets, to the alarm and terror of the inhabitants—

The lives of many of your majesty's innocent subjects destroyed by military execution—

Such military execution solemnly adjudged to be legal—

Murder abetted, encouraged, and rewarded—

The civil magistracy rendered contemptible by the appointment of improper and incapable persons—

The civil magistrates tampered with by administration, and neglecting and refusing to discharge their duty—

Mobs and riots hired and raised by the ministry, in order to justify and recommend their own illegal proceedings, and to prejudice your majesty's mind by false insinuations against the loyalty of your majesty's subjects—

The freedom of election violated by corrupt and undue influence, by unpunished violence and murder—

The just verdicts of juries, and the opinion of the judges, over-ruled by false representations to your majesty; and the determinations of the law set aside by new, unprecedented, and dangerous means; thereby leaving the guilty without restraint, and the injured without redress, and the lives of your majesty's subjects at the mercy of every ruffian protected by administration—

Obsolete and vexatious claims of the crown set on foot for partial and election purposes—

Partial attacks on the liberty of the press; the most daring and pernicious libels against the constitution, and against the liberty of the subject, being allowed to pass unnoticed, whilst the slightest libel against a minister is punished with the utmost rigour.

Wicked attempts to increase and establish a standing army, by endeavouring to vest in the crown an unlimited power over the militia; which, should they succeed, must, sooner or later, subvert the constitution, by augmenting the power of administration in proportion to their delinquency—

Repeated endeavours to diminish the importance of members of parliament individually, in order to render them more dependant on administration collectively. Even threats have been employed by ministers to suppress the freedom of

debate; and the wrath of parliament denounced against measures authorised by the law of the land—

Resolutions of one branch of the legislature set up as the law of the land, being a direct usurpation of the rights of the two other branches; and therefore a manifest infringement of the constitution—

Public money shamefully squandered and unaccounted for, and all inquiry into the cause of arrears in the civil list prevented by the ministry—

Inquiry into a pay-master's public accounts stopped in the exchequer, though the sums unaccounted for by that pay-master amount to above forty millions sterling—

Public loans perverted to private ministerial purposes—

Prostitution of public honours and rewards, to men who can neither plead public virtue nor services—

Irreligion and immorality, so eminently discountenanced by your majesty's royal example, encouraged by administration both by example and precept.

The same indiscretion has been extended by the same evil counsellors to your majesty's dominions in America, and has produced to our suffering fellow subjects in that part of the world, grievances and apprehensions similar to those of which we complain at home—

Most gracious sovereign,

Such are the grievances and apprehensions which have long discontented and disturbed the greatest and best part of your majesty's subjects. Unwilling, however, to interrupt your royal repose, though ready to lay down our lives and fortunes for your majesty's service, and for the constitution as by law established, we have waited patiently, expecting a constitutional remedy by the means of our own representatives: but our loyal and free choice having been repeatedly rejected, and the right of election now finally taken from us by the unprecedented seating of a candidate who was never chosen by the county; and who, even to become a candidate, was obliged fraudulently to vacate his seat in parliament, under the pretence of an insignificant place, invited thereto by the prior declaration of a minister, that whoever opposed our choice, though but with four votes, should be declared member for the county. We see ourselves, by this last act, deprived even of the franchises of Englishmen, reduced to the most abject state of slavery, and left without hopes or means of redress but from your majesty or God.

Deign then, most gracious sovereign, to listen to the prayer of the most faithful of your majesties subjects; and to banish from your royal favour, trust and confidence, for ever those evil and pernicious counsellors, who have endeavoured to alienate the affection of your majesty's most sincere and dutiful subjects, and whose suggestions tend to deprive your people of their dearest and most essential rights, and who have traiterously dared to depart from the spirit and letter of those laws which have secured the crown of these realms to the house of Brunswick, in which we make our most earnest prayers to God, that it may continue untarnished to the latest posterity.

Signed by 1565 Freholders.

On the fifth of May a court of common-council was held at Guildhall, in consequence of an application of a large body of the livery to the Lord-mayor, desiring him to call a common-hall, and acquainting him, it was for the purpose of taking the sense of the livery of London, on the measures proper to be pursued by them on the present alarming situation of public affairs, which his lordship had refused till such time as he had taken the sense of the common-council upon it; upon which a question was moved by Mr. Bellas, and seconded by Mr. Freeman, "that the right hon. the Lord-mayor be desired to issue a precept to assemble the livery in common-hall, pursuant to the application to his lordship," and after long debates thereon, the said question being put, was declared to be carried in the negative; upon which a division was demanded, Mr. Bellas and Mr. Freeman, tellers for the question, Mr. Paterson and Mr. Deputy Ellis, tellers against the question; when there appeared to be for the question, three aldermen, sixty nine commoners, against the question, six aldermen, eighty-six commoners.

The aldermen that divided on the question were

On the twenty-fourth of June, a wardmote was held at Leatherfeller's-hall by the right hon. the Lord mayor, for the election of an alderman of Bishopsgate-ward, in the room of Sir Matthew Blackiston, bart. who had resigned; when James Townsend, esq; member for West-Loos in Cornwall, was chosen without opposition. Upon which Mr. Townsend expressed his thanks in a concise speech; but at the same time observed, that the satisfaction he felt on the honour conferred on him, prevented his being able to express the grateful sense of it, in the manner he could have wished, but that his future life should be dedicated to the service and interest of this great city in general, and the above ward in particular.

On the twenty-sixth a court of aldermen was held at Guildhall for the choice of sheriffs, and other officers for the year ensuing. Previous to the opening of the court, Samuel Vaughan, esq; addressed himself to the livery, and strongly recommended commended decency in their behaviour, as the most likely, and indeed the only means, by which they could accomplish the end for which so numerous a body had assembled.

At one o'clock the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen came upon the hustings, when the recorder came forward, and attempted to open the business of the day, but an almost general hiss and uproar ensued, many calling out for them to consider of a petition in the first place: on which the Lord-mayor addressed himself to the livery, and in a very genteel speech acquainted them, that he had taken a great deal of pains to inform himself of the duty of his office on the present occasion, and that he could not find one single instance of any business being done previous to the choice of officers; at the same time assuring them, that no one had a greater regard to the liberty of the subject than himself, but strongly recommended decency and good order, declaring that he would not break up the court till such time as they had taken the opinion of the livery relative to the matter they wanted to enforce, if the livery would first proceed to do the business for which the common hall was called. This declaration was received with shouts of applause; but a gentleman expressing his dislike to the measure of delay, another clamour arose, when Mr. Bellas desired to be heard, and begged the gentlemen to proceed to business in an orderly manner, as the only means to preserve their liberty, and to free themselves from the imputation of licentiousness, observing, that as the Lord-mayor had promised not to break up the court till they were satisfied, it would be the height of rudeness to doubt the veracity of their chief magistrate.

Mr. recorder then spoke to the following effect:

He told them, that he did not intend to intrude any opinion of his own on the gentlemen of the livery, what he had to say was officially, and when that was over his business was done. He then descanted on the importance of the office, of sheriff, and concluded with observing, "that honest, respectable, conscientious men, should be the objects of their choice."

Thirteen candidates were then put in nomination, amongst whom were James Townsend and John Sawbridge, esqrs. who, upon holding up of hands, carried it nemine contradicente. What was very remarkable, amongst the other eleven there were but two hands up. Several other officers were then put up for the ensuing year who are now in office, and who were all re-chosen, except two of the auditors, in whose room Mr. deputy Richard Townsend and Mr. Boddington succeeded.

The Lord-mayor, agreeable to his promise, then came into court, and said he was ready to hear the livery's proposal, on which Mr. Lovel got up, and spoke for near a quarter of an hour on the many grievances the liverymen, in common with their fellow-citizens, laboured under. After he had finished, there was a proposal made (which was carried una voce) that the petition should be then read, and it was read accordingly; but the Lord-mayor begged leave to make one alteration, which was this, that instead of "the humble petition of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and livery of the city of London," it should run thus: "The humble petition of the livery of the city of London."

The petition was read a second time with this alteration, and was universally approved of.

A proposal was then made by Mr. Vaughan, that the Lord-mayor, sheriffs, and members of the city of London, should be requested to wait on his majesty with this petition, which, upon holding up of hands, was universally approved of.

Sir Robert Ladbroke then came forward, and told the gentlemen of the livery, that he not only assented to the proposal, but thought it his duty.

Alderman Beckford being next, addressed them, by assuring them he was ever at the service of the livery of London; that in regard to giving in the petition, it was a request that made him happy, as it agreed entirely with his own opinion; and that in regard to the particulars of the petition now read (as far as he could judge from twice hearing it) he knew most, if not all of the particulars to be facts, and concluded by referring to his conscience for the uprightness of his intentions.

Mr. alderman Trecothick next spoke to the same effect; and said he was happy in attending his brother members on this occasion. The other member, Mr. Harley, was not in court.

A motion was then made, and universally approved of, to return thanks to the Lord-mayor for his great candour and impartiality on this occasion; which his lordship afterwards very politely thanked them for, and concluded by assuring them, that he would, to the best of his power, finish, as he had begun, his office, with justice and impartiality. The business of the day was then adjourned, which, during a course of four hours, and an unexampled number of liverymen, was conducted with the greatest spirit, order and unanimity.

At a general and numerous meeting of the inhabitants of Langbourn-ward, held at Pewterer's-hall the 30th of June, to consider of a proper person to be put in nomination for alderman of that ward, in the room of Sir Joseph Hankey, knight, deceased, John Sawbridge, esq; sheriff elect, and Mr. deputy Wilson were proposed. Upon the question being put for the former, the greatest part of the inhabitants held up their hands with joyful acclamations, and for the latter a very few; upon which Mr. deputy Wilson, who was in the chair, declared Mr. Sawbridge to have the majority.

After Mr. Sawbridge was unanimously elected alderman of Langbourn-ward, he addressed the inhabitants to the following effect:

"Gentlemen,

"I return you my warmest thanks for this distinguished mark of your esteem and confidence, an honour which gives me the highest satisfaction, as it can only proceed from your approbation of my publick conduct, and to which I have not the least least claim or pretence from personal friendship or connection. Permit me to give you this public assurance that I will endeavour to merit the continuance of your esteem by a diligent and conscientious discharge of the duties of this high office, ever remembering, that your unanimous choice can only be considered as an approbation of my zealous endeavours to procure redress of our invaded liberties."

The before-mentioned petition of the livery of London was presented to his majesty the fifth of July, and was as follows :

To the king's most excellent majesty.

The humble petition of the livery of the city of London in common-hall assembled.

Most gracious sovereign,

We your majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the livery of the city of London, with all the humility which is due from free subjects to their lawful sovereign, but with all the anxiety which the sense of the present oppressions, and the just dread of future mischiefs, produce in our minds, beg leave to lay before your majesty some of those intolerable grievances, which your people have suffered from the evil conduct of those who have been intrusted with the administration of your majesty's government; and from the secret unremitting influence of the worst of counsellors.

We should be wanting in our duty to your majesty, as well as to ourselves and our posterity, should we forbear to represent to the throne the desperate attempts which have been, and are too successfully, made, to destroy that constitution, to the spirit of which we owe the relation which subsists between your majesty and the subjects of these realms, and to subvert those sacred laws, which our ancestors have sealed with their blood.

Your ministers, from corrupt principles, and in violation of every duty, have, by various enumerated means, invaded our invaluable and unalienable right of trial by jury.

They have, with impunity, issued general warrants, and violently seized persons and private papers.

They have rendered the laws non-effective to our security, by evading the Habeas Corpus.

They have caused punishments, and even perpetual imprisonment, to be inflicted, without trial, conviction or sentence.

They have brought into disrepute the civil magistracy, by the appointment of persons who are, in many respects, unqualified for that important trust, and have thereby purposely furnished a pretence for calling in the aid of a military power.

They avow, and endeavour to establish, a maxim, absolutely inconsistent with our constitution—that "an occasion for effectually employing a military force always presents itself, when the civil power is trifled with or insulted;" and, by a fatal application of this maxim, they have wantonly and wickedly sacrificed the lives of many of your majesty's innocent subjects, and have prostituted your majesty's sacred name and authority, to justify, applaud, and recommend their own illegal and bloody actions.

They have screened more than one murder from punishment, and in its place have unnaturally substituted reward.

They have established numberless unconstitutional regulations and taxations in our colonies. They have caused a revenue to be raised in some of them by prerogative. They have appointed civil law judges to try revenue causes, and to be paid from out of the condemnation-money.

After having insulted and defeated the law on different occasions, and by different contrivances, both at home and abroad, they have at length completed their design, by violently wresting from the people the last sacred right we had left, the right of election, by the unprecedented seating of a candidate, notoriously set up and chosen only by themselves. They have therefore taken from your subjects all hopes of parliamentary redress, and have left us no resource, under God, but in your majesty.

All this they have been able to effect by corruption; by a scandalous misapplication and embezzlement of the public treasure, and a shameful prostitution of public honours and employments; procuring deficiencies of the civil list to be made good without examination; and, instead of punishing, conferring honours on a pay-master, the public defaulter of unaccounted millions.

From an unfeigned sense of the duty we owe to your majesty, and to our country, we have ventured thus humbly to lay before the throne these great and important truths, which it has been the business of your ministers to conceal. We most earnestly beseech your majesty to grant us redress. It is for the purpose of redress alone and for such occasions as the present, that those great and extensive powers are intrusted to the crown by the wisdom of that constitution, which your majesty's illustrious family was chosen to defend, and which we trust in God it will for ever continue to support.

The gentlemen, clergy, and freeholders of the county of Surry met at Epsom on the twenty-sixth of June, in consequence of several public advertisements, to consider of the best constitutional measures to be taken in support of the right of election. After one o'clock the gentlemen, who were as numerous and respectable as were perhaps ever assembled on any occasion at that place, entered the bowling green, where, in the absence of John Thornton, esq; the sheriff, the honourable Peter King was chosen to preside. Mr. King then addressed the freeholders, and acquainted them how necessary he, and many other respectable gentlemen, had thought it to call a county meeting, to consider of the best measures to be taken in support of the right of election, which he and they, had deemed one of the most valuable privileges we were possessed of, and in consequence told them they were now assembled to consider of such measures. Sir George Colebrooke next spoke in vindication of one of the most important rights we enjoy enjoy as freemen; shewed, in clear and approved terms, how that right had been infringed in the case of the Middlesex election, and made the following motion, which was seconded by Sir Robert Clayton, bart. and unanimously agreed to, viz.

“ That it is the opinion of this meeting, that by the law of the land, the freeholders and electors of Great Britain have an undoubted right to be represented in parliament by any person qualified according to law, who has a majority of legal votes; and that they have reason to apprehend these rights have been abridged in the case of the Middlesex election.”

After this Sir George Colebrooke further expatiated on the object of the present meeting, and acquainted the freeholders, that there appeared in the judgment of the gentlemen he had talked with on this occasion, two measures to be proposed for their adoption, that seemed likely to procure redress in a case affecting the most important right of every elector of this kingdom; the one, a petition to the king; the other, instructions to the county representatives. He gave his reasons why he thought the latter more parliamentary and constitutional, and concluded his speech with a motion for instructions; which being seconded, Dr. Allen immediately addressed the company, and shewed how ineffectual instructions were like to prove in the present case: one of the members had already done every thing in his power to prevent a violation of our franchises, and therefore needed them not: the other all he could do to deprive us of them, who was not likely, in his present situation, to change his opinion, and therefore there could be no use in instructing him: he insisted there was no measure so proper to be taken, as to petition the king on the grievance complained of. In this opinion he was strongly supported by William Ellis, esq; who shewed the legality of the measure in clear terms; supported it by the example of the petitions of the county of Middlesex, and livery of London; and declared, that as the constitution had given us the right, he thought it the only proper method now to be adopted.

Sir Joseph Mawbey next spoke against the motion for instructions, and insisted on their being unnecessary, and would prove ineffectual in the present case. Sir Francis Vincent, he observed, with an integrity and independency which had done him honour, had already discharged his duty in such a manner, as, he hoped, would procure him the unanimous thanks of this meeting; and Mr. Onslow, there was reason to think, would pay no kind of attention to them in the present case: he therefore hoped a petition would be prepared to his majesty, in temperate and becoming terms, and full of that duty, love and attachment, this county has always borne to his majesty; but, at the same time, confined to one single point, and ascertaining, in manly terms, that right which we consider as the foundation of all others we enjoy. Redress might be obtained, if in consequence his majesty should either think it right to remove such of his present ministers, as have counselled and supported a measure, which has violated the first principles of the constitution; or should determine on a dissolution of the present parliament, which, he hoped would take place, sooner than the right of election should be taken away.

After this the reverend Mr. Horne, Claud Crespigny, esq; Marchant Tubb, esq; and others, spoke with great ability, in favour of a petition, and its being immediately prepared; and that measure appearing to be the almost general sense of the company, Sir George Colebrooke declared he would no longer object, provided a petition was prepared in decent terms, and confined to the single object of the Middlesex election.

Sir Robert Clayton then proposed to give the thanks of the county to Sir Francis Vincent, bart. in which he was seconded by Sir Joseph Mawbey, and they were given with the greatest unanimity and cheerfulness, in the following words:

Resolved, that the thanks of this county be given to Sir Francis Vincent, bart. our worthy representative, for his steady, firm, and independent conduct in parliament, and particularly for his endeavours to maintain the rights and franchises of the freeholders and other electors of England.

Before six o'clock in the evening, the petition, which had been prepared by twenty-three gentlemen of the first rank and fortune in the county, was ingrossed and read twice by the honourable Mr. King to the freeholders, who unanimously approved of the same. The petition was afterwards dispersed in various parts of the county, where it met with universal approbation; and was presented to his majesty the 24th of August by the following gentlemen:

Sir Francis Vincent, bart. member for the county.
The honourable Peter King.
Sir George Colebrooke, bart.
Sir Robert Clayton, bart.
Sir Joseph Mawbey, bart.
Joseph Martin, esq;
Barlow Trecothick, esq;
Bras Crosby, esq;
Henry Crab Bolton, esq;

Sir Anthony Abdy, bart. met the above gentlemen, previous to their going to court, at the Thatched-house tavern; but being greatly indisposed with the gout, could not attend them to the palace.

On the king's return from the drawing-room, Sir Francis Vincent, Bart. representative of the county, presented the petition to his majesty, which was most graciously received, and was as follows.

To the king's most excellent majesty.

The humble petition of the freeholders of the county of Surry.

“ Most gracious sovereign!

“ We your majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the freeholders of the county of Surry, from a grateful sense of the inestimable blessings which which this nation has enjoyed under the mild and equal government of your majesty, and your illustrious predecessors of the house of Brunswick, and from a steady attachment, zeal, and affection to your royal person, and family, think it our duty to join with our injured fellow subjects in humbly offering to your majesty our complaints of the measures adopted by pernicious counsellors, who, we apprehend, have countenanced and advised a violation of the first principle of the constitution.

"The right of election in the people, which is the security of all their rights, is also the foundation of your majesty's; we cannot, therefore, forbear being alarmed when we see that first principle violated in the late instance of the Middlesex election.

"We have seen, royal sire, with great concern, an application of the freeholders of the county of Middlesex, made by their humble petition to the house of commons, complaining of that measure, defeated; and it is with the utmost reluctance we now find ourselves constrained to appeal to your sacred person, from whose justice and goodness we can alone hope for redress.

"We therefore most humbly implore your majesty, that you would be graciously pleased to give us such relief as to your royal wisdom shall seem meet, by an exertion of that prerogative which the constitution has so properly placed in your majesty's hands.

"And your majesty's petitioners shall ever pray, &c."

Petitions of the like nature are now in agitation from Worcester, Hertford, Cornwall, Kent, Bucks, Norfolk, Liverpool, Norwich, Yarmouth, Bristol, York; and, in short, from almost every part of the kingdom.

On the 26th of July, about eight o'clock in the evening, a terrible fire broke out at Mr. Ross's, whip-maker to the duke of Cumberland, in Marybone-street, St. James's, which entirely consumed the same, together with Mr. Mundy's, a shoe-maker; Mr. Frith's Manchester warehouse; Mr. Warren's, a perfumer; Mr. Thackwait's, cabinet-maker, with his workshop, and a large quantity of timber; Mr. Lynes, confectioner; besides damaging a number of houses on each side, and three which lay backwards, with a great quantity of goods. The flames communicated themselves into Sherard-street, and destroyed Rustat's coffee-house; Mr. Schooler's, a silk-dyer, and Mr. Hole's a taylor. The number of houses consumed and damaged was about eighteen. It was occasioned by melting of some resin for whip handles.

A most numerous and respectable meeting of the electors of the city of Westminster was held at Westminster-hall the 29th of August, agreeable to a published notice for that purpose, to consider of a petition to his majesty for the redress of grievances. About twelve o'clock Sir Robert Barnard, the chairman, attended by Robert Jones, esq; chairman of the committee, and several other gentlemen, entered the hall, amidst the re-echoed acclamations of the populace. Sir

Robert being seated in an arm chair for that purpose placed on the steps of the court of common-pleas, Mr. Jones opened the business of the day in the following address:

"Gentlemen,

"Sensible of the many grievances, that the electors of the county and city of Westminster labour under, in common with his majesty's subjects, a committee of gentlemen has been appointed (of which I had the honour to be chairman) to draw up a petition to his majesty, praying a redress of those grievances; we have accordingly, gentlemen, drawn up a petition, which I flatter myself will be agreeable to you, and if it is your pleasure, it is now prepared for reading to you."

The electors then unanimously cried out, read, read, and accordingly the petition was read, first by Sir Robert Barnard; the purport of which was as follows:

"The petitioners in common with the rest of his majesty's loyal subjects, feeling sensibly a variety of grievances and oppressions, could not be longer silent on the subject of a late violent and most alarming invasion of their liberties, in the affair of the Middlesex election, which threatens a speedy annihilation of our excellent constitution." And in the conclusion they petitioned to his majesty to dissolve the present parliament, and call another as speedily as may be.

The petition was received with universal applause: after which Mr. Martin read it again with a loud voice; and when he had ended, Sir Robert Barnard asked, if they chose to have it read any more; to which they universally answered, "enough, enough," and accompanied it with huzzas, and other demonstrations of joy.

The chairman then desired all those who were for the petition to hold up their hands, when every hand in the hall was instantly up; and, on the question being reversed, not a single hand was raised.

After this eight clerks were placed in different parts of the hall, with large skins of parchment, on which was wrote the petition for the electors to sign. Sir Robert Barnard and Mr. Jones were the two first who signed the parchment, which was placed next the chair, and at the close of the afternoon, it was signed by near 4000 people.

Thus ended the business of the day, which, notwithstanding the prodigious concourse of people, and the public situation of the place, was conducted with the greatest spirit, unanimity and moderation.

The chairman's seat was first placed on the upper step in the hall, that leads to the King's-bench; but some little time before the committee arrived, the electors carried it off, and removed it just before the entrance of the court of common-pleas, declaring that the fitter situation; for the chair of liberty should be near that court where general warrants were first condemned.

On

On the fourteenth of September, about two o'clock in the morning, a fire broke out at Mr. Hill's, an ironmonger, in St. Martin's-le-Grand, which entirely consumed that house, and four others in St. Christopher's-court adjoining. Two brothers with great difficulty saved themselves by escaping over the tops of the houses. And the same morning, about seven o'clock, another fire broke out in the dwelling-house of Messrs. Buxton and Enderby, oil merchants at Paul's-wharf, Upper Thames-street, which entirely consumed the same, with their Warehouses adjoining, in which were 4000 barrels of oil: also a timber-yard and many other adjacent houses. The flames reached quite to the water-side, where two barges (which could not be got off, it being low-water) took fire, and were consumed: one of them was loaded with oil, which was thrown into the Thames to prevent its feeding the flames. The damage was computed at some thousands of pounds.

Thus have we reduced the History of this great metropolis to the month of September, 1769; at a time, when we are sorry to say, that not only the city of London, but almost every county in the kingdom, is in the greatest commotion.—The ensuing parliament, however, will, in all probability, bring these commotions to some issue: and we heartily wish that issue may tend to the universal satisfaction of the people, and to the farther emolument of the British throne.

*. If any material circumstances should occur during the course of the Survey, we shall for the better completion of our undertaking, insert the same at the close of the work, by way of Appendix.

Containing the number of streets, houses, and inhabitants in the city and liberties of London. Number of parishes within the bills of mortality. Provisions brought to London market. Jurisdictions and government of the city. Its officers and different courts. Number of wards, &c.

THE foundation, form, extent, and situation of this great metropolis has been already given in the former part of this work. We shall now take as minute a survey of its present state and condition as the great improvements which have been made, and still are making will possibly admit.

By an estimate made in the year 1738 of the number of streets, squares, lanes, alleys, courts, &c. within the bills of Mortality there appeared to be 5099; and the number of houses 95,897; but the very considerable improvements which have been made since that time of the waste ground in the city, and the new buildings which extend towards Paddington and Chelsea on the west, to Marybone on the North, and to Bow on the east, render it almost impossible to ascertain the exact number at this time; but by the nearest computation they cannot be less than 150,000, which, upon an average of 20l. per annum for each house, amounts to 3,000,000l. total for rent; and if, upon a like average, we allow 300l. for the building of each house, the estate of this circuit of buildings will amount to 45,000,000l. sterling.

Various have been the attempts made to ascertain the number of inhabitants within these extensive buildings; but the only method of forming any calculation is from the bills of mortality which give the births and deaths, and from the great number of houses; in which, if we allow upon an average, eight persons to a house, the number of inhabitants will appear to be 1200,000.

from the year 1592, in which was a great pestilence that continued for three years after; when the plague ceasing, they were discontinued, and laid aside as useless, till the year 1603; since which they have extended, at different intervals, to such a length as to include 97 parishes within the walls, and 16 without; 23 out parishes in the counties of Middlesex and Surry, and 10 parishes in the city and liberties of Westminster. These parishes, which form the circuit usually called within the bills of mortality, are as follow:

The number of inhabitants in this metropolis may be in a principal degree ascertained by the great quantity of provisions which are yearly brought to the London markets; of which the following is an estimate from Midsummer 1759 to Midsummer 1760.

Wheat-flour	369,635 quarters
Cattle	98,244
Sheep and Lambs	711,123
Calves	194,760
Hogs	186,932
Sucking Pigs	52,000
Oysters	115,536 bushels
Mackarel	14,740,000
Butter	16,366,728 pounds
Cheese	21,066,000 pounds

Exclusive of all kinds of poultry, fish, garden-stuff and milk. And the quantity of beer brewed in the city and suburbs the same year amounted to 975,217 barrels.

We have included in this view not only the city of London and its liberties, but likewise the city of Westminster and Borough of Southwark; we shall now divide these parts, and consider each separately as enjoying some peculiar advantages, and subject to particular modes of government; beginning with that part which contains the city of London and its liberties.

We are to understand by the city of London no more than that part which was formerly encompassed by the wall of the city. Within this wall were eight gates, all of which, except Newgate, have been taken down to make the avenues to the city more airy and commodious. The wall likewise has shared the same fate for the admission of new buildings.

The other parts of the city called the liberties, and which lie without the wall, are bounded on the east, in Whitechapel, the Minories, and Bishopsgate, by bars, which were formerly posts and chains. They are bounded on the north in the same manner in Pickax-street, the end of Fan-alley, alley, and in St. John's-street. On the west by bars in Holbourn, at the east end of Middle-row, and at the west end of Fleet-street by the gate called Temple-bar. And on the south may be included the jurisdiction which the city holds on the river Thames, and over the borough of Southwark.

The city and liberties of London are subject to three governments, viz. civil, ecclesiastical, and military. The first divides it into wards and precincts, under a Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council; the second into parishes, under a bishop, archdeacon, and ministers or pastors; and the last is the militia, under the power of a lord-lieutenant, which is lodged in the mayor and aldermen, and some of the principal citizens. The government of the city may be said to bear some affinity to the legislative power of the nation; the former being directed by the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, in the same manner as the latter is by the king, lords and commons.

The Mayor, or Lord-mayor, who is the supreme magistrate of this metropolis, was, before the Norman conquest, called the Portreve, or Portgreve, which title in the reign of Henry II. was changed for that of Mayor, a name by which the chief magistrate of the city of Roan, the capital of Normandy, was then distinguished. In 1215 the citizens obtained from king John a charter which granted them the privilege of choosing this magistrate, which was afterwards confirmed by several other royal grants; and the mayors were elected by the court of aldermen, and a number of commons summoned by them out of each of the wards; but the number thus summoned being occasionally varied at the discretion of the aldermen, gave great uneasiness to the commonalty; for the removing of which the method of election was altered by an act of common-council in the year 1476, whereby the present manner of electing by the liverymen of the several companies was established: by virtue whereof the Lord-mayor is annually chosen on Michaelmas day. On which day the liverymen assemble in Guildhall, where, by holding up of hands, they usually choose two of the senior aldermen below the chair, who being returned to the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, the senior is generally declared Lord-mayor elect.

Soon after the new Lord-mayor, accompanied by the recorder and several of the aldermen, is presented to the lord-chancellor (as his majesty's representative) for his approbation; which being obtained he is sworn into the office of mayor, at Guildhall the eighth of November, and the next day before the barons of the exchequer at Westminster.

On the morning of the ninth of November, being the day on which the Lord-mayor elect enters upon his office, the aldermen and sheriffs repair to the Lord-mayor's residence, from whence they attend him to Guildhall in a procession formed by coaches, which about noon proceed to the Three-crane stairs, where the Lord-mayor, aldermen, recorder and sheriffs, go on board the city barge, attended by several corporations of the citizens, in their formalities, and magnificent barges, elegantly adorned with a great number and variety of flags and pendants; and thence proceed to Westminster, forming a most grand and magnificent appearance.

When the ceremony is over at Westminster, the dazzling fleet returns in the same pompous manner to Black-friars stairs, from whence the livery of many of the city companies, preceded by colours and bands of music, march to their respective stands, which are erected on both sides the streets through which his lordship is to pass.

The Lord-mayor being at length landed at Black-friars, he is preceded by the artillery-company, which is followed by the company of which the Lord-mayor is free. After them follow several others with their music, flags, and streamers, and among the rest the armourers have a person riding on horseback, completely dressed in polished armour. At length march the Lord-mayor's domesticks and servants, followed by his lordship in the coach of state, and after him come the aldermen, recorder, sheriffs, chamberlain, common-serjeant town-clerk, &c. in their several coaches and chariots, and in this manner proceed to Guildhall, where an elegant entertainment is provided, as there is likewise for the several companies at their respective halls.

On all public occasions the Lord-mayor is clothed, according to the season, either in scarlet or purple robes richly furred, with a velvet hood and golden chain, or collar of S. S. with a rich jewel appendant. When he goes abroad in his state coach, the mace bearer sits upon a stool in the middle facing one of the windows, and the sword-bearer upon another stool opposite the other; and when on foot his train is supported by a page, and the mace and sword carried before him.

The principal officers belonging to the Lord-mayor for the support of his dignity are, the sword-bearer, the common hunt, common crier, and water bailiff, who have all great salaries or perquisites, with each the title of esquire. He has also three serjeant carvers, three serjeants of the chamber, a serjeant of the channel, two yeomen of the chamber, four yeomen of the water-side, a yeoman of the channel, an under water bailiff, six yeomen waiters, three meal weighers, two yeomen of the wood wharf; an officer called a foreign taker; and the city marshals.

The power of this great officer is at present much more considerable than it was formerly, for he is not only the king's representative in the civil government of the city, but also first commissioner of the lieutenancy, perpetual coroner and escheator within the city and liberties of London and the Borough of Southwark; chief justice of oyer, terminer and jail-delivery of Newgate; judge of the court of wardmote at the election of aldermen; conservator of the river Thames and Medway; perpetual commissioner in all affairs relating to the river Lea, and chief butler of the kingdom at all coronations.

The aldermen are properly the subordinate governors of their respective wards under the Lord-mayor's jurisdiction, and hold their offices during life or good behaviour. The person elected must be returned by the Lord-mayor (or other returning ing officer in his stead, duly qualified to hold a court of wardmote) to the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, by whom the person so returned must be admitted and sworn into the office of alderman before he can act. If he refuses to serve the office when chosen, he is subject to a fine of 100*l*. There are twenty-five in number, and each has his separate ward, to the government of which he is more immediately to attend. Those who have served the office of Lord-mayor, are said to be above the chair, and with three of the eldest that are next it, are justices of the peace by charter. All the aldermen keep their wardmote for choosing ward officers, and settling the business of the ward; for redressing grievances, and preventing all defaults found in the ward. In the management of these affairs every alderman has his deputy, chosen out of the common-council, and in some of these wards, which are very large the alderman has two deputies.

The common-council are chosen after the same manner as the aldermen, only with this difference, that as the Lord-mayor presides in the wardmote, and is judge of the poll at the election of an alderman, so the alderman of each ward is judge of the poll at the election of a common-council-man. Thus the Lord-mayor, aldermen and common-council, when assembled, may be deemed the city parliament, resembling the great council of the nation: for it consists of two houses; one for the Lord-mayor and aldermen, or the upper-house; another for the commoners or representatives of the people, commonly called the common-council-men. These have a power in their incorporate capacity to make and to repeal bye laws; and the citizens are bound to obey or submit to those laws. When they meet in their incorporate capacity, they wear deep blue silk gowns. No act can be performed in the name of the city of London without their concurrence: but they cannot assemble without a summons from the Lord-mayor, who, nevertheless, is obliged to call a common-council, whenever it shall be demanded, upon extraordinary occasions, by six reputable citizens and members of that court.

The two sheriffs of this city, which is a county of itself, are also sheriffs of the county of Middlesex, and are chosen at Guildhall on Midsummer-day by the liverymen, but not sworn till Michaelmas-eve, when they enter on their office; and two days after are presented in the Exchequer-court in Westminster-hall, to the lord-chancellor, by the Lord-mayor and aldermen. Each sheriff has an under-sheriff, six clerks, thirty-six serjeants; and every serjeant a yeoman, who belongs to either of the prisons, called Woodstreet-compter, or the Poultry-compter. If the person chosen sheriff refuses to serve, he pays a fine of four hundred pounds to the city, and thirteen pounds, six shillings and eight-pence to the ministers of the city prisons, unless he swears himself not worth fifteen thousand pounds; and if he serves he is obliged to give bond to the corporation. Their office in general is to collect the public revenues within their several jurisdictions; to gather into the exchequer all fines belonging to the crown; to serve the king's writs of process; to attend the judges and execute their orders; to impanel juries; to compel head-strong and obstinate men by the posse comitatus to submit to the decisions of the law, and to take care that all condemned criminals be duly punished and executed. In particular, they are to execute the orders of the court of common-council, when they have resolved to petition parliament, or to address his majesty. They have a power to make arrests, and serve execution on the river Thames.

After the sheriffs are elected, the livery choose the chamberlain of the city, and other officers, called the bridge-masters, auditors of the city and bridge-house accounts, and the aleconners.

The recorder is chosen by the Lord-mayor and aldermen only, and continues in his office during life. He takes place in all courts, and in the common-council before any one that hath not been mayor: of whom we have the following description in one of the books of the chamber. "He shall be, and is wont to be, one of the most skilful and virtuous apprentices of the law of the whole kingdom; whose office is always to sit on the right hand of the mayor, in recording pleas, and passing judgments; and by whom records and processes, had before the Lord-mayor and aldermen at Great St. Martin's, ought to be recorded by word of mouth before the judges assigned there to correct errors. The mayor and aldermen have therefore used commonly to set forth all other businesses, touching the city, before the king and his council, as also in certain of the king's courts, by Mr. Recorder, as a chief man, endued with wisdom and eminent for eloquence." He speaks in the name of the city upon extraordinary occasions; reads and presents their addresses to the king; and when seated upon the bench delivers the sentence of the court. He is the first officer in order of precedence that is paid a salary, which originally was no more than ten pounds sterling per annum, with some few perquisites; but it has from time to time been augmented to 600*l*. per annum and become the high road to preferment in the law.

The chamberlain of London is an officer of great trust, and is annually chosen by the livery on Midsummer-day, though he enjoys his place for life, if he is not found guilty of some great crime. He has the keeping of the monies, lands and goods, of the city orphans, or takes good security for the payment thereof when the parties come to age. To which end he is deemed in the law a sole corporation, to him and his successors, for orphans; and therefore a bond, or a recognizance made to him and his successors, is recoverable by his successors. His office may be termed a public treasury, collecting the customs, monies, and yearly revenues, and all other payments belonging to the corporation of the city. He hath a court particularly belonging to him, of which we shall speak of hereafter.

The common-council, constables, and other officers, are chosen by the housekeepers of the ward, on St. Thomas's-day at a wardmote then held by the aldermen.

The coroner of London is an officer of great antiquity, even so far back as the time of king Alfred. His business is, to enquire into the causes of all sudden deaths, where there is the least least suspicion of murder; and for that purpose he impannels a jury, to whom he gives a charge, and takes evidence upon oath. The Lord-mayor for the time being is coroner of the city; but he appoints a deputy for the discharge of that office. The coroner's jury have a right to examine the body of the deceased, and to call in the assistance of physicians and surgeons. They are to try the supposed murderer; and if they acquit him of all guilt, and concern in the death of the deceased, he is set at liberty; but if they find him guilty, their sentence is not final: the supposed murderer being sent to prison to take his trial at the Old Bailey. The coroner is likewise to enquire into the escape of a murderer, and also concerning found treasure, deadlands, and wrecks at sea. There are several other coroners, who hold courts out of the liberties of the city, as for Westminster, the Tower Hamlets, &c.

Besides these the Lord-mayor has the following officers, viz. The common serjeant; the town clerk; the city remembrancer; the sword bearer; the common hunt; the common crier; and the water bailiff; all of which, except the town clerk, who is chosen by the livery, purchase their places.

The common serjeant is to attend the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen on court days, and to be in council with them, on all occasions, within or without the precincts or liberties of the city. He is to take care of orphan's estates, either by taking account of them, or to sign their indentures, before their passing the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen. He is likewise to let, set and manage the orphans estates, according to his judgment, to their best advantage.

The town-clerk, or common clerk is an officer who keeps the original charters of the city, the books, rolls and other records, wherein are registered the acts and proceedings of the city; so that he may not be improperly filed the city register. He attends the Lord-mayor and aldermen at their courts, in order to take down any extraordinary proceeding that may occur. The town clerk and common serjeant take place according to seniority.

The city remembrancer is to attend the Lord-mayor on certain days, to put his lordship in mind of the select days when he is to go abroad with the aldermen, &c. He is to attend daily at the parliament house, during the sessions, and to report to the Lord-mayor their transactions.

The sword-bearer is to attend the Lord-mayor at his going abroad, and to carry the sword before him, being the emblem of justice. It is an ancient and honourable office, representing the state and princely office of the king's most excellent majesty, in his representative the Lord-mayor, and according to the rule of armory, "he must carry the sword upright, the hilts being holden under his bulk, and the blade directly up the midst of his breast, and so forth between the sword-bearer's brows."

The common hunt is an officer whose business it is to take care of the pack of hounds belonging to the Lord-mayor and citizens, to attend them in hunting in those grounds to which they are authorized by charter.

The common erier is to summon all executors and administrators of freemen to appear, and to bring in inventories of the personal estates of freemen, within two months after the decease; and and he is to have notice of their appraisements. He is likewise to attend the Lord-mayor on set days, and at the courts held weekly by the mayor and aldermen.

The water bailiff is to look after the preservation of the river Thames against all encroachments, and to prevent the fishermen from destroying the young fry by unlawful nets. For that end there are juries for each county, that hath any part of it lying on the sides or shores of the said river: which juries, summoned by the water bailiff at certain times, do make enquiry of all offences relating to the river and the fish, and make their presentments accordingly. He is also bound to attend the Lord-mayor on set days in the week.

The following officers are likewise belonging to the city: farmer of the markets; auditor; clerk of the chamber; clerk to the commissioners of the sewers; clerk of the court of conscience; beadle of the same court; clerk of the city works; printer to the city; justice of the Bridge-yard; clerk comptroller of the Bridge-house; steward of the Borough; bailiff of the Borough.

The city of London is at present divided into twenty-six wards, viz. Aldersgate, Aldgate, Bassishaw, Billingsgate, Bishopsgate, Bread-street, Bridge, Broad-street, Candlewick, Castle Baynard, Cheap, Coleman-street, Cordwainer, Cornhill, Cripplegate, Dowgate, Farringdon-within, Farringdon-without, Langbourn, Lime-street, Portsoken, Queenhithe, Tower, Vintry, Wallbrook, and the ward of Bridge-without.

The city has also two subordinate kinds of government: one executed by the aldermen, deputy, and common-councilmen, and their inferior officers, in each ward; under which form are comprehended all the inhabitants, free or not free of the city. Every ward is therefore like a little free state, and at the same time subject to the Lord-mayor, as chief magistrate of the city. The officers and servants of each ward manage the affairs belonging to it, without the assistance of the rest, and each has a court called the wardmote, (of which we shall speak hereafter) for the management of its own affairs. The other by the master, wardens, and court of assistants, of the incorporate companies; whose power reaches no further than over the members of their respective guilds or fraternities; except that in them is invested the power to chuse representatives in parliament for the city, and all those magistrates and officers elected by a common-hall: which companies are invested with distinct powers, according to the tenor of their respective charters.

CHAPTER II.

Containing an account of the several courts of justice within the city and liberties of London.

The Lord-mayor's Court.

THIS is a court of record, held before the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and recorder, every Tuesday in Guildhall, wherein actions of debt, trespass, attachments, covenants, &c. arising within the city and liberties of any value may be tried, and actions from the sheriffs court removed hither, before the jury be sworn. It is also a court of chancery or equity, respecting affairs transacted in the city and liberties; and gives relief when judgment is obtained in the sheriffs court, for more than the just debt. This court has an office peculiar to itself, consisting of four attornies, by whom all actions cognizable therein are entered, for the execution whereof there are six serjeants of mace, who daily attend in the said office. In many respects this court is the best to commence a process in, seeing an action (exclusive of stamps) may be entered at the small charge of four-pence, and which, tho' not proceeded upon, never dies, as those in other courts: besides, a suit may be begun and ended here, within the space of fourteen days, for so small a charge as thirty shillings. In short, this is the most extensive court of the kingdom; for all that is cognizable in the several courts of England, is the same in this. The juries for trying causes in this, and the sheriffs courts, are by the several courts of wardmote annually returned at Christmas, when each ward, according to custom, appoint a sufficient number of persons to serve on the said juries for every month in the year as follows:

Months	Wards.
January,	Aldgate, Portsoken and Cornhill.
February,	Cheap-ward.
March,	Bassishaw and Cripplegate.
April,	Vintry and Bread-street.
May,	Tower and Billingsgate.
June,	Farringdon Without.
July,	Bridge-ward.
August,	Aldersgate, Coleman-st. and Broad-street.
September,	Farringdon Within, and Castle Baynard.
October,	Queenhithe, Dowgate, and Wallbrooke.
November,	Langbourn, and Lime-street.
December,	Candlewick, Cordwainer, and Bishopsgate.

The Court of Lord-mayor and Aldermen.

This is a court of record, wherein is lodged a great part of the executive power, whereby all leases and other instruments that pass the city seal, are executed; the assize of bread ascertained; contests relating to water-courses, lights and party-walls adjusted; and the city officers suspended and punished according to the notoriety of their several offences.

The said court has not only a power of electing annually eleven overseers, or rulers of the fraternity of watermen; but likewise a right of fixing their several taxes, with the approbation of the privy council; and also a right of disposing of most of the places belonging to the city officers.

The Sheriffs Courts.

These are courts of record, held in Guildhall every Wednesday and Friday, for actions entered at Wood-street-Compter, and on Thursdays and Saturdays for those entered at the Poultry-Compter, of which the sheriffs being judges, each has his assistant or deputy, who are commonly called judges of these courts, before whom are tried actions of debt, trespass, covenant, &c. and where the testimony of an absent witness in writing is allowed to be good evidence. To each of these courts belong four attornies, who upon their being admitted by the court of aldermen, have the following oath administered to them:

"Ye shall swear, that ye shall well and lawfully examine your clients, and their quarrels, without champarty and without procuring of any juries, or any inquest embracing. And that ye shall change no quarrel out of ill-nature, after your understanding. Also ye shall plead, nor suffer to be pleaded by your assent, no foreign release, acquittance, payment, arbitration, plain account, whatsoever it be, to put the court out of its jurisdiction; nor none other matter; but it shall be such as ye may find rightful and true by the information of your client, whose information and saying, upon your oath and conscience, ye shall think to be true.

And ye shall not inform, nor inforce, any man to sue falsely against any person, by false or forged action. Ready ye shall be at all times to come and attend at the warning of the said mayor, and of the sheriffs of the said city, unless ye be letted about the business of the said city, or for some reasonable cause. The franchises, laws, and ordinances of this city, you shall keep, and due to be kept to your power: and that well and lawfully ye shall do all things that to the office of attorney pertaineth to do, as God help you."

To each of these courts likewise belong a secondary, a clerk of the papers, a prothonotary, and four clerks sitters. The secondary's office is to allow and return all writs brought to remove causes out of the said courts; the clerk of the papers files and copies all declarations upon actions; the prothonotary draws and engrosses all declarations; the clerks, sitters, enter actions and attachments, and take bail and verdicts. To each of the compters, or prisons belonging to these courts, appertain sixteen serjeants at mace, with a yeoman to each, besides inferior officers, and the prison keeper.

In the sheriffs court may be tried actions of debt, case, trespass, covenant, and all personal actions, attachments and sequestrations. And the usual practice of this court is to enter your action at one of the compters; and any one of the serjeants may arrest the defendant and bring him into custody, which arrest may be made without warrant or precept; and the serjeant need not declare his name, because he is sworn and known; but he ought to shew at whose suit the arrest is made, for what, and of what return the process is of, that the defendant may know how to make his defence. After a verdict obtained in the sheriffs court, before the judgment is entered, the defendant may stop judgment by marking the cause before the Lord-mayor, for time to pay the money recovered. This is to be done by an attorney of the mayor's court; and if, upon hearing of a marked cause, it appears that the plaintiff had a verdict for more than his own just debt, his lordship may remit the cause to judgment for the just debt only, and allow such time to pay the same as he shall think reasonable, on security given. When an erroneous judgment is given in either of the sheriffs courts of the city, the writ of error to reverse this judgment, must be brought in the court of hustings, before the Lord-mayor, for that is the superior court.

The Court of Hustings.

This is a court of record, and the supreme judicature of the city of London, and held weekly on Tuesdays: it was originally established for the preservation of the laws, franchises, and customs of the city, and there presided as judges, the principal magistrates; as at present do the Lord-mayor and sheriffs, who are assisted by the recorder upon all causes of consequence. In this court, two sorts of causes are pleadable, viz. pleas of land, and common pleas, distinctly; for one week, pleas merely real are held, and the next, mixed actions are decided. Here deeds are inrolled, recoveries passed, writs of right, waste, partition, dower and replevin determined.

The Court of Wardmote.

This court is denominated from the words ward and mote; that is, the ward court: for, in this city, parishes are as towns, and wards as hundreds, wherefore this court resembles that of the leet in the county; for, as the latter derives its authority from the county court, so does the former from that of the Lord-mayor; as is manifest by the annual precept issued by the Lord-mayor to the several aldermen, for holding their respective motes or leets, for the election of proper officers in each ward, the tenor whereof is as follows:

“ We charge and command you, that, upon St. Thomas's day the apostle, next coming, you do hold your wardmote; and that you have afore us, at our general court of aldermen, to be holden the Monday next after the feast of Epiphany next coming, all the defaults that shall be presented afore you by inquest in the said wardmote; and the said inquest shall have power and authority, by one whole year, to inquire into and present all such defaults as shall be found within your said ward, as oftentimes as shall be thought to you expedient and needful; which we will shall be once every month at least.

2. “ And if it happen any of your said inquest do die, or depart out of your said ward, within the said year, that then, in place of him or them so dying, or departing out of your said ward, you cause to be chosen one able person in his stead, to inquire and present with the other, in manner and form abovesaid.

3. “ And that, at the said general court, you give afore us the names and surnames of all them of your said ward that come not to your said wardmote, if they be duly warned; so that due redress and punishment of them may be had, as the case shall require, according to the law.

4. “ And that you provide that, at all times convenient, a sufficient watch be kept; and that lanterns, with light by nightertail, in old manner accustomed, be hanged forth; and that no man go by nightertail without light, nor with vizard, on the peril that belongeth thereto.

5. “ And also that you do cause to be chosen men of the most sufficient, honest, and discreet men of your said ward, to be, for your said ward; of the common-council of this city for the year ensuing, according to the custom in that behalf yearly used. And also that you do cause the said men, so to be chosen to be of the common-council, to be sworn before you, and in your presence, according to the oath by them used and of old time accustomed.

6. “ And that also, in the said wardmote, you cause to be chosen certain other honest persons to be constables and scavengers, and a common beadle, and a raker, to make clean the streets and lanes of all your said ward, according to the custom yearly used in that behalf; which constables have, and shall have, full power and authority to distrain for the salary and quarterage of the said beadle and raker, as oftentimes as it shall be behind, or unpaid.

7. “ Also that you keep a roll of the names, surnames, dwelling-places, professions and trades, of all persons dwelling within your ward, and within what constables precinct they dwell; wherein the place is to be specially noted by street, lane, alley, or sign.

8. “ Also that you cause every constable, from time to time, to certify unto you the name, surname, dwelling-place, profession and trade, of every person who shall newly come to dwell within his precinct, whereby you may make and keep your your roll perfect; and that you cause every constable for his precinct, to that purpose, to make and keep a perfect roll in like manner.

9. "Also that you give special charge to every inholder, and other persons within your ward, who shall receive any person to sojourn in his house above two days, shall, before the third day after his coming thither, give knowledge to the constable of the precinct, where he shall be so received, of the name, surname, dwelling-place, profession and trade of life, or place of service, of such person, and for what cause he shall come to reside there; and that the said constable give present notice thereof to you; and that the said inholder lodge no suspected person, or men or women of evil name.

10. "Also that you cause every constable within his precinct, once every month at the farthest, and oftener if need require, to make diligent search and inquiry what persons be newly come into his precinct to dwell, sojourn or lodge; and that you give special charge, that no inholder or person shall resist or deny any constables in making such search or inquiry; but shall do his best endeavour to aid and assist him therein.

11. "And for that, of late, there is more resort to the city of persons evil affected in religion and otherwise than in former times hath been; you shall diligently inquire if any man be received to dwell or abide within your ward that is not put under frank-pledge, as he ought to be by the custom of the city; and whether any person hath continued in the said ward by the space of one year, being above the age of twelve years, and not sworn to be faithful and loyal to the king's majesty, in such sort as by the law and custom of this city ought to be.

12. "To all these purposes the beadle of every ward shall employ his diligence, and give his best furtherance.

13. "Also you are to take order that there be provided and set up a pair of stocks, and a whipping-post, in some convenient place in every parish within your ward, for the punishment of vagrants and other offenders.

14. "Also that you have special regard that, from time to time, there be convenient provision for hooks, ladders, buckets, spouts, and engines, in meet places, within the several parishes of your ward, for avoiding the peril of fire.

15. "Also that the streets and lanes of this city be, from time to time, kept clean before every church, house, shop, warehouse, door, dead-wall, and in all other common-passages and streets of the said ward.

16. "And whereas, by divers acts of common-council, aforetime made and established for the common-weal of this city, among other things, it is ordained and enacted as hereafter ensueth:

"That, from henceforth, no huckster of ale or beer be within any ward of the city of London, but honest persons of good name and fame, and so taken and admitted by the aldermen of the ward for the time being; and that the same hucksters do find sufficient surety, afore the mayor and aldermen for the time being, to be of good guiding and rule; and that the same hucksters shall keep no bawdry, nor suffer no lechery, dice playing, carding, or any other unlawful games, to be done, exercised, or used within their houses; and to shut in their doors at nine of the clock in the night from Michaelmas to Easter, and from Easter to Michaelmas at ten of the clock in the night; and, after that hour, sell no ale or beer. And if any huckster of beer or ale after this act is published and proclaimed, sell any ale or beer within any ward of the city of London, and be not admitted by the alderman of the same ward so to do, or find not sufficient surety, as is above rehearsed, the same huckster to have imprisonment, and make fine and ransom for his contempt, after the discretion of the Lord-mayor and aldermen. And also that the said hucksters suffer no manner of common eating or drinking within their cellars or vaults, contrary to the ordinance thereof ordained and provided, as in the said act more plainly appeareth at large. We charge you that you put the same in due execution accordingly.

17. "And also that you see all tipplers, and other sellers of ale or beer, as well privy osteries as brewers and inholders within your ward, not selling by lawful measures, sealed and marked with the city arms, or dagger, be presented, and their names in your said indentures be expressed, with their defaults; so that the chamberlain may be lawfully answered of their amerciaments.

18. "And also that you suffer no alien, or son of any born an alien, to be of the common-council; nor to exercise or use any other office within this city; nor receive nor accept any person your watch, privy or open, but Englishmen born; and if a stranger born out of this realm, made denizen by letters patents, or any other, after his course or lot, be appointed to any watch, that then ye command and compel him, or them, to find in his stead and place an Englishman to supply the same.

19. "And also that you cause an abstract of the affize, appointed by act of parliament for billets and other fire wood, to be fair written in parchment, and to be fixed or hanged up in a table, in some fit and convenient place in the parish within your ward, where the common people may best see the same.

20. "And furthermore we charge and command you, that you cause such provision to be had in your said ward, that all the streets and lanes within the said ward be, from time to time, cleansed, and clearly voided of ordure, dung, mire, rubbish, and other filthy things, whatsoever shall be the annoyance of the king's majesty's subjects.

21. "And also that at all times, as you shall think necessary, you do cause search to be made within your said ward for all vagrant beggars, suspicious and idle people, and such as cannot shew how to live; and such as shall be found within your said ward, that you cause to be punished and dealt with according to the laws and statutes in such case ordained and provided.

22. "And also we will and charge you, the said alderman, that yourself certify and present before us, at the said general court, to be holden the aforesaid Monday next after the feast of the Ephiphany, all the names and surnames, truly written, written, of such persons being and dwelling within your said ward, as to be able to pass in any petty jury by themselves; that is to say, every grand juryman to be worth in goods an hundred marks, and every petty juryman forty marks, according to an act in that case ordained and provided; and the same you shall indorse on the back-side of your indenture.

23. "Item, For divers reasonable and urgent considerations us especially moving, we straightly charge and command you, on the king our sovereign lord's behalf, that ye diligently provide and foresee, that no manner of person or persons, within your said ward, what condition or degree soever he or they be of, keeping tavern or ale-house, ale-cellar, or any other victualling house, or place of common resort to eat or drink in, within the same ward, permit or suffer, at any time hereafter, any common women of their bodies, or harlots, to resort and come into their said house, or other the places aforesaid, to eat or drink, or otherwise to be conversant, or abide, or thither to haunt or frequent, upon pain of imprisonment as well of the tenant and keeper of every such house or houses, and all other the places aforesaid, as of the common women and harlots.

25. "And whereas the monies received for the fines of persons refusing to hold ward-offices within your ward ought to be employed in the service and for the public benefit of the whole ward, and not of any particular precinct or parish within the ward; these are therefore to require you to take care that all such fines be, from time to time, disposed of accordingly, for the benefit of the whole ward, as you, with the deputy and common-council-men of your ward, shall think most fitting and convenient; and that no such fines be received or employed in any particular precinct or parish.

"Not failing hereof, as you tender the common-weal of this city and advancement of good justice, and as ye will answer to the contrary at your utmost peril.

Dated at _____ under the seal-office of mayoralty of the said city, in the _____ year of the reign of our sovereign lord George the Third, &c.

It appears by this precept, that the court of wardmote consists of the alderman and the respective householders of his ward, by whom are annually elected the several officers peculiar to the same; among whom being those of the inquest, they receive the aforesaid instructions for their better regulation.

The Court of Requests; also called the Court of Conscience.

This court was first instituted in the reign of Henry VIII. by an act of common-council, for the recovery of small debts, under the value of forty shillings and has since been confirmed by several acts of parliament (see page 184. 211.) It is of great use to such poor debtors as are not able to pay their debts immediately; and also of great benefit to such poor persons as have small debts owing to them, and are unable to enter into a more expensive suit.

The Lord-mayor and court of aldermen appoint monthly such commoners to sit as commissioners in this court as they think fit, and these, or any three of them, compose a court, kept in Guildhall every Wednesday and Saturday, from eleven till two o'clock, to hear and determine such causes as are brought before them. They have the power of administering an oath to the creditor, of examining witnesses, and of making such orders between the plaintiff and defendant, the creditor and debtor, as they think most agreeable to equity and conscience; and if the debtor be unable to pay the whole sum at once, they appoint it to be paid monthly in such proportions as they judge to be in his power; but if he neglects paying monthly into court the small sums appointed, he may be served with an execution, and carried to prison; or if the person cannot be found, his goods may be seized.

In this court a cause may be brought and determined for the value of ten pence, viz. sixpence for the plaint and summons, and four-pence for the order; but if the defendant does not appear the second court day after the summons, an attachment may be awarded against him.

If any citizen shall be arrested for a debt under forty shillings, this court will grant a summons for the plaintiff in the action, and if he does not appear on the first court day after the summons is left at his house, the court will grant an attachment against him, force him to take his debt, and pay the defendant his costs; and if any attorney in London shall presume to proceed in any such suit, after notice to the contrary, or shall refuse to obey the order of this court, upon complaint thereof to the court of aldermen, they will suspend such person from his practice.

The fees taken by the clerks of the Court of Conscience are as follows:

	s.	d.
For every plaint	0	2
For every appearance	0	2
For every order	0	4
For every remittance to the common law	0	4
For every precept or warrant to commit to prison	0	6
For every search	0	2
For every satisfaction acknowledged on an order	0	6
For warning any person within the liberties	0	6
For serving any precept or warrant	0	6

Besides the Court of Conscience held at Guildhall for the city, there is one in Bedford-court, near Covent-garden; another in Fulwood's-rents, High-holbourn; another at St. Margarets-hill Southwark; and another in Whitechapel.

The Court of Conservacy.

This court is yearly held eight times before the Lord-mayor, at such places and times as his lordship shall think fit to appoint, within the respective counties of Middlesex, Essex, Kent, and Surry; in which several counties he has a power of summoning juries, who for the better preservation of the fishery of the river Thames, and regulation of the fishermen that fish therein, are upon oath to make inquisition of all offences committed in and upon the said river, from Staines-bridge in the west to Yensleta in the east; and to present all persons that are found guilty of a breach of the following ordinances:

That no person shall shoot any draw-net, &c. at any time of the year before sun-rising or after sun setting; that no fisherman shall still-lie, or bend over any net during the time of the flood, whereby salmons, &c. may be hindered, and kept back from swimming upwards; that no fisherman, or others, shall use any spear called an eel-spear, nor exercise any flue-trammel, double-walled net, or hooped net, to destroy the fry of fish; that no fisherman use any mill-posts, or other engines, with the heads against the stream; that no fisherman shall rug for flounders between London-bridge and Westminster, &c. but only two casts at low water, and two casts at high water; and that no flounder be taken under the size of six inches; that no fisherman, or other, fish with or use any angle with more than two hooks upon a line, within the limits of London-bridge; that no Peter-men fish further westward than Richmond, to which place the water ebbs and flows; that no fisherman keep two boys in one boat, unless one be at man's estate; nor take up any wreck or drift upon the water, without notice to the water-bailiff, &c. and all fisherman shall be registered, &c. under divers penalties and forfeitures.

These orders are for regulating the fish westward, between London-bridge and Staines-bridge; and there are several orders for the government of the fishery eastward, between London-bridge and Yendale, touching unlawful taking of smelts, whittings, shads, fish out of season, royal fish; such as whales, sturgeons, porpusses, &c. and preserving the same, at the court of conservacy of the river Thames.

By an order of the tenth of July, 1673, no person shall draw the shores in the river of Thames, save only for salmon, by persons empowered, &c. and none shall fish with a net under six inches in the mesh, on pain of 20l. and the water-bailiff hath power to authorize two honest fishermen in any town, &c. to be assistant to him in searching for and seizing unlawful nets, &c. no fisherman, or other person, shall cast any soil, gravel, or rubbish, in the Thames, whereby banks or shelves are raised, and the common passage hindered, nor drive any piles or stakes in the said river, upon which the like danger may arise on the penalty of ten pounds.

And by statute 27. Hen. 8. if any person shall procure any thing to be done to the annoyance of the Thames, in making of shelves, mining, digging, &c. or take away any boards or stakes, undermine banks, walls, &c. he shall forfeit five-pounds. see page 191.

And, for the more effectual preservation of the navigation and fish in the river Thames, the Lord-mayor, as conservator thereof has his assistant, or deputy, the water-bailiff; who, together with his substitutes, detect and bring to justice all such persons as shall presume to destroy either the current, or the fish of the said river.

Pie-Powder Court.

This is a court of record denominated pipoudres (vulgarly Pie-powder) and is incident to every fair, as a court-baron is to a manor. It is derived from pedas pulverisati, and is so called from its expeditious proceedings in the decision of all controversies that happen in fairs; because for the encouragement of traders who frequent the same, justice is as quickly administered as dust can fall from the feet.

This is held in Cloth-fair (during the time of Bartholomew-fair by the city of London, and Mr. —, for hearing and deciding all differences committed against the tenor of the following proclamation, which is annually made before the Lord-mayor, on the eve of St. Bartholomew, for the better regulation of the said fair.

“ The right honourable——, Lord-mayor of the city of London, and his right worshipful brethren the aldermen of the said city, straightly charge and command, on the behalf of our sovereign lord the king, that all manner of persons, of whatsoever estate, degree or condition they be, having recourse to this fair, keep the peace of our sovereign lord the king.

“ That no person or persons make any congregation, conventicles, or affrays, by which the same peace may be broke or disturbed, upon pain of imprisonment, and fine to be made after the direction of the Lord-mayor and aldermen.

“ Also, that all manner of sellers of wine, ale, or beer, sell by measures unsealed, as by gallon, pottle, quart, and pint, upon pain that will fall thereof.

“ And that no person shall sell any bread except it keep the assize; and that it be good and wholesome for man's body, upon pain that will follow thereof.

“ And that no manner of cooke, pie-baker, nor huckster, sell or put to sale any manner of victual, except it be good and wholesome for man's body, upon pain that will fall thereof.

“ And that no manner of person buy, nor sell, but with true weights and measures, sealed according to the statute in that behalf made, upon pain that will fall thereof.

“ And that no person or persons take upon him or them, within this fair, to make any manner of arrest, attachment, summons, or execution; except it be done by the officers of this city thereunto assigned, upon pain that will befall thereof.

“ And that no person or persons whatsoever, within the limits or bounds of this fair, presume to break the Lord's day, in selling, shewing, or offering offering to sale, or in buying or offering to buy, any commodities whatsoever; or in sitting, tippling, or drinking, in any tavern, inn, ale-house, tippling-house, or cook's-house, or in doing any other thing that may tend to the breach thereof, upon the pains and penalties contained in several acts of parliament, which will be severely inflicted upon the breakers thereof.

"And finally, that what persons soever find themselves grieved, injured, or wronged by any manner of person in this fair, that they come with their complaints before the stewards in this fair, assigned to hear and determine pleas; and they will minister to all parties justice according to the laws of the land and customs of this city."

The Chamberlain's Court.

This is an office kept in Guildhall, in a room on the right hand side of the passage leading into the court of King's-bench, where the chamberlain attends every morning to decide the differences that arise between masters and apprentices, to enroll and turn over the latter, and to admit all who are duly qualified, to the freedom of the city; of whom there are annually admitted about fifteen hundred.

The Court of Hallmote.

This court is denominated from the place wherein it is kept, and belongs to the several companies of citizens, by whom it is occasionally held in their respective halls, and wherein, the affairs belonging to each of the said corporations are respectively transacted.

St. Martin's-le-Grand Court.

This court, though within the city, is yet without its jurisdiction, as being in, and belonging to the liberty of that name, which is subject to the dean and chapter of Westminster. It is a court of record, held weekly on Wednesdays, for the trial of all personal actions whatsoever, the principal whereof is a capias against the body, or an attachment against the goods; so that a man's goods may be seized upon in his own house, upon the first process, if his person is not secured before; which is according to the practice of all ancient liberties or franchises.

The Court of the Tower of London.

This is a court of record held by prescription within the verge of the city, on Great Tower-hill, by a steward appointed by the constable of the Tower of London, by whom are tried actions of debt (for any sum) damage and trespass.

Justice-hall Court.

This court is held eight times a year by the king's commission of oyer and terminer, for the trial of criminals for crimes committed within the city of London and county of Middlesex. The judges are, the Lord-mayor, the aldermen past the chair, and the recorder, who, on all such occasions, are attended by both the sheriffs, and by one or more of the national judges. The offences in the city are tried by a jury of citizens, and those committed in the county by a Middlesex jury. The crimes tried in this court are high and petty treason, murder felony, forgery, petty larceny, burglary, cheating, libelling, the using of false weights and measures, &c. the penalties incurred by which are the loss of life, corporal punishment, transportation, amerciaments, &c.

The Coroner's Court.

The Lord-mayor being perpetual coroner of the city, this court is held before him or his deputy; the business of which has been explained in describing the office of coroner.

The Court of Orphans.

This court is occasionally held at Guildhall, by the Lord-mayor and aldermen, who are guardians to the children of freemen under the age of twenty-one years at the decease of their fathers, and take upon them not only the management of their goods and chattels, but likewise that of their persons, by placing them under the care of tutors, to prevent disposing of themselves during their minority, without their approbation.

By this court the common serjeant is authorized to take exact accounts and inventories of all the deceased freemens estates, and the youngest attorney of the Lord-mayor's court being clerk to that of the orphans, is appointed to take securities for their several portions in the name of the chamberlain of London, who is a corporation of himself for the service of the said orphans; and to whom a recognizance or bond, made upon the account of an orphan, shall by the custom of London, descend to his successor.

It is likewise to be observed, that when a freeman of London dies and leaves children in their minority, the clerks of the several parishes are, according to a law of the city, to give in their names to the common crier, who is immediately to summon the widow, or executor, to appear before the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, to bring an inventory of, and security for the testator's estate; for which two months time is commonly allowed: and, in case of non-appearance, or refusal of security, the Lord-mayor may commit the contumacious executor to Newgate.

The Court of Escheator.

The Lord-mayor of London being perpetual escheator within the city, the court is held before him or his deputy, to whom all original writs of Diem clausit extremum, Mandamus Devenereunt, Melius inquirend', &c. are directed to find an office for the king, after the death of his tenant who held by knight's service. The escheator may also find an office for treason, felony, &c.

The Court of Common-Council.

This court consists of the Lord-mayor, aldermen and representatives of the several wards; and and being the city legislature, make bye-laws for the good government thereof. They assemble in Guildhall as often as the Lord-mayor by his summons thinks proper to convene them: they annually select from among themselves a committee of six aldermen and twelve commoners for letting the city lands, to which end they generally meet at Guildhall on Wednesdays. They likewise appoint another committee of four aldermen and eight commoners, for transacting the affairs belonging to the benefactions of Sir Thomas Gresham, who generally meet at Mercet's-hall at the appointment of the Lord-mayor, who is always one of the number. They also, by virtue of a royal grant, yearly appoint a governor, deputy and assistants, for managing the civil lands in Ireland. They have also a right of disposing of the offices of town-clerk, common-serjeant, judges of the sheriffs court, common crier, coroner, bailiff of the Borough of Southwark, and city garbler.

Having thus gone through the jurisdiction and government of this great metropolis, we shall now proceed to survey the respective wards into which the city of London is divided.

CHAPTER III.

Of the antiquity of wards. Description of Aldersgate Ward, with an account of its bounds, streets, churches, halls, and all other public buildings.

THE first intelligence we have of the number of wards in this city is in the year 1284, at which time there appeared to be twenty-four; and in the year 1393, the great ward of Farringdon being very much increased both in number of houses and inhabitants, it was, by parliament, divided into the inward and outward wards, by which the number was increased to twenty-five. And in the year 1550 the citizens having purchased of king Edward VI. the Borough of Southwark, with divers privileges thereunto belonging, they formed the same into another ward, which made twenty-six; but the power granted them by charter not proving sufficient to support their title thereto, by excluding the justices of peace for the county of Surry from interfering in the government thereof, it is only therefore a nominal ward, and is of no other use than adding a farther dignity to the senior alderman, who is called Father of the city.

These wards, being twenty-six in number, and which contain the whole city and liberty of London, we shall describe in alphabetical order, beginning with

ALDERSGATE WARD.

This ward took its origin from a city gate, which lately stood near St. Botolph's church: it is divided in two parts, viz. Aldersgate within, and Aldersgate without; each of which consist of four precincts, under one alderman, eight common-council-men (two of whom are the alderman's deputies) eight constables, fourteen inquest men, eight scavengers and a beadle; exclusive of the officers belonging to St. Martin's le Grand. The jury-men returned by the wardmote inquest serve in the several courts in Guildhall in the month of August.

The north extremity of this ward terminates in Pickax-street, and other parts without the freedom: on the east it is bounded by Cripplegate ward; on the west by Farringdon ward within and without; and on the south by Farringdon ward within. Its principal streets are Aldersgate-street, Pickax-street, Jewin-street, Noble-street, Long-lane, Little-Britain, Staining-lane, Maiden-lane, and Foster-lane.

Aldersgate-street, which is very spacious and long, runs northward to the end of Barbican on the east side, and Long-lane on the west.

About the middle of this street formerly stood London-House, so called from its being the palace of the bishops of that see. It was a large commodious brick building, with a neat chapel belonging to it; but being deserted by the prelates, was at last let out into several tenements and warehouses. This ancient edifice was lately consumed by fire, since which new buildings have been erected in its stead.

Nearly opposite to this stands Shaftesbury-house, now called

The London Lying-in Hospital.

This edifice is built with brick and ornamented with stone, in a most noble and elegant taste. The front to the street is adorned with Ionic pilasters. The door which is arched, and has a balcony supported by scrolls, opens into a small area encompassed with buildings, within which are accommodations for the patients. It was built by the masterly hand of Inigo Jones, and was formerly the residence of the earls of Shaftesbury; but being deserted by its polite inhabitants, it was also let out for several mechanical uses, and would have entirely run away to decay, had it not been for the pious founders and promoters of this noble charity; by which every necessary accommodation and assistance are furnished for married women in the last state of their pregnancy, time of labour, and month of lying-in.

This excellent charity was instituted on the thirtieth of March 1750, by several generous and humane persons; and has met with great encouragement from both sexes; but so many distressed objects daily present themselves, that its income, supported only by voluntary contributions, tions, is not equal to its wants; wherefore the governors find it still necessary to apply for the assistance of the public, to whom the following conditions are offered:

1. Such persons as subscribe thirty guineas are governors for life, and may recommend one pregnant woman to be upon the books at a time.

2. Those who subscribe five guineas per annum, are governors so long as they continue their subscriptions, and entitled to recommend as in the former article.

3. Annual governors may make up their subscriptions thirty guineas, within one year from the last payment, and thereupon become governors for life.

4. Ladies and gentlemen are at liberty, in all elections of officers, to vote by proxy, signified in writing.

N. B. All lesser benefactions are thankfully received. And for the satisfaction of the public, that the women are well and properly taken care of, ladies, though not governesses, are permitted to go into the wards.

Rules of the hospital.

A general court of the governors is held four times a year; namely, in the months of March, June, September and December, to receive the report of the quarterly committees, elect a new committee, and transact such other business as may then be laid before them.

House committee.

A house committee is appointed at every general quarterly court, consisting of twelve governors; three of whom are a quorum. This committee meets every Wednesday morning at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, at the said hospital to receive and discharge patients, inspect the diet and provisions, order any furniture and conveniences that may from time to time be wanted, and examine into and regulate the conduct of all the servants and patients of the house. These committees are to make their reports to the general quarterly courts.

Servants.

A matron, who is a midwife, constantly resides in the hospital, and acts as such in all natural and easy labours.

A sufficient number of nurses and servants to take care of the patients, and the common business of the house.

Also a beadle, who constantly resides at the hospital, to be ready to go on all messages on sudden emergencies, and summon the governors, &c.

Note, the servants of the house are forbid to take any fee or reward from the patients, on any pretence whatsoever, on pain of being discharged.

Qualification for admission.

Married women admitted into this hospital, must previously produce a certificate of their marriage from a lawful minister, or in case they cannot, then an affidavit of their being married, and the time when and place where, and also the settlement of the husbands, and by what means such settlement was gained. And no woman is to be taken into the house, who hath any contagious distemper.

The present state of the hospital, together with the number of patients which have been delivered, since its first institution, is as follows:

A little to the south of London-house formerly stood the fine mansion of the earls of Westmoreland; but this, like the two former, being deserted by its inhabitants, was afterwards let out in tenements and to mechanic uses; and at length became so decayed, that the whole of the remains have been entirely taken down, and new buildings are now erecting in their stead.

At the south-west corner of this street, where Little-Britain ends in the east, stands the parish church of

St. BOTOLPH, ALDERSGATE.

This church is so denominatd from its dedication to St. Botolph, a Saxon Monk, and its vicinity to one of the city gates. It escaped the fire of London in the year 1666, but afterwards grew so ruinous, that, except the roof, it was entirely rebuilt. The building is a plain brick edifice, with a Tower supported on a kind of arch-work, and crowned with an open turret and its fane. It was anciently a rectory, but is at present a curacy in the patronage of the dean and chapter of Westminster-abbey; and is subject to the bishop and archdeacon of London, to whom it pays procuration.

Nearly opposite to this church is

COOK'S HALL.

Which takes its name from the company of cooks, incorporated by Edward IV. in the year 1480, and is more to be admired for its convenience than elegance in building. This company have two masters, two wardens and twenty-five assistants, and are entitled to the livery of the city; but, in conformity to their charter, every member of the company must be presented to the Lord-mayor before he is admitted into the freedom.

On the north side of St. Anne's-lane, within Aldersgate is the parish church of ### St. A N N E.

This church owes its name to its dedication to St. Anne, the mother of the Virgin Mary. The old church was entirely burnt down in the fire of London, and the present was raised in its place about three years after. It is a very plain edifice: the body is enlightened by a few large windows, cased with rustic; the Tower, which is very plain, is also strengthened at the corners with rustic, and from its top rises a turret and spire. The advowson of this church was given by queen Mary to the bishop of London, in whose gift it continues: and the parish of St. John Zachary, whose church was burnt down in the year 1666, not being rebuilt, is now annexed unto it. These joined together have made the living worth 140l. per annum: and St. John Zachary's being in the gift of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, the bishop and the dean and chapter alternately present to this united living. It is a rectory, and subject to the archdeacon.

The site and church-yard of the abolished church of St. John Zachary, whose parish is united to St. Anne's, is situate at the corner of Maiden-lane, in Foster-lane; adjoining to which there formerly stood the stately house of Sir Richard Kennet, on whose ruins is raised a handsome modern building for the

UNION FIRE-OFFICE of assurance for goods and merchandize from loss by fire.

This office was erected by a considerable number of persons, who mutually agreeing to insure each others goods and merchandize from loss by fire by an amicable contribution, entered into a deed of settlement for that purpose, on the 16th of February 1714-15, and had it enrolled in chancery on the third of July following; and this deed being signed by all persons desirous of becoming members, they are thereby admitted to an equal share in the profit and loss, in proportion to their respective policies. They insure for all merchants, traders, house-keepers, and others in the cities of London and Westminster, and within ten miles round, merchandize, goods, wares, utensils in trade, household furniture, and wearing apparel; except plate, pictures, glass and china ware not in trade; ready money, jewels, books of account, tallies, writings, barns, ricks, and stacks of corn, hay, straw and horses. The term of insurance is seven years, or less if required.

The affairs of this office are under the management of twenty-four directors, elected by a majority of the members out of their own body, by ballot, at a general meeting in the month of September; at which time the eldest eight of the twenty-four go out, and eight others are elected in their stead in a way of constant rotation. These appoint all the other officers, and meet every Wednesday in the afternoon, between the hours of three and seven, to dispatch business; and in March to ascertain the dividends and contributions for the preceding year. The directors also chuse out of their own body, by ballot, a treasurer, and two assistant treasurers; also six trustees, three of whom sign all policies; and five auditors to pass and examine the accounts.

There are also porters, watermen, &c. provided by the office, who are commonly called firemen, because it is their duty to attend all fires, and to assist in putting out the same, and moving of goods; and these men are distinguished by the livery and badge of the society.

At the north-east angle of Foster-lane stands

GOLDSMITHS-HALL.

This spacious building supplies the place of one which was originally built by Drew Berentin, about the year 1407, but was destroyed by the fire of London in 1666. It is an irregular structure built with brick, and the corners wrought in rustic of stone. The door is large, arched, and decorated with doric columns, which support a pediment of the arched kind, but open for a shield, in which are the arms of the company. The hall room is spacious, and both that and the other rooms well enlightened. In the hall are several good pictures, particularly those of Sir Martin Bowers, and Sir Hugh Middleton, both of this company, and great benefactors to it.

The company of Goldsmiths appears to be of great antiquity; for in the reign of Henry II. in the year 1180, it was, among other guilds, fined for being adultering, that is, setting up without the king's special licence. But at length, in 1327, Edward III. in consideration of the sum of ten marks, incorporated this company by letters patent, and granted them the privilege of purchasing an estate of twenty pounds per annum in mortmain, for the support of their valetudinary members, which, in the year 1394, was confirmed by Richard II. for the sum of twenty marks. These grants were afterwards confirmed by Edward IV. in the year 1462, who also constituted this society a body politic and corporate, to have a perpetual succession, and a common seal. By the said grant they had likewise the privilege of inspecting, trying, and regulating all gold and silver wares, not only in this city, but in all other parts of the kingdom; with the power of punishing all offenders concerned in working adulterated gold and silver; and the power of making by-laws for their better government.

This fraternity is governed by a prime warden, three other wardens, and a numerous court of assistants.

At the east end of Staining-lane is the site and church.

5 X

church-yard of St. Mary Staining's parish-church, burnt down in 1666, which parish is since united with St. Michael's, in Wood-street.

Towards the north end of Noble-street stands a spacious hall originally built by the Scriveners, an ancient fraternity, denominated "The writers of the court letter of the city of London;" but not incorporated till the year 1616, when king James I. granted them his letters patent by the name and style of "The master, wardens, and assistants of the society of writers of the city of London." This company is governed by a master, two wardens, and twenty-four assistants; and enjoy the livery: but being reduced to low circumstances, they sold their hall to the company of Coach-makers, from whom it takes its present name of

COACH-MAKERS HALL.

This company was incorporated in the year 1677 by the name and style of "The master, wardens, assistants, and commonalty, of the company of coach and coach-harness makers of London." It is a livery company, and is governed by a master, three wardens, and twenty-three assistants. The company, however, cannot be in much better circumstances than their predecessors, the hall being at this time let out as an auction room, and for other very trifling purposes.

At the north east corner of Noble-street is situate the church-yard of St. Olave's, Silver-street; this church was burnt down in 1666, and the parish was afterwards united to St. Alban's-church in Wood street.

Barbican is a large street which comes out of the upper end of Aldersgate-street, and runs up to Redcross-street; on the north side of which is Bridgewater-square, the site where once stood a large house fronting Barbican, and the garden of the earl of Bridgewater. It is a small and neat quadrangle, covered with plain, but handsome and convenient houses, with a grass plat and gravel walks, shaded with trees and surrounded with iron rails.

Carthusian-street takes its name from the Charter-house, which, before the reformation, was a convent of Carthusian Monks.

In Little-Britain, anciently called Britain street, was once the city mansion of the duke of Bretagne, near to the church of St. Botolph; but this has for several ages past been razed, and the site alienated to private property.

At the south east corner of the same street, and near the spot where the fourth part of St. Bartholomew's hospital now stands, was formerly Peterborough-house, a palace belonging to the earls of that title. And almost the whole east side of Little-Britain was adorned with a superb palace, the ancient residence of the lord Mountague.

Near the north east corner of Little-Britain, in Aldersgate-street, formerly stood an hospital, hall, or priory belonging to the abbey of Cluny in France; which, among other alien foundations, being suppressed by king Henry V. his majesty granted its revenues to the parishioners of St. Botolph, on condition that they should found in their church a fraternity or altar dedicated to the Holy Trinity. The site of this ancient religious house remains still, by the name of Trinity-hall, and several tenements in Trinity-lane, in the possession of the parish; and part of the building now remains. The lower part is let out for a coffee-house, (called Aldersgate coffee-house) but the upper room retains something of the appearance of its original use, and is used as a place of worship for a congregation of Non-jurors. This room is likewise used by the parishioners who meet in vestry on particular occasions.

We come now to the liberty of St. Martin's-le-Grand, which comprehends no more than that part of the street which runs from Blowbladder-street, on the south, to Bell-court near St. Anne's-lane on the east side: the remaining part of St. Martin's-le-Grand-street being in the freedom of the city.

This liberty was an ecclesiastical foundation. It takes its name originally from a Collegiate church founded by Ingalricus and his brother Edward, in the year 1056, for a dean and secular canons or priests, and dedicated to St. Martin, with the addition of Le Grand, from the great or extraordinary privileges of sanctuary, &c. granted by divers monarchs thereto.

The charter granted by William the conqueror, concerning the ancient privileges of St. Martin's-le-Grand, concludes with this remarkable clause, "that whosoever shall presume to alter any thing hereby granted, let him perish with Judas the traitor."

This charter was confirmed by king Henry III. who granted the dean of the monastery and church more ample privileges. And it was again confirmed by Edward III. with an additional privilege, that no inhabitant within this jurisdiction should be sued out of their own court, except before the king or his chief justice.

King Henry III, Edward I, and king Henry VI. confirmed the foregoing charters; but this last mentioned king established certain articles concerning its sanctuary, in cases of debt, felony, and treason; by which articles of regulations it appears that St. Martin's was at that time a sanctuary for great disorders, and a shelter for the loosest sort of people, such as rogues, ruffians, thieves, felons, and murderers; and that every excess of vice and irreligion, fraud, oppression, and breach of the laws, were exercised within its liberty.

By the charter of king Edward III. it was ordained that all inquisitions to be taken by the justices, and other the ministers of the men of the city of London, should be taken at Great St. Martin's in London, and not elsewhere; except inquisitions to be taken in circuits in the Tower of London, and for the jail delivery of Newgate. But king Henry VIII. in the year 1519, revoked that charter, and removed the sessions of the peace from St. Martin's to Guildhall. See page 185.

To so great a height of licentiousness was this sanctuary grown, that in the reign of Henry VII. the sheriffs of London venturing to take from thence by violence a person who had taken shelter there, the abbot of Westminster (to whom the deanery, with its sanctuary and privileges had been granted) exhibited a bill to the king against them, upon which the cause was heard in the star-chamber, and the sheriff severely fined.

The church of St. Martin's-le-Grand was anciently in the donation of the king, as appears by an inquisition taken at the Tower in the reign of king Edward II. And in this church there was a curfew bell, at whose sound all persons were obliged to repair home, or, at least, not to wander in the streets.

In the year 1585 a great number of foreign tradesmen and artificers planted themselves on this spot; among whom were John James and Anthony Emerick, subjects of Philip, king of Spain, and who were said to have been the first silk-twisters, or silk-throwers, in London, and to have brought that trade into England.

Though this place is in a manner in the heart of the city, it is still in the liberty of Westminster; and the inhabitants are governed and vote accordingly. The courts and alleys are now chiefly inhabited by Taylors and others who are not free of the city; for all foreigners carry on their trades and professions there without molestation.

As St. Martin's-le-Grand is a liberty distinct from the government of London, and subject to the deanery of Westminster, it has a court of record kept every Wednesday, for the trial of all personal actions of what nature soever. In this court the leading process is a capias against the body, or an attachment against the goods; so that a man's goods may be seized in his own house, upon the first process, if he himself be not taken.

CHAPTER IV.

OF ALDGATE WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from the east gate of the city, called Aldgate, or anciently Eaklgate. It is bounded on the east by Portoken ward; on the south by Tower-street ward; and on the west and north, by the wards of Langbourn, Lime-street and Bishopsgate. It extends from the place where Aldgate stood, to Lime-street corner in Leadenhall-street, and takes in all the streets and lanes on the one hand to Bevis Marks and Shoemaker-row; and on the other to Ironmongers-hall in Fenchurch-street.

The principal streets which this ward contains are, High-street, Leadenhall-street, as far as Lime-street: Fenchurch-street, as far as Fishmonger's-alley inclusive: Poor Jewry-lane and Crutched-friars, as far as Seething-lane: Shoemaker-row and Bevis Marks, to Camomile-street: St. Mary Axe and Lime-street, as far as Cullum-street. The ward is governed by an alderman, six common-council-men, six constables, twenty inquest men, seven scavengers, and a beadle.

Aldgate High-street, which is the principal, begins where Aldgate formerly stood, and reaches westward as far as the stone pump between Leadenhall-street and Fenchurch-street; from whence, close to the North-east corner, branches out Shoemaker-row, and thence, more to the north, runs Bevis marks; near the south-east corner, between Heneage-lane and Bury-street, stands the Portuguese Jews synagogue, an handsome, large and commodious brick building, which is supported and frequented only by the sect of the Pharisees; and in Little Bury-street is an independent meeting. The names of Bevis, Bury, and Heneage, are derived from a mansion-house, which anciently stood upon, and, with courts and gardens, took up the whole site of Heneage and Bury-street, and belonged to the abbots of Bury in Suffolk: from whence the street in which it stood was called Buries-marks. And after the dissolution of the abbey of Bury, this mansion being granted to Sir Thomas Heneage, it was pulled down, and two streets were built upon the site thereof, called Bury-street and Heneage-street.

Close to the spot where Aldgate stood, on the south side of High-street, runs poor Jerwy-lane, on the east side whereof the old houses have been lately pulled down, and handsome ones built in their stead; in which also is a presbyterian meeting-house. And at the north west corner of Crutched-friars* is a large pile of warehouses built by the East India company, which open a way quite from Crutched-friars to Fenchurch-street; opposite to which is a fine spacious street with new buildings, that leads into the Minories. Adjoining to this new street is Gold-square and Woodroof-lane, which leads to Tower-hill.

On the west side of Shoemaker-row is the synagogue of the Dutch Jews, as they are commonly called, with whom the Jews from all the northern parts communicate, who are a distinct sect from the Portuguese, Spanish, Italian, &c. This synagogue has been lately enlarged by an addition of building in brick, which has ap-

* This street took its name from a monastery of the Holy Cross, at the south-east corner of Hart-street, near Tower-hill. This monastery was founded about the year 1298, and continued till the suppression of the other religious houses. In the reign of Henry VIII. a prior of this house being found in bed with a whore in the day-time, by the visitors appointed by the lord Cromwell, he distributed thirty pounds among them, and promised them as much more; an account of which being sent by the visitors to Cromwell, these scandalous crimes hastened the dissolution of monasteries. The ruins of this religious house have been entirely razed for a considerable time past, and nothing of it remains but the name, which is given to the street, that is more commonly called Crutched-friars than Hart street. In the place where the monastery stood is now erected the Navy-office, and many other handsome buildings.

proached so near to the church of St. James's, Duke's-place, that the congregation may be heard from each other.

The ward of Aldgate terminates at about two thirds on the east side of Woodroff-lane: and on the west it takes in both that and River-street, Colchester-street, and Draper's-Alley; in the latter of which are fourteen houses called

MILBOURN'S ALMSHOUSES.

These were founded and left in trust to the Draper's company, by Sir John Milbourn, Lord-mayor of London, for thirteen poor householders, either married or unmarried, free of the Draper's company, old men and their wives, with an appointment of seven-pence per week each: and in case there should not be found so many poor householders in the Draper's company, as would receive the said alms, then there should be named, to supply the same number of alms-men, other householders of the parish of St. Edmund, in Lombard-street, and St. Bartholomew the Little, to receive the said alms. It was likewise directed and provided by the said founder, that these poor people to be elected should be of sober and honest conversation, and not detected of any open crime; and that after their admission they should be resident and abiding upon the same, and not to keep any common selling of ale, beer or wine, or any thing concerning tippling, or any petty oistrey; with an obligation also that the said alms-men should daily come into the church of the Crossed Friars, place themselves near the founder's tomb, and abide and continue there till service was ended. Over the gate of these houses, towards the street is the figure of the assumption of the Virgin Mary, supported by six angels in a cloud of glory, with this inscription: "Ad laudem dei et gloriose virginis Maria, hoc opus erexit donus Johannes Milbourn, miles et alderman bujus civitatis, A. D. 1535." In English thus: "To the praise of God, and the glory of the Virgin, this edifice was erected by John Milbourn, mayor of this city, in the year 1535." The appointment for the poor of these houses was augmented by Sir Richard Champion, with the addition of nineteen pounds fourteen shillings per annum more. And the Drapers company have not only increased the number of pensioners to fifteen, but have doubled their pensions, with a load of coals, and twenty or more shillings annually, out of the money left to be distributed by that company at discretion.

At the extremity of this ward, in Crutched-friars, is situate

The NAVY OFFICE.

Here all affairs relating to the royal navy are managed by the commissioners under the lords of the admiralty. Though the plainness of the building gives us no idea of its importance, yet it must be allowed the merit of being very convenient. The office where the commissioners meet, and the clerks keep their books, is detached from the rest, as a precaution against accidents by fire; the papers here being of the utmost importance; and in the other buildings some of the commissioners and other officers reside.

The treasurer of the navy is an officer of great trust, as he receives and pays all sums for the use of the navy: his salary is 2000l. per annum, and 800l. for his instruments.

Here are likewise seven commissioners, who have their different departments in the management of the business of the office, and a salary of 500l. per annum each.

One is comptroller of the navy: he attends and controls all payments of wages; is obliged to know the market price of all stores belonging to shipping, and to examine and audit all the treasurers, victuallers, and store-keepers accounts.

Two others are joint-surveyors of the navy; and their business is to know the state of all stores, and to see the wants supplied; to survey the hulls, masts and yards, and to estimate the value of repairs by indenture, to charge all boatswains and carpenters of the navy with what stores they have received; and at the end of each voyage to state and audit their accounts.

The fourth is clerk of the acts. It is his office to record all orders, contracts, bills, warrants, and other business transacted by the principal officers and commissioners of the navy.

The fifth is comptroller of the treasurers accounts.

The sixth is comptroller of the victualling accounts.

And the seventh is comptroller of the store-keeper's accounts.

There are also three extra commissioners, who have 500l. per annum, and 80l. each for house rent.

Besides these there are also a commissioner residing at Gibraltar, who has 1000l. a year, and several officers who have considerable under him. A commissioner resident at Chatham yard, at Portsmouth yard, and at Plymouth yard, who have 500l. a year; but Deptford and Woolwich yards are under the immediate inspection of the navy board; as Sheerness yard is under the inspection of the commissioner at Chatham. The principal of these officers hold their places by patent under the great seal.

On the north side from Aldgate formerly stood the priory of Holy Trinity, founded by queen Maud, wife to king Henry I. in the year 1108, for canons regular of the order of St. Augustin, with great endowments; amongst which the said king granted the port of Aldgate, and the soke thereunto belonging, &c. And, in order to establish this foundation, the four parishes of St. Mary Magdalen, St. Michael, St. Catherine, and the Blessed Trinity, were united in the one parish of the priory of the Holy Trinity called Christ-church.

This priory was built on a piece of ground upwards of three hundred feet long, in the parish of St. Catharine, near a parochial chapel dedicated to St. Michael, which stood where are now the row of houses by the pump, between Leadenhall-street and Fenchurch-street. The

The priory was dissolved by Henry VIII. in the year 1531; after which his majesty gave the house, church and site thereof to Sir Thomas Audley, who sold the bells, four to the parish of Stepney (where they now are) and five to the parishioners of Coleman street. The church was pulled down, and the priory converted into a noble mansion, in which Sir Thomas resided when he was lord chancellor, and when he died in the year 1544. His only daughter being married to Thomas duke of Norfolk, the estate descended to his grace, and was from that time called and known by the name of Duke's-place, which it retains to this day. The duke of Norfolk, however, losing his head on Tower-hill, this mansion descended to Thomas Howard, earl of Suffolk, eldest son to the said duke, by Audley's daughter; who by indenture of bargain and sale, dated the 21st. July 34 Eliz. sold the same to the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, to have and to hold to them and their successors, in as large and ample a manner as the said earl, or lord Audley, or the king, or the prior and convent, or their predecessors at any time before the dissolution of the said priory, or any other time, had, used, or enjoyed the same, by virtue of any grant, privilege, prescription, law, custom, or any other ways or means whatsoever.

Some time before the priory of Holy Trinity was dissolved, the inhabitants within its boundaries, who had been deprived of their parish churches, to make way for that religious foundation, finding it very inconvenient to be confined to the conventual church, petitioned and obtained leave, under certain conditions and restrictions, to build a chapel in the church yard of the said priory, for their own conveniency, which escaping the fate of the religious houses at the dissolution of the priory, became the only place, after the conventual church was pulled down, for the inhabitants within that district to repair to for divine service. This, however, in time, creating some dislike, the inhabitants of Duke's-place were desirous to raise a sufficient parish church for themselves, on the ground within their own precinct; to effect which they applied to the archbishop of Canterbury for his assistance; who having obtained the king's warrant, under the broad seal, for proceeding in their pious intention, prevailed with the lord-mayor, the court of aldermen, and common-council, to build them a church of the stones of the conventual church, which still remained on the premises. And the same was completed, consecrated, and dedicated to St. James, on the second of January 1622, and is now called

St. JAMES's, DUKE'S PLACE.

This parish is a precinct within itself, distinct from the ward of Aldgate, under a minister, two church-wardens, an overseer, two constables, two headboroughs, a scavenger, and fifteen jurymen. The church having escaped the dreadful fire in 1666, still remains in its original form. The body is well enlightened, and the Tower, which is composed of four stages, is terminated by a very singular kind of turret in the form of a canopy.

This church is a curacy, the patronage of which being in the Lord-mayor and commonalty of London, the parish claims a right of exemption from the bishop of London's jurisdiction, in matters ecclesiastical. The incumbent receives about 60*l.* a year by tithes, and 13*l.* a year from the chamber of London.

At the south east corner of St. Mary-ax, and at the west extremity of this ward, on the north side of Leadenhall-street, is the parochial church of

St. ANDREW UNDERSHAFT.

This church was originally founded in the year 1362, and obtained the name of Undershaft from a maypole, which was annually raised in the street near it on May-day, and which was called a shaft. The ancient church fell to decay, and the parishioners began to build the present church in or soon after the year 1520. The whole north-side of the great middle isle, both of the body and choir, was built by Stephen Jennings, merchant-taylor, and some time Lord-mayor of London; as appears by his arms carved over every pillar: as was the north isle also, which he roofed with timber and ceiled: also the whole south side of the church was glazed, and the pews in the south chapel were made at his expence. This generous benefactor to the parish died in 1524, and the work went on so heavily after his decease, that it was not finished till the year 1532.

This church is a plain gothic structure, with a well enlightened body, and a square tower terminated by battlements, with pinnacles at the corners, within which rises a turret that contains the bell. It is a rectory in the patronage of the bishop of London: and the incumbent receives 120*l.* per annum by tithes.

At the north east corner of St. Mary ax street stands

FLETCHERS HALL.

This is a small, neat, convenient building, and belongs to the company of Fletchers or arrow makers, from the french word flèche, an arrow. Though arrows have been near three centuries out of use in England, and notwithstanding this is a company only by prescription and not by charter, they have nevertheless obtained a coat of arms and a livery: they are the thirty-ninth company in the city, and seem in all respects as firmly established as those incorporated by letters patent. This fraternity which entirely consists of people of other trades, is under the government of two wardens, ten assistants, and the liverymen.

On the north side of Leadenhall-street, formerly stood the church of St. Mary-ax. It was originally dedicated not only to the Virgin Mary, but to St. Ursula, and her eleven thousand virgins; but it was commonly called St. Mary at the Ax, from the sign of the ax which hung over against the east end of the church; and sometimes it was named St. Mary Papillar, from a plot of ground belonging to the Skinners company, that lay on the north side of it. But this parish being, about the year 1565, united to the parish-church of St.

Andrew Underhaft, St. Mary at the Ax, was let out as a warehouse to a merchant, and for mechanical uses; but the street, however, in which this edifice stood, still retains its name.

From the time of the union of these parishes, the bishop of London, for the time being, has successively, as the said church of St. Andrew has happened to be void, collated to it with the church of St. Mary-ax thereunto annexed. Besides, queen Elizabeth, at the time she granted the patronage of St. Mary-ax to the bishop of London, also granted the church-yard for burying the dead, and all the houses, buildings, rents, &c. Belonging to the said church of St. Mary, to the rector and churchwardens of the said parish of St. Andrew and their successors for ever, to the use, sustaining, and reparation of the said church of St. Andrew.

Near the extremity of this ward, on the north side of Fenchurch-street, is a very noble, modern building, erected in the year 1748, by the Ironmongers, for transacting their affairs as a body corporate, and from that company called

IRONMONGERS HALL.

This edifice is entirely fronted with stone, and the whole lower story is wrought in rustic. The center part of the building projects a little; and in this are a large arched entrance, and two windows, with two others on each side. Over this rustic story rises the super-structure, which has a light rustic at the corners, to keep up a correspondence with the rest of the building: the part which projects is ornamented with four Ionic pilasters coupled, but with a large columniation. In the middle is a very noble venetian window, and over it a circular one. In each space between the pilasters, is a smaller window, with an angular pediment; and over these are also circular ones; but the side parts have arched windows with square ones over them. The central part is crowned with a pediment supported by these pilasters, and in its plain is the arms of the company with handsome decorations in relieve. The rest of the building is terminated by a balustrade crowned with vases.

The Ironmongers company was incorporated by charter from king Edward IV. in the year 1464, and is the tenth of the twelve principal companies in this city. It was incorporated by the name and style of "The master and keepers or wardens and commonalty of the art or mystery of Ironmongers of London". And, by virtue of the said charter, the government of this fraternity is now in a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants, which consists of the whole livery, and represent the commonalty or whole freedom. This company enjoys very great estates both in their own right and in trust from several donors, by whose will they pay yearly near 1800l. in charities; besides the interest or profits of 26000l. left to them by Mr. Thomas Betton, a Turkey merchant, in the year 1724, under the special trust of employing one moiety of the said profits perpetually in the redemption of British captives from Moorish slavery; and the other moiety to be equally distributed between the poor of the company of Ironmongers and the several charity schools within the bills of mortality.

At the corner of Magpye-alley, behind the houses that front Fenchurch-street, stands the parish church of

ST. CATHARINE COLEMAN.

This church is so denominated from its dedication to St. Catharine, a virgin of Alexandria, and celebrated for her great knowledge in philosophy, and as being a martyr for the christian faith. It received the addition of Coleman from a great yard or garden, called at that time Coleman-haw, in the parish of the Trinity, afterwards Christchurch. It is a rectory of ancient foundation, even so far back as the year 1346. The old church was substantially repaired, and a south isle added in 1489, by Sir William White, Lord-mayor of London; which church escaped the fire of London in 1666, and, with the assistance of several other repairs, stood, but was much buried by the raising of the street, till the year 1734, when it was pulled down, and the present church was erected at the expence of the parish, under the sanction of an act of parliament 12 Geo. II. whereby, and by another act passed for the same purpose, the parishioners were enabled to raise money by annuities at the rate of eight pounds per cent per annum, and to rate the inhabitants to pay the said annuities.

This church was originally in the patronage of the dean of St. Martin's-le-Grand, London, and so continued till that religious house with its appurtenances, was annexed to the abbey of Westminster: at whose dissolution it fell to the crown, and the advowson was given by queen Mary, on the third of March, in the first year of her reign, to the bishop of London and his successors in that see for ever. The present church has a lofty body, well lightened with two rows of windows. The steeple is a plain tower, crowned with battlements; and the floor is raised so much above the surface of the street, that you ascend by several steps into the church from the church-yard; by which means there is little reason to expect this edifice will ever fall under the like disadvantage with the former.

In this parish is a select vestry, which consists of those who have served the office of churchwarden. The officers are two churchwardens, who are likewise collectors for the poor.

Adjoining to the south-side of this church-yard is a Jews synnagogue, supported by the congregation of Portuguese Jews. And close to the east side stands a large pile of brick buildings erected by the East India company for warehouses; with convenience for carts and waggons to load and unload within, and to pass through from Fenchurch-street into Crutched Friars.

Opposite St. Catherine Coleman's church is the new street called Fenchurch-buildings, a paved court, well built, and genteelly inhabited; the north-end of which ascends by a harrow passage into Sugar-loaf court.

More to the east is Northumberland-alley, so called from the mansion-house of Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland, in the 33d. of Henry VI. This noble mansion soon after fell so greatly to decay that it became the common rendezvous for all sorts of dissolute people. The site of it, however, is at present covered with very mean buildings, inhabited by industrious and labouring people.

About thirty yards from Mark-lane is a new built street, called London street; so called from its being built upon that spot of ground where the London tavern, and the first house of that kind, formerly stood.

At the south east angle of Cree-church-lane, in Leadenhall street, stands the church of #### ST. CATHERINE-CREE.

So called from its being dedicated to St. Catherine, an Egyptian virgin; and distinguished from other churches of the name, by the addition of Cree or Christ, from its vicinity to the conventual church of the Holy Trinity, which was originally called Christ's church.

King Henry VIII. in his grant of the priory of Holy Trinity to Sir Thomas Audley, afterwards lord Audley, gave this church also to Sir Thomas; the prior and canons of Christ-church having been originally and always patrons thereof. By the will of lord Audley, dated April nineteen, 1544, this church fell to the master and fellows of Magdalen-college, in Cambridge, and their successors, whom he enjoined to serve the cure for ever; who leased out the impropriation to the parishioners for ninety years: but a dispute arising between the college and the parish, at the expiration of the said lease, in 1725, about a renewal, a lease was granted to Jerome Knapp, haberdasher of London; and, in order to settle the difference, it was agreed, that one hundred and fifty pounds per annum, should be raised by the parishioners, in lieu of tythes, &c. out of which the officiating curate should be paid fifty pounds per annum, for the first ten years, besides surplus fees, &c. and after the expiration of that term of years, seventy pounds per annum, besides surplus fees; and this agreement was, in May 1727, confirmed by act of parliament.

The antiquity of this church may be collected from its priority, to the conventual church of Holy Trinity, Christ-church, in which foundation St. Catherine's, St. Michael's, St. Mary Magdalen's, and the Blessed Trinity, were swallowed up.

Within the church-yard of the said priory, another church was founded with the addition of Christ or Cree, to be supplied by one of the canons, and removeable at the pleasure of the prior. This church was so buried, by the frequent raising of the pavement in the high-street, (now called Leadenhall-street) that they were obliged to descend into it by seven steps, and otherwise appeared very old and much decayed, except the bell-tower or steeple, which had been rebuilt, at the expence of Sir John Percival, in the year 1504.

The present edifice was erected in the year 1630: it is built with stone, and of a mixed Gothic style. It has rounded battlements on the top, and a square tower that has the same kind of battlements: this tower is crowned with a square turret, over which is a dome, and from its summit rises the weather-cock.

When this church was built, they took in a cloister, which stood on the back-side of the old church, of more than seven feet in breadth: and at the west-end of this new church, on the south-side, stands a pillar of the old church, as it stood, and was there erected; which pillar being eighteen feet high from the basis or foot to the chapter or head, upon which the old arch was raised, and not above two feet appearing now above the floor of the present church, shews that the floor is raised fifteen feet above that of the old.

This parish church being a donative, pays neither first fruits nor tenths. It is a curacy, and the parishioners have the privilege of chusing their own ministers, who must be licenced by the bishop of London. Here is a select vestry, consisting of the church-wardens, and those who have served or fined for that office: the officers are two church wardens, four overseers, and two side-men.

Nearly opposite to this, but behind houses, on the south side of the High-street, stands

BRICKLAYERS HALL.

This is a handsome and convenient building, adapted for transacting the affairs of the company of tylers and bricklayers, who were incorporated in the tenth of Elizabeth, on the third of August 1568, by the style and title of "The master and keeper and wardens of the Society of the free-men of the mystery or art of tylers and bricklayers of London." It is a livery company and governed by a master, two wardens and a court of assistants.

This being the last material building, we shall leave the ward of Aldgate, and proceed to the next chapter.

CHAPTER V.

Of BASSISHAW and BILLINGSGATE Wards.

THE ward of Bassishaw is very small, consisting only of one street, which is called Basinghall street, and derives its name from Basinghall, the mansion-house of the renowned family of Basings, which was the principal house in it, and situate where Blackwell-hall now stands.

This ward is bounded on the east and south by Coleman street ward; on the north by Cripple-gate ward; and on the west by Cheap and Cripple-gate wards. It begins in the south by Blackwell-hall, and runs northward to the spot where London-wall stood. It is governed by an alderman, four common-council men, one of whom is the alderman's deputy; three constables; seventeen inquest men; three scavengers, and a beadle.

Basinghall-street, of which this little ward consists, is of no great uniformity, as not running straight, and of an equal breadth; but it is graced with good buildings, and well inhabited by merchants. Near the center of this street, on the west-side, is the parochial church of

St. MICHAEL BASSISHAW,

So denominated from its dedication to St. Michael the archangel, and its situation near Basinghaw or hall. It is a rectory of very ancient foundation, dedicated to the same saint, in or about the year 1140, at which time, and till the year 1327, it was in the gift of the prior and canons of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield; tho' the register of London gives no name of its rector before Ralph de Waltham, who died in the year 1327, at which time the presentation was in Henry Bodyke, citizen of London; but about a century after, it fell to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, who, from that time to this, have continued patrons thereof.

The old church, which was very beautiful, was entirely destroyed by the fire of London in 1666; ten years after which, the present structure was begun, and finished in 1679. The walls of this building are strengthened with rustic work at the corners, and the body is well enlightened by a single series of large windows. At the east-end, where the top is terminated by an arch, the light is given by three windows; one of them tall and upright, the two others circular: the steeple is a tower, crowned with a turret, from which rises a kind of spire. The vestry is general, and the parochial officers, are too church-wardens and two overseers.

On the South-east angle of Mason's-alley, on the east-side of Basinghall-street, is situate

M A S O N S H A L L.

A small building, but very convenient; it is made of stone, and bounded on the south by Coleman-street church-yard. This company was incorporated about the year 1410, by the name and style of "The Free Maçons;" a fraternity which have been honoured by many of the gentry and nobility, and even by several kings, who have been members of their society. William Hanckstow, clarencieux king at arms, in the year 1477, granted them the arms of their society, as borne at this time: but the present company act under the incorporation granted by the letters patent of the 29th of Charles II. on the seventeenth of September 1677, by the name of "The master, wardens, assistants and commonalty of the company of Maçons of the city of London." Under which title they enjoy the privilege of the livery, and are governed by a master and two wardens, who are chosen annually, as in all other companies; and a court of assistants, who are chosen for life, except guilty of some capital offence.

From this hall we proceed to another in the same street, called

It is handsomely built, and neatly adorned on the inside with hangings, fret work, and a crown of the Ionic order.

From the origin of this company we have reason to imagine it was the first incorporated society in the city of London. Anciently the weavers were named Thelarii; and in the reign of king Henry I. they paid sixteen pounds to the crown for their immunities, and eighteen marks annually. King John, in the year 1200, disfranchised them, at the instance of the mayor and citizens of London. for which favour the citizens paid the king twenty marks per annum. This difference between the citizens and weavers, in all probability, arose from some bad practices of the latter, who, by virtue of a power granted by king Henry II. in the thirty-first year of his reign, were put under the inspection of the portgreve, or chief magistrate of London; for, amongst other articles, the king ordained, "if any man made cloth of Spanish wool mixed with English wool, the portgreve, or chief magistrate of London, ought to burn it."

In the seventh of Henry IV. this company which originally consisted of tapestry and cloth-weavers, were reinstated with their freedom, and by act of parliament put under the management and and authority of the Lord-mayor and aldermen of the city; but its present state is very different, consisting chiefly of worsted, cotton, and silk weavers.

This fraternity is governed by two officers called bailiffs, two wardens, and a court of assistants. It is privileged with the livery, and is the forty-second company.

To the north of this stands

GIRDLEERS HALL.

A handsome and convenient building, finished in 1681, well wainscotted within, and adorned with a screen of the composite order for transacting the affairs of the company, which is a livery company, and the twenty-third on the list. It was incorporated in the twenty-seventh of Henry VI. on the sixth of August 1449; and re-incorporated with the Pinners and Wire-drawers by queen Elizabeth on the twelfth of October 1568, by the name of "The master and wardens or keepers of the art or mystery of the Girdlers of London." It is governed by a master, three wardens, and a court of assistants.

Between the church-yard of St. Michael Basinghaw and Guildhall passage stands

COOPERS HALL.

This is a stately edifice, and well built of brick. The hall is a handsome room, paved with marble and wainscotted, about fourteen feet high. The company was incorporated in 1501, by king Henry VII. under the title of "The master, wardens, and assistants of the company of coopers of London and suburbs thereof;" and in the succeeding reign was impowered to search and gauge all beer, ale, and soap vessels within the city of London, and two miles round its suburbs, for which they were allowed a farthing for each cask. They are governed by a master, three wardens, and a court of assistants; and their livery are very numerous.

On the south side of Basinghall-street is situated

BLACKWELL HALL.

This is a very ancient edifice, and has been used for several ages past as a market for all broad and narrow woollen cloth brought to London. It was originally called Basinghaw or hall, from the family of the Basings, who built the house, and gave name also to the ward. In process of time this house descended to Mr. Thomas Bakewell in the 36th of Edward III. and from him called Bakewell-hall. It afterwards fell to the crown, and was sold, with its gardens and appurtenances, by king Richard II. to the city of London for fifty pounds; and has, from that time, been called Blackwell hall, and employed as a weekly market for all broad and narrow woollen cloths brought out of the country.

This hall, which was rebuilt in 1558, was destroyed by the fire in 1666, and the present structure was erected in 1672. It is a square building with a court in the middle, surrounded with warehouses, and has two spacious entrances or gates for carriages; one from Basinghall-street, the other from Guildhall-yard, where is the principal front, and a door-case, adorned with two columns of the Doric order, with their entablature and a pediment, in which are the king's arms, and the city arms a little lower, enriched with cupids.

These buildings have likewise an entrance on the west side from Cateaton-street; and within them are divers apartments or warehouses, called the Devonshire, the Gloucestershire, the Worcestershire, the Kentish, the Medley, the Spanish, and the blanket halls; in which each piece of cloth pays one penny for pitching, and a half-penny per week resting; by which means it is said, there arises a revenue of eleven hundred pounds per annum; which, by the generosity of the citizens, is applied towards the support of Christ's Hospital; the governors whereof have the sole management of these warehouses.

This market may be said to be the greatest woollen cloth market in the world; and therefore it has always been the particular care of the city of London to keep it under the most established regulations and orders: for, so early as the 21st of Richard II. it was ordained, that no manner of person should sell any woollen cloths, except they were first brought, harboured, and discharged at the common market of Blackwell-hall, upon pain of forfeiture thereof. And that ordinance was confirmed by an act of common-council, held on the first of August, 8 Henry VIII. with this addition, that no manner of person, being freeman of this city, suffer any manner of person whatsoever, be he free or foreign, to buy or sell any manner of woollen cloths, harboured, or lodged, contrary to the said ordinance, within his shop, chamber, or other place within his house, unless the said cloths were first brought to Blackwell-hall, and there bought and sold; under the penalty of six shillings and eight-pence for every broad cloth; three shillings and four-pence for every Kersey; and twenty-pence for every Desein of Bridgewater and other pieces of cloth. Double for a second offence; and disfranchisement for a third.

OF BILLINGSGATE WARD.

FROM whence this ward took its name, is not quite certain. Some authors have deduced it from king Ballinus; but the most probable opinion refers us to some eminent person, who, in ancient times, had large possessions in this part of the city, or held this ward by the same tenure as the Balings, &c. held other wards. It is situated on the river side, and is bounded on the south by the Thames; on the east by Tower-street ward; and on the west by the ward of Bridge Within. It extends from the west end of Tower-street ward, about to Smart's-key in Thames street, from whence it runs, on the south-side of Thames-street, to St. Magnus church, at the foot of London-bridge; and from Smart's-key, it runs up almost to Fenchurch-street, in a direct line, and then westward, within a few houses of Gracechurch.

This ward is divided into twelve precincts, viz. St. Mary Hill, Smart's-key, Billingsgate, Love-lane; the three precincts of St. Botolph Billingsgate; two precincts of St. Andrew Hubbard; St. George, Botolph-lane, Pudding-lane, and Rood-lane. It is governed by an alderman, ten common-council men, (one of whom is the alderman's deputy) eleven constables, fourteen inquest men, six scavengers and a beadle.

Thames-street is a place of very considerable trade, on account of its convenient situation near the river, the Custom-house, Billingsgate, and the several wharfs and keys for lading and unlading merchants goods, &c. and is well adapted for that purpose. The keys, wharfs, and docks, which are assigned by act of parliament, for shipping, lading, and landing of goods and merchandizes, are as follow: Brewer's-key, Chester's-key, Galley-key, Wooldock, Custom-house-key, Porter's-key, Bear's-key, Sab's-key, Wiggan's-key, Young's-key, Rafe's-key, Dice-key, Smart's-key, Somer's-key, Lion's-key, Botolph's-key, Hamon's-key, Gaunt's-key, Cock's-key, Fresh-wharf, and Billingsgate: the latter of which is not so remarkable for loading and landing of goods and merchandize, as it is for being the greatest market for fish in England, and the only port for fish in London. It is a large water-gate or key, or port for small vessels, laden with fish of all sorts, oranges, lemons, Spanish onions, and other commodities. It is likewise the port for Gravesend boats and wherries to take in their fare, from whence they are (under a penalty) to depart at the ringing of a bell, erected near the stairs for that purpose, which rings a quarter of an hour, to give notice of the time of high-water at London-bridge, and the time of ebb. On the wharf is the common exchange every day at noon, for masters of colliers, and dealers in coals concerned in the Newcastle coal trade.

Nearly opposite Billingsgate, is the street called St. Mary-hill; on the west-side of which is situate the church of ## St. MARY at HILL.

This church is so called, from its being dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and its situation on an eminence. With respect to the original foundation, we have no certain date; but, if we may be permitted to conjecture, from its being so much decayed in the year 1497, as to require rebuilding, it must be allowed to have stood above two hundred years at least before that time. Besides, we can account for one hundred and sixty years: for Rose de Wrytel founded a chantry in the church of St. Mary at Hill, in the year 1330, and Richard de Hackney, citizen of London, presented Nigellus Dalleye to this living, in the year 1337.

It is remarkable, that, in digging the foundation of the new church, in 1497, the corpse of Alice Hackney, who died about the year 1322, was discovered in a very rotten coffin; and that the skin was found and flexible, and the joints pliable, though buried about one hundred and seventy-five years. The body was kept above ground three or four days, without any noisome smell, but then beginning to be tainted, was again laid in the ground.

Though this church was not entirely destroyed by the dreadful conflagration in 1666, every thing combustible in it was consumed: it was, however, soon after repaired, and the parish of St. Andrew Hubbard annexed to it. It is a well-proportioned Gothic structure, consisting of a plain body, enlightened by large windows, and a tower crowned by a handsome turret. The vestry, which is select, consists of nineteen members, and the officers are two church-wardens, and two side-men.

The advowson appears to have been in private hands, till about the year 1638, when it was purchased by the parish; but since the parish of St. Andrew Hubbard was united to it, the duke of Somerset, who is patron thereof, presents in his turn. The rector receives two hundred pounds a year in lieu of tythes.

In this church is founded a divinity-lecture, to be preached every Thursday morning, endowed with forty pounds per annum, by Sir John Loman.

Annually, on the Sunday after Midsummer-day, according to ancient custom, the fraternity of fellowship porters of the city of London, repair to this church in the morning, where, during the reading of prayers, they reverently approach the altar, two and two; on the rails of which are placed two basons, into these they put their respective offerings; and being generally followed by the congregation, the money offered is distributed among the aged poor and indigent members of that fraternity.

In

In this church is the following epitaph on Sir Thomas Blancke, Lord-mayor of London, in the year 1582.

Here lyeth a knight, in London borne,
 Sir Thomas Blancke by name,
 Of honest birth, of merchants trade,
 A man of worthy fame.
 Religious was his life to God,
 To man his dealing just;
 The poor and hospitals can tell,
 That wealth was not his trust.
 With gentle heart and spirit milde,
 And nature full of pitie,
 Both sheriff, Lord-mayor and alderman,
 He ruled in this citie.
The good knight was his common name,
 So call'd of many men:
 He lived long and died of yeares
 Twice seven and six times ten.
 Obijt 28 Octob. Ann. Dom. 1588.

The parish church of St. Andrew Hubbard stood where, at present, the king's weigh-house is situate, between St. Botolph's-lane, and Love-lane in Little Eastcheap. The patronage of which, anno 1389, was in the earl of Pembroke, who being killed in a tournament at Woodstock, and leaving no issue, the crown seized on the advowson for some time, till it came to John lord Talbot, afterwards earl of Shrewsbury, in whose family it continued till the death John earl of Shrewsbury at the battle of Northampton, anno 1460, when it came to Edward IV. who a few years after restored it to that noble family; wherein it continued till it came to the earls of Northumberland, from whom by marriage it went to the duke of Somerset. This church being destroyed by the fire of London in 1666, and not rebuilt; the parish thereof was by act of parliament, annexed to that of St. Mary Hill, whereupon the parishioners disposed of the ground both of church and cemetery to the city, the purchase-money whereof they gave towards new paving the church of the said St. Mary Hill, the place of public worship for the united parishes.

On the west side of Botolph-lane is a parochial church, dedicated to St. George of Cappadocia, and patron of the English nation. It is called

St. GEORGE, BOTOLPH-LANE.

From its situation near the middle of the hill that leads from Thames-street to Little-eastcheap. It is a rectory founded in the year 1321, and was originally in the abbot and convent of St. Saviour's Bermondsey; at whose dissolution it came to the crown, where the patronage still remains. This church was burnt down in 1666; after which the present structure was raised. It is built of stone, and though small, yet it is very neat; the outside is handsome, the inside well adorned. The parish of St. Botolph Billingsgate was annexed to it when rebuilt; and their yearly value together was settled by act of parliament at 180l. in lieu of tythes.

The church of St. Botolph Billingsgate, destroyed by the fire, and not rebuilt, was a very ancient foundation. It was a rectory, and stood opposite the end of Botolph-lane, on the south side of Thames-street, and gave name to the adjoining gate or wharf, known by the name of Botolph's-gate in the reign of Edward the Confessor: in the reign of Richard I. the patronage was in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's.

The greatest part of the ground on which the chancel stood was, after the fire of London, taken into the passage to Botolph-wharf; and on part of the ground where the body of the church stood, there was built a house, at six pounds per annum, ground rent. The rest was walled in for a burying-place. About 1677, a vault was built for the interment of the dead in part of the church-yard; and a lease was let to Francis Minshall, to build a shop or shed thereon for the benefit of the poor at four pounds per annum. The parishioners also built another vault in a different part of the said church-yard; and, for the benefit of the poor, did, in 1693, let to the said Minshall the site thereof for sixty one years, at the rate of two pounds per annum, and a fine of one hundred and fifty pounds to build a shop over the said vault. There was also another church-yard or burying place in Botolph-lane belonging to this parish, part of which was leased out to Joshua Green for seventy-one years, at twenty pounds per annum on a building lease. Both vestries are general; and the officers of each parish are, two church-wardens and two overseers.

At the south east angle of Rood-lane, in Little Tower-street, stands the parochial church of

St. MARGARET PATTENS.

It is so called, from its dedication to St. Margaret, virgin and martyr, and its standing in a lane, which was entirely occupied by makers and dealers in pattens. In after-times, however, this lane was called Rood-lane, on account of a rood or cross set up in the church-yard of St. Margaret, when pulled down to be rebuilt. This cross or rood was blessed in a particular manner, and privileged by the pope with many indulgences, for the pardon of their sins who came to pray before it, and to make their offerings towards the rebuilding of St. Margaret's-church: by which means much money was collected from the devotees that frequented the tabernacle in which this rood was placed or set up. But the church being finished in the year 1538, soon after the reformation, some people unknown assembled without noise in the night of the twenty-second of May that same year, and broke the rood to pieces, and demolished the tabernacle in which it was erected. The lane adjoining has, however, ever since been called Rood-lane.

The advowson of this church, which is a rectory, was anciently in the family of the Nevils, in which it continued till the year 1392, when it came to Robert Rickenden of Essex, who, in the year 1408, confirmed the same to Richard Whittington: and in 1411 the said Richard Whittington conveyed it to the mayor and commonalty of London;

don; since which time it has been in the gift of the citizens, who have presented thereto after various manners, viz. sometimes the mayor alone; at other times, the mayor and aldermen; then, the mayor and commonalty; and again, the mayor and commonalty and citizens of London, in whom it still remains.

This church was entirely destroyed in the lamentable fire of 1666, and the present one was erected in the year 1687. It is built part of stone and part of brick, and consists of a plain body, 66 feet in length, 52 feet broad, and 32 feet in height to the roof. The windows are arched, with port-hole windows over them. Over the front door is a large Doric window, with a cherubim's head and a large festoon over it; and above these is a pediment, which stretches from the steeple to the end of the church. The tower rises square to a considerable height, and is terminated by four plain pinnacles, crowned with balls, and a balustrade, within which rises a very solid spire, terminated by a ball and fane.

The officers of this parish are, one churchwarden, and one overseer or collector for the poor; and the vestry is general.

After the fire of London, the living of St. Gabriel Fenchurch, which was entirely destroyed, was annexed to St. Margaret Pattens. That was also a rectory, founded about the year 1321, and dedicated to the angel Gabriel; it stood in the middle of Fenchurch-street, in the broad way near Cullum-street, and was originally a small church, but was enlarged and richly beautified in 1632.

The patronage of this rectory appears to have been anciently in the prior and convent of the Holy Trinity within Aldgate, in whom it continued till the suppression of their priory, when it devolved to the crown, in which it still remains. The vestry is general, and has but one churchwarden.

The living of these two parishes, since the union, is settled at 120l. per annum, in lieu of tythes; and as there is but one rector to serve them both, the patrons of each present alternately.

At the north-west corner of Love-lane, as you enter into Little Eastcheap, is situate

The KING's WEIGH-HOUSE.

This house stands on the ground where the church of St. Andrew Hubbard stood before the fire of London, at which time the weigh-house was in Cornhill. The original intent of this house was, to prevent frauds in the weight of merchandize brought from beyond seas, by the king's beam. It was under a master and four master porters, with labouring porters under them; who used to have carts and horses to fetch the merchants goods to the beam, and to carry them back. The house belongs to the Grocers company, who chose the several porters, &c. but of late years little is done in this office, as a compulsive power is wanting to oblige merchants to have their goods weighed, they alledging it to be an unnecessary trouble and expence.

In a large room over the weigh-house is a commodious meeting-house used by a congregation of protestant dissenters.

In Pudding-lane, the west boundaries of this ward, is situate

BUTCHERS HALL.

This is a neat convenient little building, and is finely adorned with fret-work and wainscot.

The fraternity of butchers appears to be of great antiquity; for in the 26th of Henry II. it was fined for setting up a guild without the king's licence. And its present charter, under which the butchers act, was not granted till the third of James I. who, on the 16th of September 1605, did, by letters patent, incorporate them by the style of "The master, wardens, and commonalty, of the art or mystery of butchers of the city of London." The company is governed by a master, five wardens, and a court of assistants: it is a livery company, and the twenty-fourth in the city list.

CHAPTER VI.

OF BISHOPSGATE and BREAD-STREET WARDS.

THE ward of Bishopsgate takes its name from a gate which stood almost in the center thereof, between the north-west end of Camomile-street and the north-east end of Wormwood-street. It is bounded on the east by Aldgate ward, Portsoken ward, and part of the Tower liberty; on the south by Langbourn ward; on the west by Broad-street ward, and Moorfields; and on the north by Shoreditch; and extends from the bars at the north end near Spital-square, on both sides of the way, including almost half of Houndsditch, as far as the pump, at the corner of St. Martin's Outwich; and then winding by the west corner of Leaden-hall, down Gracechurch-street, to the south-west corner opposite Fenchurch-street.

This ward consists of two parts, viz. Bishopsgate within, and Bishopsgate without: and is divided into nine precincts, five in the former, and four in the latter. It is under the government of one alderman, two deputies, twelve common-council-men, seven constables, thirteen inquest-men, nine scavengers, and two beadies.

In surveying this ward we shall begin at the south extremity, which takes in that part of Gracechurch-street, on both sides the way, that reaches reaches from the north-west corner of Leadenhall-street, and north-east corner of Cornhill, to Lombard-street and Fenchurch-street.

Grace, or Grafs-church-street, is a large and spacious street, with well built and lofty houses, and inhabited by good tradesmen. The whole street begins at Eastcheap, and falls into Leadenhall-street at the four cross streets; but the part in this ward begins only at Lombard-street end, as mentioned before.

Leadenhall herb market, which is large and not inferior to any in London, is in this ward; but the other parts of Leadenhall, viz. the flesh market, and the fish market, &c. are in Lime-street ward.

Bishopsgate-street is large, long and spacious, and generally well inhabited: on the east side of which is Crosby-square, so called from Sir John Crosby knt. who built a great house thereon in the year 1466, upon a building lease of ninety-nine years, from the prioress and convent of St. Helen's. In this house Richard, duke of Gloucester, who seized upon the crown by contriving the death of his two nephews, resided during the time he was forging his designs and plots to pave his way to the throne. Part of this house, as it was repaired and carried higher by a turret built by alderman Bond, in the year 1576, is still to be seen on the north side of the entrance into the square from Bishopsgate-street; the square being chiefly built upon the garden ground. Part of the house is at this time used by a congregation of dissenters.

Nearly opposite to this square stood Gresham college. This ancient building, which was the mansion-house of the renowned Sir Thomas Gresham, founder of the Royal Exchange, has been lately taken down, and a most superb edifice of stone is at this time erecting (as an Excise office) in its stead.

In a spacious court called Great St. Helen's, on the south side of this street, is situate the church of

ST. HELEN'S,

So denominated from its dedication to St. Helen the mother of Constantine the Great. The patronage of this church appears to have been anciently in lay hands; for one Ranulph, about the year 1180, granted the same to the dean and canons of St. Paul's, by whom it was some time after granted to William, son of William, the Goldsmith, who founded the adjacent priory of St. Helen; on the prioress and nuns of which he conferred the advowson thereof, in whom it continued till the suppression of their convent in 1539, when it came to the crown. Edward VI. in the year 1550, granted the advowson to Nicholas, bishop of London, and his successors; which was confirmed by queen Mary in the year 1553. But it having been since re-granted to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, they are both patrons and ordinaries, and collate to the vicarage.

This church escaped the fire of London in 1666, and is a gothic structure of the lighter kind, consist of a plain body, with large windows. The Tower was not built till the year 1669, and is wrought with rustic at the corners, and is crowned with a turret and dome, with a bell in it. In this church are several very curious monuments; particularly that of Francis Bencroft, who having in a course of years amassed a very considerable sum of money, left the principal part of it in trust to the draper's company to found and maintain an alms-house and a school, and to keep this his monument in good and substantial repair; within which he is emboweled, embalmed, and in a chest or box, made with a lid to fall down, with a pair of hinges without any fastening; and a piece of square glass in the lid just over his face. It is a very plain monument, almost square; and has a door for the sexton, on certain occasions, to go in and clear it from dust and cobwebs; but the keys of the iron rails about the monument, and of the vault door, are kept by the clerk of the drapers company. The minister has twenty shillings for preaching a sermon once a year in commemoration of Mr. Bencroft's charities; on which occasion the alms-men and scholars attend at church, and are, by the will of the founder, entertained with a good dinner at some neighbouring public house. The sexton has forty shillings a year for keeping the monument clear of dust.

At the west end of the church in the center of the square, lies the church-yard, which is enclosed with a wall and iron rails, and ornamented with tall trees.

The officers of this parish are, two churchwardens, four overseers of the poor, and two sidesmen; and the vestry is general.

Just at the entrance of this square are the alms-houses founded by lady Holles, and given by her ladyship in trust to the skinners company for six poor men or women, and endowed the same with lands, lett at ten pounds per annum, out of which each person was to receive seven pence per week. Alice Smith afterwards gave more lands, lett at fifteen pounds per annum for their support. And these estates being increased in value, the company has rebuilt the house in a very handsome manner, and augmented the allowance of the pensioners.

A little beyond this, on the same side, is another court called Little St. Helen's. On this spot stood the nunnery, which was annexed to the above church, and from which this court is separated only by a row of dwelling-houses, built on the ruins of that religious fabric: some remains of which are still to be seen in

LEATHERSELLERS HALL,

Which contains the nuns hall, and other apartments belonging to that nunnery, purchased from the crown from the company of leatherfellers; and notwithstanding its antiquity, may be said to vie with most of the halls in London, for neatness and convenience. The entrance into the common hall is up a handsome flight of stone steps from the court yard. The screen is magnificently adorned with six columns of Ionic order, enrichments, &c. and the ceiling enriched with fret work.

The company of leatherfellers was incorporated by letters patents of the twenty second of Henry VI. in 1442, by the name of, "the wardens and society of the mystery or art of leatherfellers of the city of London." They are governed by a prime, three wardens, and a court of assistants. It is a livery company, and the fifteenth among the corporations of this city.

By a grant of Henry VII. the wardens of this corporation, or their deputies, were empowered to have the inspection of sheep, lamb and calves leather throughout the kingdom, for the more effectually preventing frauds in these several commodities.

Not far from the hall is an alms-house for four poor men and three women, erected by the company of leatherfellers, agreeable to the will of John Haldwood, who endowed them with eightpence per week each; since which it has been augmented by other benefactions to two shillings per week, and six bushels of coals at Christmas. In this court is likewise a presbyterian meeting-house.

Some little way further to the north, in Bishopsgate-street, stands the parish church of.

ST. ETHELBURG.

This church is so denominated from its dedication to Ethelburga, the first christian Saxon princess, and daughter to Ethelbert king of Kent, the first christian Saxon prince, and patron to Austin the monk, the English apostle.

The advowson of this church, which is a rectory, was in the prioreis and nuns of St. Helen, till the suppression of their convent in the year 1539; when coming to the crown it was some time after granted by queen Elizabeth, to the bishop of London and his successors, who have ever since collated and inducted to the same. And in ecclesiastical matters it is subject to the arch-deacon. This church is very ancient, having escaped the fire of London. The body is irregular and in the Gothic style, with very large windows: and the steeple is a tall spire, supported on a square tower. The rector receives about 60l. a year in lieu of tythes.

Being now arrived at the site of Bishopsgate, we enter that part of the ward called Bishopsgate-without: on the north side of which stands the parochial church of

ST. BOTOLPH'S, BISHOPSGATE.

This church appears to be of very ancient foundation, and dedicated to St. Botolph, an English saxon saint, who died about the year 680; but the first rector we have any account of was John of Northampton, who resigned the same on the fourth of June 1323. At which time it was, and still remains, in the gift of the bishop of London.

The old church, which was built of brick and stone, escaped the fire of London, but became so ruinous, that the parishioners thought it necessary to apply to parliament to enable them to raise money by annuities, to pull it down and build a new church; which was begun in 1725, and finished in two years after.

The present structure is massy and spacious; the body is built with brick, and well enlightened, and the roof hid by a handsome balustrade. The steeple, though heavy, maintains an air of magnificence. In the center of the front is a large, plain, arched window, decorated at a distance with pilasters of the Doric order. Over this window is a festoon, and above that an angular pediment; on each side is a door, crowned with windows, and over these there are others of the port hole kind; above which rises a square tower, crowned with a dome, whose base is circular, and surrounded by a balustrade in the same form; by the side of which, on the corners of the tower, are placed urns with flames. From this part rises a series of coupled corinthian pillars, supporting other urns like the former, and over them rises the orgive dome, crowned with a very large vase, with flames. The roof within-side is arched, except over the galleries, and two rows of corinthian columns support both the galleries and arch, which extends over the body of the church, and is neatly adorned with fret work. The whole expence of building this church amounted to £10,444 1s. 8d.½

This church has a select vestry, which consists of twenty-seven, including the rector and churchwardens for the time being; and there are two churchwardens and four overseers. The rector besides other considerable advantages, receives about 300l. per annum by tythes.

This parish being greatly confined for room to bury their dead, the city, in the year 1615, gave them a piece of waste ground, which is now the church-yard, and is handsomely railed with iron work: since which time that spot of ground has been raised above eight feet.

At the West end of this burial ground, and east side of Moorfields, was a street of mean buildings, denominated Petty France, from its being originally inhabited by people of that nation. But this place, which about forty years ago was little better than a lay stall, is now covered with capital houses, inhabited by some of the most reputable citizens; and is called New Broad-street; at the south west angle of which is a Presbyterian meeting-house, and at the north east corner an independent meeting-house.

From this street we proceed to a place called Old Bethlehem, (or more commonly Old Bedlam) which was originally a priory, founded in the year 1247, by Simon Fitzory, alias Fitz-Mary, sheriff of London, for the support of a community of brothers and sisters that wore a star upon their outer garments; and dedicated to St. Mary of Bethlehem.

This priory, however, undergoing the fate of all other religious houses, was suppressed by king Henry VIII. and in the year 1546, the mayor and commonalty of London purchased the said priory from the crown; and it was by them converted into an hospital for the cure of lunatics, at a certain expence to be paid weekly by the relations or parish of the patient admitted. And at a court of aldermen held the seventh of April, 5 Edward 5 Edward VI. it was ordered, that the inhabitants within the precinct of Bethlehem should be from thenceforth united to the parish of St. Botolph without Bishopsgate, and to be allotted and charged to all officers and charges, tythes and clerks wages excepted.

This priory enclosed all the estate and ground, in length, from Bishopsgate-street east, to the great ditch in the west, which was called deep ditch, dividing the said lands from Moorfields, and in breadth, to the land of Ralph Downing, viz. Downing's-alley in the north, and to the land of the church of St. Botolph in the south.

The site and lands of this priory, after its dissolution, being disposed of to the citizens, it was immediately let out to divers tenants, and was built upon and divided into streets, alleys and courts, except a square piece of ground, consisting of about one acre, which is at the north east extremity of the lower Moorfields, commonly known by the name of Broker's-row, where formerly was the place called deep ditch.

In the year 1568, Sir Thomas Roe, merchant-taylor and Lord mayor of London, caused this ground to be inclosed with a brick wall, to be a common burial-ground, at a low rate, for such parishes in London, as wanted convenient burial places. He called it the New church-yard near Bethlehem, and established a sermon to be preached there on Whitsunday, annually; which, for many years, was honoured with the presence of the Lord-mayor and aldermen. This, however, has been for a considerable time discontinued, and the burial place shut up.

On the south side of this burial ground, opposite the street leading from Moorfields, is situate Devonshire square. On this spot originally was a large house built by the lord John Powlet; and near that a still more beautiful house, built by Jasper Fisher, a freeman of the Goldsmiths company, one of the six clerks in chancery, and a justice of peace. It was afterwards the earl of Oxford's house, and then earl of Devonshire's, whose name is still preserved in the street and square built upon its ruins. This house being so large and sumptuously built by a man of no great birth or fortune, (for he was much in debt) was mockingly called Fisher's Folly.

This is a neat but small square, surrounded with good houses, with rows of trees before them which are principally inhabited by wealthy merchants; and just without the east passage is a baptist meeting-house, and a quaker's meeting-house.

North east from this lies a spacious inclosure called the artillery-ground, let by the prior of St. Mary Spittal to the gunners of the Tower, for thrice ninety-nine years, for the use and practice of the great and small artillery. And they came hither every Thursday to exercise their large artillery; which moved his majesty king Henry VIII. to grant them a charter; and the same was confirmed in 1584, and was established, with additions, for the increasing of good gunners for the royal navy and forts. In both those charters this ground being nominated and ordered to be set apart for those uses, the artillery ground became subject to the Tower hamlets, and the inhabitants are still summoned on juries belonging to the court held on Tower-hill.

At the south east corner of Halfmoon-alley, on the west side of Bishopsgate-street, is a large and commodious brick building, called

The LONDON WORK-HOUSE.

This edifice was founded by act of parliament, in 1649, for the relief and employment of the poor, and the punishing vagrants and disorderly persons within the city and liberties of London. However, in the year 1662, the continual increase of the poor, and the defects in the laws relating to the settlement of them, occasioned another act, by which the governors were constituted a body corporate with a common seal; the Lord-mayor for the time being was appointed president, and the president and governors were allowed to purchase lands or tenements to the annual value of 300l. Besides, the common-council were empowered to rate the several wards, precincts, and parishes of this city, for the support of the said workhouse; as will more clearly appear from the following extract:

"Be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that it shall and may be lawful to and for the said president and governors of the said corporation for the time being, or any two of them, or to or for any person authorized and appointed by them, or any two of them, from time to time, to apprehend, or cause to be apprehended, any rogues, vagrants, sturdy beggars, or idle or disorderly persons, within the said city and liberties, places, divisions, and precincts, and to cause them to be kept and set to work in the several and respective corporations or workhouses.

"Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that if the president and governors of any of the said corporations shall certify, under their common seal, their want and defect, either of a present stock for the foundation of the work, or for supply thereof for the future, and what sum or sums of money they shall think fit for the same, to the common-council of the said city of London, that thereupon the common-council of the said city of London are hereby required, from time to time, to set down and ascertain such competent sum and sums of money for the purposes aforesaid, not exceeding one year's rate from time to time usually set upon any person, for or towards the relief of the poor, and the same to proportion out upon the several wards, precincts, and parishes, as they shall think fit: and thereupon the aldermen, deputies, and common-council-men of every ward in the city of London, shall have power and authority, and are hereby required, equally and indifferently, according to the proportions appointed, as aforesaid, for the several wards, precincts and parishes, as aforesaid, to tax and rate the several inhabitants within the said respective wards, precincts, and parishes, as well within the liberties as without, with which tax if any person or persons find him or themselves aggrieved, supposing the same to be

be unequal, he or they shall and may make their complaint known to the justices of the peace at the next open sessions, who shall take such final order therein, as in like case is already by the law provided.

“ And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it shall and may be lawful to and for any alderman of the city of London, or his deputy, by their warrant under their hands and seals, to authorize the churchwardens or overseers for the poor within the places and parishes aforesaid, to demand, gather, and receive of every person and persons such sum and sums of money, as shall be assessed upon them by virtue of the taxations and contributions aforesaid; and for default of payment within ten days after demand thereof made, or notice in writing left at the dwelling-house or lodging of every person so assessed, to levy the same by distress and sale of the goods of every such person, and after satisfaction made, to restore the surplussage to the party so distrained.

“ And it is further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That the respective president and governors, or any seven of them, shall have power from time to time to make and constitute orders and bye-laws for the better relieving, regulating, and setting the poor to work, and the apprehending and punishing of rogues, vagabonds, and beggars, within the city, liberties, and places aforesaid, that have not wherewith to maintain themselves, and for other matters aforesaid.

“ Provided the said orders and bye-laws shall from time to time be presented to the justices of the peace in their quarter sessions assembled, to be allowed by the major part of them, and confirmed by order of the said court.”

The several parishes, besides their assessments, formerly paid one shilling per week for parish children; but in 1751 the governors came to a resolution, that no more children paid for by the parishes to which they belong, should be taken into the house; and since that time it has been resolved, that only such children should be taken in, as were committed by the magistrates of the city, found begging in the streets, pilfering on the keys, or lying about in glass-houses and uninhabited places; the common receptacles of the wretched and the wicked.

These poor abandoned children are educated according to the usage of the church of England, and meet at six in the morning and evening in a large room, which serves them both for a chapel and dining room, where they hear prayers; they are taught the catechism; have a minister who attends upon them; and on Sundays they all go to church at Great St. Helen's. A part of the day is appropriated to their learning to read, write, and obtaining some knowledge of arithmetic; the rest of their time is spent in weaving nets for the British fishery; and the girls are employed in sewing, knitting, and other labour, by which they are qualified for service. The boys make twenty-five yards of netting per week; and, as an encouragement to industry, every boy who makes above twenty-four yards, receives a penny a week. There are here seldom less than four hundred children thus employed, all of whom are dressed in russet cloth, and wear a round badge upon their breasts, representing a poor boy and a sheep with the following motto: God's providence is our inheritance. These children thus saved from the miseries of vice and beggary, after being instructed and inured to labour, are put out apprentice; the boys to the sea service or to trades, and the girls to service in honest families.

It may not be altogether unpleasant to recite the speech of John Trusty, one of these poor boys, to her majesty queen Anne, upon her coming to dine at Guildhall, on Thursday the 29th of October 1702, the Lord-mayor's day.

“ May it please your most excellent majesty to pardon this great presumption in us poor children, who throw ourselves at your royal feet, among the rest of your glad subjects, that here in crouds appear to behold your sacred majesty.

“ We, madam, have no fathers, no mothers, no friends; or, which is next to none, those who, through their extreme poverty, cannot help us. God's providence is our inheritance, [pointing to the motto on his breast.] All the support we have is from the unexhausted charities of your loyal citizens of London, and others your good subjects, and the pious care of our governors, who are now teaching our little hands to work, and our fingers to spin.

“ These threads, madam, [holding out some yarn, which he had in his hand] are some of the early fruits of our industry. We are all daily employed in the staple manufacture of England, learning betimes to be useful to the world. And there seemed nothing wanting to compleat our happiness, but the opportunity which this day affords us, of being the objects of your tender pity and compassion. One gracious smile from your majesty on this new foundation will make us live—and live to call you blessed.

“ And may God Almighty long preserve your majesty, for the good of these your kingdoms, and your royal consort the prince. So pray we, your little children: and let all your people say, Amen.”

In another part of the house, called The Keeper's side, are kept beggars, vagrants, dissolute and abandoned sturdy fellows, who have no honest means of support; and the lewd women who are taken up in the streets. All these are kept to hard labour and employed in beating of hemp and washing of linen. All these are not only supported, but in case of sickness, broken limbs or wounds, have advice, physic and surgery gratis.

It is a large, strong and useful building, with three long rooms or galleries one over another, which are filled with boys and girls at work, who have a proper number of men and women to instruct them. They have likewise a large and convenient brewhouse for brewing their own drink, and and over that a malt house. In short, every thing is managed with the greatest prudence and economy.

Farther to the north is Lamb-alley; in which are two charitable foundations.

1. Alleyn's alms-houses for ten poor men and women, built and endowed with forty shillings per annum each, by the founder of Dulwich college, in 1614, in Petty France, now New Broad-street. And

2. Alms-houses for sixteen poor old women, built and endowed with two shillings and sixpence a month each, by one Mr. Underwood.

Both these charitable foundations were removed from their situation into Lamb-alley; where they are accommodated with new houses, at the expence of the parish, and builders of New Broad-street.

Returning again to the east side of Bishopsgate-street, we come to Spittal-square, and the site of the ancient priory and hospital of St. Mary Spittal, founded in the year 1197, by Sir Walter Brune, and Rossia his wife, for canons regular, and dedicated to the honour of Jesus Christ, and his mother the Blessed Virgin Mary.

This foundation was of very considerable extent; for in the composition made by the prior with the rector of St. Botolph's, concerning tythes, it appears to have begun at Berwards-lane, towards the south, and to run as far as the parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, to the north, in breadth: and from the king's street in the west, to the bishop of London's field, called Lallorfworth, (now Spittalsfield) on the east.

At the dissolution of this priory in the reign of Henry VIII. it was valued at 478l. per annum, and there were found in it 178 beds for the receipt of the poor.

On the spot where this hospital stood, and near adjoining, are now many handsome houses, inhabited by manufacturers, and merchants of great trade and worth.

A part of the large church-yard pertaining to this hospital, and severed from the rest by a brick wall, was for a long time remaining, with a pulpit cross therein, somewhat like to that in St. Paul's church-yard; and against the said pulpit, on the south side, before the charnel and chapel of St. Edmond the bishop, and St. Mary Magdalen (which chapel was founded about the year 1391) there was a handsome house of two stories high, for the mayor, aldermen, sheriffs, and other persons of distinction to sit in, to hear the sermons preached in the Easter holidays.

It was for a long time a custom, on Good Friday in the afternoon, for some learned man, by appointment of the prelates, to preach a sermon at Paul's cross, treating of Christ's passion; and upon the three next Easter holidays, Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, other learned men, by the like appointment, preached in the forenoon at the Spittal, to persuade the articles of Christ's resurrection. And then, on Low Sunday, before noon, another learned man, at Paul's Cross, was to make rehearsal of those four former sermons, either commending or reproving them, as to him, (by judgment of the learned divines) was thought convenient; after which he was to make a sermon himself. At these sermons, so severally preached, the mayor, with his brethren the aldermen, were accustomed to be present in their violets at St. Paul's on Good Friday, and in their scarlets, at the Spittal in the holidays, except Wednesday in violet, and the mayor, with his brethren, on Low Sunday, in scarlet, at Paul's cross.

This custom was kept up till the year 1642; but in the grand rebellion the pulpit was broken down, and the custom of preaching was discontinued. However, at the restoration, it was so far revived, that the Spittal sermons have been since preached every Easter at St. Bride's in Fleet-street, and honoured with the presence of the Lord-mayor, aldermen, &c.

We shall leave this ward at the south-east corner of Bishopsgate-street, next Cornhill, where are a row of spacious new buildings, which supply the place of those consumed by fire in the year 1765. Among these is one remarkably extensive and lofty, which was built at the expence of some principal merchants, who are proprietors thereof, as a tavern, and is called The London.

It is worthy of remark, that in clearing the rubbish to make way for these new buildings, there appeared the remains of an ancient church or chapel, which had long served for the uses of cellaring to the four houses that covered this relic of antiquity; but when, or by whom this old church was founded, we have no account. In taking the dimensions of it, the inside measured forty feet in length, and twenty-six feet and an inch in breadth. The length consisted of four arches; and the breadth of two isles: that towards the south being of nine feet three inches broad, and that on the north sixteen feet. The roof of this subterraneous monument was at that time only ten feet nine inches above the present floor, occasioned by the extensive raising of the ground in this part of the city. And if we may be allowed to form a conjecture upon a well grounded authority, that this was once a church dedicated to St. Andrew the apostle, super or at the top of Cornhill, which cannot be applied to St. Andrew's Undershaft, without many objections; and as there are no other remains of a church near the top of Cornhill, besides these ruins, it appears very probable that the premises here described are the remains of the church, which once stood at the top or above Cornhill, dedicated to St. Andrew the apostle, from which the other church at the corner of St. Mary-ax, dedicated to the same saint, was distinguished by the addition of Undershaft.

About twelve feet more to the north, and under the very house where the fire was supposed to have begun, there was another stone building, thirty feet long, fourteen feet broad, and eight feet six inches above the present floor, with a door on the north side, a window at the east end, and the appearance of another at the west end. This building was covered with a semicircular arch, made of small pieces of chalk in the form of bricks, and rubbed with stone, resembling the arches of a bridge: but this structure did not appear to have any connection or communication with the before-mentioned. Nor does any ancient history give us the least account thereof; nor of any religious or other remarkable foundation in this neighbourhood, serving to lead us to a discovery and explanation of so remarkable a building, buried by the streets of London.

OF BREADSTREET WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from the principal street therein, called Bread-street, where formerly was held the bread-market; as appears by records of the year 1302, when the bakers of London were obligated not to sell any bread in their shops or houses, but in open market.

Bread-street ward is encompassed on the north and north-west by the ward of Farringdon within; on the east by Cordwainer's ward; on the south by Queenhithe ward; and on the west by Castle Baynard ward. It begins in Cheapside on the north, and runs on the south side from where the standard, to where the cross formerly stood, then called Goldsmiths-row. It extends on the south in Watling-street up almost to the house next to St. Augustin's church on the north side; and on the south side, up to the Old Change; and down the same at the east side, by the west end of Maiden-lane, or Distaff-lane, to Knight-riders-street, or, as that part is called, Old Fish-street; and all the north side of the said street, till over against the Trinity church and Trinity-lane.

This ward is divided into thirteen precincts, and is governed by an alderman, twelve common-council-men, (of whom one is the alderman's deputy) thirteen constables, thirteen inquest-men, thirteen scavengers, and a beadle.

The principal streets and places in this ward are, Watling-street, Bread-street, Friday-street, Distaff-lane, Basing-lane, with the east side of the Old Change, from the corner of St. Austin's gate to Old Fish-street; and the north side of Old Fish-street and Trinity-lane, with part of the south side of Cheapside, betwixt Friday-street, and St. Mary-le-Bow church.

Bread-street is an open street, well built, and principally inhabited by hop-merchants and other great dealers; on the east side of which, at the corner next Watling-street, is situate the parish church of

ALLHALLOWS BREAD-STREET.

This church, which is a rectory, and a peculiar belonging to the archbishop of Canterbury, owes its name to its situation, and dedication to All Saints.

The advowson of this church was in the prior and canons of Christ's church in Canterbury till the year 1365, when, in return for the many favours conferred upon them by their archbishop, they, on the twenty-fourth of April, by a proper instrument under their common seal, did convey and assign the right of presentation to Simon archbishop of Canterbury, and his successors, in whom it still continues.

The old church being destroyed by the fire of London in 1666, the present edifice was erected in 1684, at the expence of the public; and serves not only for the accommodation of the inhabitants of its own parish, but likewise those of St. John the Evangelist's, who are thereunto annexed by act of parliament. This church consists of a plain body, with a square tower eighty-six feet high, divided into four stages with arches near the top. The inside is handsomely wainscoted and pewed, the pulpit finely carved, the sounding-board veneered, a neat gallery at the west end, and a spacious altar-piece well adorned and beautified. The vestry is general, and the officers are two church-wardens.

At this church are prayers every Thursday at five o'clock in the afternoon, from Michaelmas to Midsummer, and a sermon, the gift of Mr. Daniel Eliot. And on the twenty-fifth of July is another gift sermon in memory of the defeat of the Spanish armada.

The parish church of St. John the Evangelist burnt down in 1666; (and afterwards united to Allhallows) was a rectory, and stood on the east side of Friday-street, next Watling-street. It was founded about the same time as Allhallows, and was in the gift of the prior and chapter of Christ church, Canterbury, till they conveyed it, with the aforesaid church, to the archbishop of Canterbury.

The site of this church remains now only as a burial place for the inhabitants of this parish. The vestry is general, and they have two church-wardens. The two parishes united together produce the yearly value of 140l. in lieu of tythes.

On the same side of this street stands the parish church of

ST. MILDRED, BREADSTREET.

So denominated from its dedication to St. Mildred, a Saxon saint, who was abbess of a monastery in the Isle of Thanet, where she died in the year 676.

It is a rectory, founded by lord Trenchant of St. Albans, about the year 1300; but it had neither vestry-room nor church-yard till 1428, when Sir John Chadworth, or Shadworth, by his will gave a vestry and church-yard to the parishioners, and a parsonage house to the rector. After this church was burnt down in 1666, and rebuilt, it had the parish of St. Margaret Moles united to it.

The front of the present edifice is built of free-stone; the other parts of brick: the roof is covered vered with lead, and the floor paved with purplebeck stone. Within is a neat wainscot gallery at the west end, and the pulpit is enriched: the altar-piece is handsomely adorned; and the communion table stands upon a foot-piece of black and white marble, inclosed with rails and banisters.

The advowson of this church was anciently in the prior and canons of St. Mary Overies, Southwark, till Bartholomew, the prior, and convent, in the year 1533, granted the patronage thereof to John Oliver and others, for a certain term of years; after the expiration of which it came to Sir Nicholas Crispe, in whose family the gift is said still to remain. The vestry is general, and the parish officers are only two churchwardens.

The parish of St. Margaret Moses, which is annexed to St. Mildred, was a rectory, the church whereof stood at the south west corner of Pissing-alley (now Little Friday-street) opposite distaff-lane. It received its name from being dedicated to St. Margaret, virgin and martyr of Antioch in Pisidia; and takes the addition of Moses from one of that name who was a considerable benefactor or rebuildier thereof.

The patronage of this rectory appears to have been anciently in lay hands; for Robert Fitzwalter gave the same to the prior and canons of St. Faith's, at Horeham in the county of Norfolk; which being confirmed to them by a bull of pope Alexander III. in the year 1163, it continued in the said prior and canons till the suppression of their convent by Edward the third: when this church came to the crown, where it has ever since continued.

This church, which was burnt down in 1666, being annexed to St. Mildred's, the yearly value of both these rectories was settled by act of parliament at 130l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

One part of the site of this church was sold to the city for widening Pissing-alley, lying between Friday-street and Bread-street; and the money which arose from the sale thereof was applied towards the paving and beautifying the said church of St. Mildred; the other part now remaining is the burial place for the inhabitants of St. Margaret's parish.

The officers of this parish are two churchwardens; and the vestry is general.

The patronage of St. Mildred's being in the family of the Crisps, and that of St. Margaret's in the crown, they present to both livings alternately.

On the north side of Great Distaff-lane is a handsome brick building, consisting of several good rooms, called

CORDWAINERS HALL;

The principal room of which, is adorned with the pictures of king William and queen Mary.

This company was incorporated by letters patent granted by king Henry IV. in the year 1410, by the name of Cordwainers and Coblers, the latter of which names was then far from being a despicable term, as it signified not only a shoe-maker, but a dealer in shoes; and it does not appear that the word shoe-maker was then in use.

King Richard II. marrying the daughter of Wenceslaus king of Bohemia, the English by her example wore long peaked shoes tied to their knees with silk laces, or silver chains gilt. This preposterous fashion occasioned the passing of an act of parliament, in the reign of Edward IV. in which it was enacted, that no cordwainer or cobbler within the city of London, or three miles of it, should make any shoes, galoshes or huseans; that is, boots or buskins, with any pyke, or poleyn, exceeding the length of two inches, to be adjudged by the wardens or governors of the same mystery in London; nor should they presume to sell, or put upon the legs or feet of any person, any shoes, boots, or buskins, on Sundays, or on the feasts of the nativity and ascension of our Lord, or on Corpus Christi day, on the penalty of paying twenty shillings for each offence. See page 131.

This company, by a late charter, is stiled, "The master, wardens and commonalty of the mystery of cordwainers, of the city of London." They are governed by a master, four wardens, and a court of assistants. It is a livery company, and the twenty seventh on the city list.

On the west side of Bread-street formerly stood a prison-house belonging to the sheriffs of London, called the compter. But in the year 1558 the prisoners were removed from thence to another new compter in Wood-street; provided by the city's purchase, and built for that purpose. The cause of this prison being removed may be seen in page 203.

On the south side of Basing-lane is situate

GERARD'S-HALL-IN N.

This building has stood many generations in great repute, for its accommodations and good entertainment, both for man and horse, and for all kinds of carriages. It is built upon the remains of the mansion-house of the ancient family of Gisors, some of whom, for many ages, filled, and with dignity and honour served, the chief offices in the magistracy of this city. In those days it was called Gisor's hall. John Gisor, mayor of London, was owner of it in 1245, and by descent it came to another of the same name in 1386, who made a scoffment of it. From which we are to look upon the present appellation of Gerard's-hall to be no other than a corruption of Gerard for Gisor, and Gerard's-hall for Gisor's hall; without having recourse to the fabulous tradition which was swallowed by our credulous ancestors, who were weak enough to believe that this was the habitation of Gerard, a giant, who used a poll in the wars forty feet long, and fifteen inches round; and whose skull being found would hold five pecks; and his thigh bone was six feet long, and one of his teeth weighed ten pounds troy: without considering that a person of such prodigious dimensions could not possibly inhabit a house or hall of the size this appears to have been by its remains, which are still to be seen in the arched vaults, supported by sixteen pillars, built of stone brought from Caen in Normandy, and are now used for cellars, being entirely under the floor of the building.

Before

Before we leave this ward, we shall take notice of a most beautiful set of houses and shops which were, in ancient times, situate between Bread-street end, and the cross in Cheap, at that time called Goldsmith's Row. This row of houses was built by Thomas Wood, goldsmith, one of the sheriffs of London in the year 1491. It contained in number ten dwelling houses and fourteen shops, all in one frame, uniformly built four stories high, beautified towards the street with the goldsmiths arms, and the likeness of woodmen, in memory of his name, riding on monstrous beasts; all which were cast in lead, richly painted over and gilt. These he gave to the goldsmiths, with a stock of money to young men who inhabited these shops. This said front was again new painted and gilt over in the year 1593, Sir Richard Martin being then mayor.

The goldsmiths originally kept their shops and trade in West-cheap, even before the days of king Edward III. to the time of king Charles I. And the Exchange for the king's coin was not far off the place now called the Old Change, as appears by record, which not only shews the place of the goldsmiths habitation, but their occupation and business about the coin and plate.

CHAPTER VII.

Of BRIDGE-WARD Within and BROAD-STREET Ward.

BRIDGE Ward within derives its name from its connection with London-bridge; for it begins at the end next Southwark, from whence it reacheth direct north up Gracechurch-street, as far as the corner of Lombard-street and Fenchurch-street, including all the bridge, the greatest part of all the alleys and courts on the east side, and on the west side all the alleys, courts and lanes in Thames-street on both sides to New key, part of Michael's-lane, and part of Crooked-lane.

It is encompassed on the south by Southwark and the river Thames; on the east by Billingsgate ward; on the north by Langbourn ward; and on the west by Candlewick and Dowgate wards.

The government of this ward is an alderman, fifteen common-council-men, (of whom one is the alderman's deputy) fourteen constables, fifteen inquest-men, fourteen scavengers and a beadle.

London bridge, which is the first principal place in this ward, the reader will find particularly described (from its origin to its present situation) in pages 29—34.

At the north end of this bridge, under the four arches, are fixed the works of a water company, who, from this situation, are called the company of the London-bridge water-works. It was originally the invention of Peter Maurice, a Dutchman, in 1582, to supply the city with water from the Thames through wooden pipes. (See page 207) This invention has, by many improvements, arrived to such perfection, under the direction of that great master the late Mr. Hadley, that these works, in their present condition, are said to be superior to the most famed water-engine at Marli in France, which costs 25000*l.* sterling per annum, to keep it in repair.

The wheels placed, under the arches, are moved by the common stream of the tide water of the river Thames. One turn of the four wheels makes 114 strokes; and, when the river is at best, the wheels go six times round in a minute; and but four and a half at middle water; so that the number of strokes in a minute are 684. And as the stroke is two feet and a half in a seven inch-bore, which raises three ale gallons, they raise 2052 gallons in a minute; that is, 123,120 gallons, or 1954 hogheads in an hour; which is at the rate of 46,896 hogheads per day, to the height of 120 feet, including the waste, which may be computed at a fifth part of the whole. The wheels force the water to a basin on the top of a high tower of wood, which stands on the sterling of the first arch on the north west end of the bridge; by which means the water is raised to any part of the city. A farther addition has been lately made to these water-works on the south-west side of the bridge.

Exclusive of the improvements made to London bridge, the narrow entrance on the north side is made as wide as the bridge, by pulling down all the houses on the west side of the street as far as Thames-street, and throwing the new buildings backwards; and on the east side a footway is made under the steeple or tower of the church of

St. M A G N U S.

This church, which is a rectory, situate at the north-east corner of London-bridge, owes its name to its dedication to St. Magnus, who suffered martyrdom under the emperor Aurelian, in the city of Cæsarea, for his steadfast adherence to the christian religion.

The patronage of this church was anciently in the abbots and convents of Westminster and Bermondsey, who presented alternately, till the general suppression of monasteries; when coming to the crown, queen Mary, by her letters patent, A. D. 1553, granted the same to the bishop of London, and his successors, in whom it still remains.

The old church suffered the like fate with others in the general conflagration in 1666; and when rebuilt, was made the parochial church for this and the parish of St. Margaret, New Fish-street, street, which is annexed to it by act of parliament. The body of the present structure was built in the year 1676, but the steeple was not added till several years after.

It is a spacious and massy stone building; plain, and yet well ornamented. The corners have rustic quoins, and the body is enlightened by tall arched windows, over each of which is a cornice supported by scrolls, and between these is a cherub over the center of each window. At the west end coupled pilasters rise on each side the door, from a plain course, and support a pediment. The door on the northside is also placed under a pediment, but without the particular decorations of the other. Over each door is an oval window, and the last is decorated with festoons. The roof is hid by a kind of attic course, from which the tower rises square and plain; and from this the dial, which is very richly ornamented, projects over the street. The course above this is adorned at the corners with coupled pilasters of the Ionic order, supporting an open work in the place of a balustrade, with large urns at the corners of an uncommon shape. From within this open work rises the lantern, which has also Ionic pilasters, and arched windows in all the intercolumniations. The dome rests upon these pilasters, and on its crown is placed a piece of open work like that which surrounds the base of the lantern. On this is raised the turret which supports the spire.

The vestry is select, and consists of thirty-three members; and the officers are, two churchwardens, one of whom is collector for the poor. In this church is a peal of ten bells.

Before the fire of London the parochial church of St. Margaret was situate on the east side of Fish-street-hill (so called from the number of fishmongers which formerly inhabited this street; but now there is only one of that trade, or two at the most) on the spot where the monument now stands, and dedicated to Margaret, a virgin, who was beheaded for the christian faith under the emperor Decius.

The patronage of this rectory appears to have been in the abbot, and convent, and bishop of Winchester, till queen Mary, by her letters patent, in the year 1553, granted the same to the bishop of London, and his successors, in whom it still continues.

The vestry is general; and the parish officers are two churchwardens.

This parish being annexed to St. Magnus, the two are valued together at 170l. in lieu of tythes.

On the site of St. Margaret's church now stands the monument, which the reader will see fully described in page 253-4

At the south west corner of Fenchurch-street is situate the parochial church of

St. BENNETS GRASS-CHURCH,

So called from its dedication to St. Benedict, and its vicinity to the grass or herb market, which was anciently kept before the west door of this church.

It is a rectory, and in the gift of the canons of St. Paul's, London, in the year 1181, in whom the patronage still continues.

The old church, being much damaged by the fire in 1666, was taken down, and the present structure erected in its place, which is built principally of stone, and is a regular, convenient and neat edifice, without the expence of columns and porticos. It has a handsome balustrade at the top, and a very high spire of the obelisk kind, the base of which is supported by four porticos. The inside is well wainscoted and handsomely pewed; the pulpit well veneered, carved, and adorned with cherubs, &c. Here is a Sunday's afternoon lecture, with an endowment of forty pounds per annum, founded by Mrs. Joan Newton.

The vestry is select; and the officers of the parish are, only two churchwardens.

This church not only accommodates its own inhabitants, but likewise those of the parish of St. Leonard, Eastcheap, which is annexed to it; and both together are of the yearly value of 140l. in lieu of tythes.

The church of St. Leonard Eastcheap was burnt down in 1666, and never rebuilt. It was dedicated to one Leonard, a french saint, and bishop of Limoges, and was some time named St. Leonard Milk-church, from William Malher, the builder thereof.

The patronage of this rectory, which was anciently in the prior and convent of Canterbury, is at present in the dean and chapter of that see. The site of it remains now only a burial place for the inhabitants of this parish, whose vestry is select, and has no more officers than two churchwardens.

Some little way from the bridge, on the west side of this ward, opposite the Thames, stands

FISHMONGERS HALL.

The front entrance to this hall is from Thames-street, by a handsome passage, that leads into a large square court, paved with flat stones, and encompassed by the great hall, the court room for the assistants, and other grand apartments, with galleries. These are of an handsome construction, and are supported by Ionic columns, with an arcade. The back front, or that next the Thames, has a grand double flight of stone steps, which lead to the first apartments from the wharf. The door is adorned with Ionic columns, and these support an open pediment, in which is a shield, with the arms of the company. The windows are ornamented with stone cases, and the quoins of the building are wrought with a handsome rustic. Within is the statue of Sir William Wallworth, knight, fishmonger, who, when he was Lord-mayor, slew Wat Tyler. (See page 85.)

The company of fishmongers, as well as other persons concerned in furnishing the city with provisions, were anciently under the immediate direction of the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, to whom this power was confirmed by an act of parliament in the seventh of Richard II. in the year 1384. At that time the dealers of fish consisted of two communities, viz. the stock fishmongers and salt fishmongers; and both of them no less than six halls; two in Thames-street, two in New Fish-street, and two in Old Fish-street; and were in such reputation for valuable members, that six Lord-mayors were chosen out of them in twenty-four years.

The salt fishmongers were incorporated in the year 1433, but the stock fishmongers not till 1509. This separation, however, proving prejudicial to both, they united, and obtained a charter from king Henry VIII. in 1536, by which they were incorporated by the name of "the wardens and commonalty of the mystery of fishmongers of the city of London."

This is one of the twelve principal companies; and is governed by a prime, five other wardens, and a court of assistants. It is a livery company, and the fourth on the list of the city corporation.

OF BROAD-STREET WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from that part of it called Old Broad-street, which before the fire of London, was accounted one of the broadest streets in the city.

It is bounded on the north and east by Bishopsgate-ward, on the south by Cornhill-ward and Wallbrook-ward, and on the west by Coleman-street ward: and extends from the east corner of Helmet or Cross keys court in Wormwood-street in the north east, to the iron grate over the common sewer, near the backgate of Bethlehem-hospital, in the north west; and from the east corner of Allhallows church, where New Broad-street begins, in the north, to the iron grate over the common sewer, under the east end of St. Margaret's church in Lothbury, in the south west, and up pig-street, to the pump facing St. Bennet Fink's church in the south; and from the pump near the north east corner of St. Martin Outwich's church-wall in Bishopsgate-street, in the south east, to scalding-alley in the Poultry, which is the south-west extremity, including Threadneedle-street, both sides; Bartholomew-lane; Princes-street, almost as far as Catharine-court on the east side; both sides of Lothbury, from the grate eastward; Throgmorton-street, Pig-street, and Broad-street, both sides; Winchester-street, Augustine-friars, and Wormwood-street, as far as Helmet-court in the east; and so much of London-wall as extends from the north west corner of Old Broad-street to the grate near Bethlehem back-gate, with the alleys and courts on the south side, as far as Swan-alley in Little Bell-alley, Coleman-street parish.

This ward is governed by an alderman, ten common-council-men, (one of whom is the alderman's deputy) ten constables, thirteen inquest men, eight scavengers, and a beadle; and is divided into ten precincts.

We shall begin the survey of this ward in that street which gave rise to its name, viz. Old Broad-street; on the east side of which stood a set of alms-houses, founded by Sir Thomas Gresham in the year 1575, for eight decayed poor men, citizens of London, which Sir Thomas endowed with six pound, thirteen shillings and four pence per annum for each person, to be paid quarterly out of the chamber of London; a load of coals every year, and a gown once in two years. And the Lord-mayor and commonalty of London were empowered to execute the said trust. These houses however have been lately taken down to make way for the new excise office.

On the west-side of this street, nearly opposite the back entrance of the South sea-house, is situate the parish of ### St. PETER LE POOR.

We cannot minutely account for the origin of this church; but that it is of ancient foundation is manifest from the state thereof in 1181. It was dedicated to St. Peter, the apostle, and distinguished from other churches of that name, by the addition of le Poor, either from the builder's name, or the poor state of the parish at the time of its foundation.

This church, which escaped the general conflagration in 1666, is supposed to have been rebuilt in the year 1540. And in 1615 it was enlarged with the left wing, at the sole expence of Sir William Garway, Knt. who expended 400l. in the improvement for the convenience of the parishioners. After which the parishioners, being animated by this generous act, repaired and beautified the whole church, new built the steeple and a good gallery at the west end, and new cast and hung the bells, at the charge of 1587l.

It is a gothic structure, but mean in itself; and made more so by its untoward situation: one of its corners being thrust as it were into the street, makes the street narrow, obstructs the passage, and destroys the vista. It is of very considerable breadth in proportion to its length, viz. fifty four feet long, and fifty-one broad; the height to the roof is no more than twenty-three feet, and the height of the tower and turret together seventy-five feet. The body is plain and unornamented; the windows are very large; and the dial is fixed to a beam, that is joined at one end to a kind of turret, and extends across the street like a country sign post. The tower rises square, without diminution, is strengthened at the corners with rustic; and upon this is placed a turret, which consists of strong piers at the corners arched over, and covered with an open dome; whence rises a ball, with a fane.

The advowson of this church, which is a rectory, appears to have been all along in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's. The tythes at present amount to about 130l. a year; and the other profits by annual annual donations settled upon the rector, are supposed to amount to near as much more.

The vestry is general, and the parish officers are, six auditors of accounts, two churchwardens and two sidersmen.

A little to the north of this church is a street known by the name of Austin-friars. On which spot was a priory dedicated to St. Augustin, bishop of Hippo in Africa, and founded for the Friars Eremites, of that order, in the year 1253, by Humphrey Bohun, earl of Hereford and Essex. These eremites or friars, were of the mendicant sort, and continued in the possession of the place till its dissolution by king Henry VIII. who granted a great part of it to William Pawlet, lord St. John, afterwards marquis of Winchester; since which time the greatest part has been pulled down, and many houses built; but a part of the old church belonging to the priory is still remaining. King Edward VI. granted all the church, except the choir, to a congregation of Germans, and other strangers, who fled hither for the sake of religion, ordered it to be called the Temple of the Lord Jesus; and several successive princes have confirmed it to the Dutch, by whom it is still used as a place of divine worship.

It is a large and spacious Gothic edifice, supported by two rows of stone pillars. At the east end are several steps, which lead to a large platform, on which is placed a long table with seats against the wall, and forms round, for the use of the holy communion, and the windows on one side have painted on them in several places, the word Jesus Temple. On the west end over the screen is a library thus inscribed, Ecclesia Londino Belgica, Bibliotheca, extructa sumptibus Mariae Dubois 1659. It contains several valuable manuscripts, among which are the letters of Calvin, Peter Martyr, and other foreign reformers.

This church is now called the Dutch church in Austin Friars; and is served by two ministers, who preach twice every Sunday, and once in the week. They administer the sacrament on the last Sunday of every month; and exchange churches every first Sunday in the month with the Walloon congregation, for their administration of the Eucharist, their own church in Threadneedle-street being too small for them. The ministers have good salaries, and the church provides a sufficient subsistence for their widows.

In 1704 this Dutch congregation in Augustin-friars, built at their common charge, in Middle Moorfields, a handsome alms-house, containing twenty-six rooms, for maintaining their poor men or women, and a room for the elders and deacons of their church to meet weekly upon business, and to pay the alms people, who receive more or less, as their necessities may require. The whole charge of their poor is computed at 1200l. per annum, part of which is collected after sermon every Sunday, &c. at the church door.

A little to the east of Bethlehem hospital is situate the parochial church of

ALLHALLOWS, LONDON-WALL.

It does not sufficiently appear when this church was founded; but we have reason to suppose it was some time after the foundation of the priory of the Holy Trinity near Aldgate, in whose patronage this church was originally, and who presented Thomas Richer de Sanston thereunto in the year 1335. At the dissolution of their religious houses under king Henry VIII. this church was, with the priory, unto which it belonged, surrendered to the crown, in whom the advowson still remains, the lord-chancellor or lord-keeper, for the time being, presenting thereunto.

The old church escaped the fire of London in 1666; but was become so ruinous, that in 1765 the parishioners obtained an act of parliament to empower them to pull it down, together with the parsonage-house, and to enable them to raise money by annuities to rebuild the same. This church, which has been finished some time, is built with brick and stone; and though plain, yet is very neat. It is somewhat longer than the old church, and the parsonage house is built at the north east corner of the church-yard.

The produce of this living is computed to be about 150l. per annum. The vestry is select, and formed of such as have served or fined for churchwardens and constables. And the parish officers are two churchwardens, two overseers of the poor, and two sidersmen.

In a court on the south side of the street called London Wall, nearly opposite the east end of Bethlehem hospital, is situate.

CARPENTERS HALL.

This building, though very old, and composed of timber and plaister, is not without its beauty and peculiar ornaments; and it enjoys an agreeable prospect into drapers gardens, which lie towards the south.

This fraternity, which is very ancient, was incorporated by king Edward III. in the year 1344, with power to make by-laws. It is now governed by a master, three wardens, and a court of assistants; and has a livery.

At the south east corner of Great Winchester-street is

PINNERS OR PINMAKERS HALL.

This hall is principally used as a meeting-house for independents and anabaptists; and is the only meeting-house in London where the audience are not Calvinists. The independents meet on the Sunday morning; and the anabaptists on the Sunday afternoon.

This company was incorporated by king Charles I. in the year 1636; and are governed by a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants: but have not a livery.

This end of Winchester-street leads us into Old Broad-street, and terminates on the north side with

THE PAY OFFICE.

This office, whose front is in Old Broad-street, is kept in a large house, part of the remains of the marquis of Winchester's mansion-house, called Winchester-

Winchester-place. It is under the direction of a treasurer and paymaster, who pay for all the stores used in the royal navy, and the wages of those that sail in his majesty's service. The treasurer's salary is 2000*l.* per annum; and the paymaster, who is also accomptant, has 500*l.* a year: under this last are eight clerks who attend the payment of wages; three who have eighty pounds a year; and five who have forty pounds a year each; besides two extra clerks who have each 50*l.* a year. There are also five clerks for paying bills in course, and writing ledgers, viz. three who have eighty pounds a year; and two who have only forty pounds a year each; besides an extra clerk who has 50*l.* a year.

In this office there is likewise a cashier of the victualling, who has a salary of 150*l.* per annum, and has three clerks under him; one of 70*l.* one of 50*l.* and one of 40*l.* a year.

Not far from this is Wormwood-street, in which are a set of alms-houses for twelve poor women, founded by Mr. Kemp, and endowed with one shilling per week, with other perquisites.

From this street we return back to Throgmorton-street, on the north side of which is situate

DRAPERS HALL.

This is a spacious and noble edifice, built upon the ruins of a palace erected on that spot by Thomas lord Cromwell in the reign of king Henry VIII: which, being forfeited to the crown by his attainder and execution for high treason, was purchased by the company of drapers, who converted it into a hall for transacting the business of their corporation: and that building being destroyed in the fire of London, the drapers company built the present hall, which is a most elegant building, composing the four sides of a quadrangle, each of which is elevated on columns, and adorned with arches, formed in a piazza round a square court; and between each arch is a shield mantling and other fretwork. On the east side is the common-hall, to which you ascend by a grand stair-case; and within it is adorned with a stately screen and fine wainscot. On the screen between the two doors, hangs the picture, a three quarters length of Henry Fitz-Alwyn, a draper, and the first Lord-mayor of London. At the north end of this room are the pictures, at full length, and as big as life, of king William III. king George I. and king George II, in their royal robes.

At the north west angle of this room a door opens into another called the court room, richly wainscoted and furnished; at the east end of which hangs an original picture of Mary queen of Scots, at full length, with her infant son, king James I. in her hand. From this court room another door, at the west end, opens into a large gallery, at the north end of which a folding sash-door opens into a ground square room called the ladies chamber; in which, formerly, the company treated their wives and friends with a ball. In the center of this room hangs a large and beautiful chandelier of cut glass, presented to the company by Sir Joseph Eyles, knt. and over the chimney is a fine picture of Sir Robert Clayton, knt. sometime Lord-mayor of London. The south end of this gallery leads into the apartments allotted to the clerk, which are very commodious and elegant, with offices below for the transacting of business. And these apartments, with the accommodation for the upper porter, fill up the whole front of this noble building.

At the north-west angle of this quadrangle there is a paved passage to the gardens belonging to this hall. Over this passage, upon an arch built of brick and stone, is a strong room, covered with a large back or cistern of water. This is the record room, where the company keep their writings, books, and papers; and their plate, which for quantity and workmanship, is said to exceed all the services of plate in other companies. The gardens, which are pleasant and commodious, are open every day except Sundays and wet days, for the recreation of all persons decently dressed. The ground which they occupy is very near upon a square: the middle is inclosed with iron rails, and laid out in grass beds, gravel walks and borders of flowers; with a statue of Flora in the center. Without the rails are fine spacious walks, kept in good order, and agreeably shaded with rows of lime trees. At the south west corner is a very handsome pavilion for the accommodation of company in hot weather, when tired with walking: and near the north east angle is a very commodious house for the use of the upper beadle of the company. The north side lies open to carpenters hall; and at the south east angle there is a privy garden, inclosed with walls; on the south side of which, under the ladies chamber, is a private room elegantly furnished, where the managers, or ruling part of the company, hold their secret committees, or previous meetings, before matters are represented to a general court.

This company was an ancient society or guild, devoted and dedicated to the Virgin Mary; and was incorporated by letters patent of Henry VI. A. D. 1439, by the stile and title of "the master, wardens, brethren and sisters of the guild or fraternity of the Blessed Mary the Virgin, of the mystery of drapers of the city of London."

This is the third of the twelve principal companies, and is governed by a master, four wardens and a court of assistants. They have very large estates, and pay to charitable uses about four thousand pounds per annum.

Near the south end of Princes-street, on the north side of Threadneedle-street, is situate the parochial church of #### St. CHRISTOPHER.

This church, which is a rectory, was founded by the noble family of the Nevils about the year 1368, and dedicated to St. Christopher, a convert from paganism, and martyr for the christian faith under Decius the emperor. It was rebuilt of stone in 1506 in its present form, except the inside, which was entirely consumed by the fire in 1666. The body is well enlightened, and the tower is crowned with four handsome pinnacles.

The patronage of this church has been in the bishop

Engraved for Chamberlain's History of London

*ST. CHRISTOPHER'S Church, The BANK of England & ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S Church

bishop of London for upwards of three hundred years; and the rector besides other advantages, receives 120l. a year in lieu of tithes.

Here are two pious foundations: one by Mr. John Kendrick, citizen and draper, who left lands to the drapers company to pay 20l. per annum for ever to the curate of this church, to read divine service in the said parish-church at six o'clock in the morning every day in the week, except Sundays; with fifty shillings per annum to the clerk; the like to the sexton; and five pounds to the churchwardens yearly for ever, for the support of lights in the winter. The other was founded by Mr. Benedict Harlewing, who gave certain houses in Fleet-street to this parish, on condition they should pay, out of their rent 20l. per annum to the curate, for reading prayers every day in the week, Sundays excepted, at six o'clock in the evening.

The vestry is general, and the parish officers are, two churchwardens and overseers, and two sidesmen.

A little to the east of this church stands

The BANK of ENGLAND.

This is a stone building, the front of which next Threadneedle street is about eighty-feet in length, of the Ionic order, raised on a rustic basement, in a good stile. Through this front is a grand gate that opens into the court yard, and leads into the great hall. This is of the Corinthian order, with a pediment in the middle. The top of the building is adorned with a balustrade and handsome vases, and in the face of the above pediment is engraved in relieve the company's seal, viz. Britannia sitting with her shield and spear, and at her feet a cornucopia pouring out fruit. The hall within this building is seventy-nine feet long, and forty feet broad, wainscoted about eight feet high, with a fine fretwork ceiling, and is adorned with the statue of king William III. in a nich at the upper end. On the pedestal of the statue is a latin inscription, the translation of which the reader will find in page 297.

Behind this is another quadrangle, with an arcade on the east and west sides thereof: and on the north side is the accomptant's office, which is sixty feet long and twenty-eight feet broad. Over this and the other sides of the quadrangle are handsome apartments, with a fine stair-case, adorned with fretwork; and under it are large vaults, with strong walls and iron gates, for the preservation of the cash.

Very considerable additions having been lately made to this noble edifice, and a new street is opened before it, which shews the front to great advantage. This street which leads from the bank gate into Cornhill, consists of no more than one large building on each side, made of brick and stone, and uniform, to serve for public offices. The old offices next St. Bartholomew-lane have been taken down, and new ones erected in their stead; as have likewise all the houses from the east side of the bank, now built to Bartholomew-lane, and down that lane within fifty feet of Lothbury. In short such extensive improvements have been already made, and others still intended, that when finished it will in all probability be the most magnificent building of a public nature in the whole universe.

The bank was established by act of parliament in the year 1693, under the name of "the governor and company of the Bank of England," in consideration of 1,200,000l. lent to the government by the subscribers, at the rate of eight per cent.

This company is now under the direction of a governor, deputy governor, and twenty four directors, who are annually elected at a general court by ballot. Thirteen make a court of directors for managing the affairs of the company. And if the governor and deputy governor should be absent two hours after the usual time of proceeding to business, the directors may chuse a chairman by majority; all whose acts are equally valid, as if the governor and deputy governor had been present.

The privileges of this bank are,

1. Their sealed notes were by law made transferable by indorsement.
2. They have power to purchase lands, (except those of the crown) and to receive goods as a security for money lent, to buy gold or silver bullion, and to sell goods, &c. forfeited to them.
3. Their stock shall not be taxable in any case.
4. They may negotiate bills of exchange, and receive or take them for other bills or cash.
5. The government was to give them a year's notice upon paying them back their 1,200,000l.
6. To counterfeit their notes was made felony.
7. No person dealing in this stock could be a bankrupt thereby, nor the stock liable to foreign attachment.
8. During the continuance of this bank, the time for which was enlarged, no other bank shall be erected by parliamentary authority.

The transfer days of the Bank have been various times altered, but at present they are as follows:

Bank Stock—Tuesday, Thursday and Friday.
 4 per cent. consolidated annuities—Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday.
 3 per cent. consolidated } ditto
 3 per cent reduced }
 3 per cent. 1726—Wednesday and Saturday.
 3½ per cent. 1756—Tuesday and Thursday.
 3½ per cent. 1758—Monday, Wednesday and Friday.
 Long annuities—Wednesday and Saturday.

The hours of transfer are from eleven to one; and the hours of payment of dividends from nine to eleven, and one to three, except on the following holidays, which are equally observed at all other public offices.

This account is taken from a correct copy at the Bank, in the month of October, 1769.

At the south east corner of St. Bartholomew-lane, stands the parish church of St. BARTHOLOMEW, Exchange.

So called from its dedication to St. Bartholomew the Apostle, and its situation near the Royal-Exchange.

This church is of great antiquity; for it was founded before the year 1231, when John de Tyerne was presented to the living, on the death of John de Aldeburgh, the rector; and, it was become so decayed in 1438, as to require rebuilding.

The old church being consumed in the general conflagration in 1666, the present structure arose in its place, and consists of a very irregular body, with a tower crowned with arches, supported by columns of the Corinthian order.

The living, at the time of the reformation, being in the gift of the abbey of St. Mary of Grace, fell, with the dissolution of that religious house, into the hands of the crown, in whom it has continued to the present time. The value of the living, as settled by act of parliament, in lieu of tythes, is no more than 100l. per annum: but the value of the glebe, &c. is computed at 300l. more.

The vestry is general, and the parish officers are, two church-wardens, and five auditors of accounts, besides the common-council-men.

Here is founded a Tuesday's lecture, endowed at 70l. per annum, paid by the company of haberdashers. One upon Wednesdays, at 20l. per annum, paid by the church-wardens for the parish. Another upon Fridays, at 25l. only for three quarters of a year, paid by the mercer's company. Another at 12l. per annum, on the last Saturday of every month, paid also by the mercers; besides the donation of James Wilford, sheriff, in 1499, who appointed by his will, a doctor of divinity, every Good-Friday, for ever, to preach a sermon in the evening at this church, on the passion of our Saviour.

A little eastward from the Royal Exchange, on the south-side of Threadneedle-street, is situate the church of

St. BENNET FINK.

This is a curacy, and so denominated from its dedication to St. Benedict, an Italian saint, and founder of the order of Benedictine monks; and it received the addition of Fink from its re-builder, Robert Fink. It is of ancient foundation, and was originally a rectory, John de Anefty being collated rector thereof before the year 1323. The patronage of this church, which was anciently in the family of the Nevils, falling to the crown, king Edward IV. gave it to the dean and chapter of Windsor; and the impropriation being in the said dean and chapter, it is supplied by one of the canons of Windsor, or such as they shall appoint, to be licensed by the bishop of London.

The old church being destroyed by the fire in 1666, the present structure was erected in 1673. The body is of an irregular form, enlightened by large arched windows, which reach to the roof. This is encompassed with a balustrade, and crowned with a lanthorn: a dome rises upon the whole extent of the tower, and on its top rises a turret.

The church-yard was given for a free burial-place, without any charge to the parishioners who use it. The vestry is general, and the parish officers are, two church-wardens, and thirteen auditors of accounts.

The curacy is rated by act of parliament, at 100l. in lieu of tythes; besides which, there is a considerable glebe worth near 100l. per annum more.

Near the south-side of Pig-street, on the north-side of Threadneedle-street, stands the French and Walloon protestant church, founded upon the ruins of the hospital of St. Anthony*, which had

* Among other accounts of this hospital, a former writer says, he could remember, that the overseers of the markets in this city, would take a starved pig from the market people, and having slit its ear, would give it to this hospital; and that the

had been a Jew synagogue, built about the year 1231, and converted into a church, dedicated to the Virgin Mary. This hospital flourished, raised a large free-school, and built alms-houses at the west-end of the church for poor men. Its demolition is attributed to one Johnson, a school-master, who becoming a prebendary of Windsor, first dissolved the choir, then conveyed away the plate and ornaments, then the bells; and lastly, turned the poor out of the alms-houses, let out the premises for rent, and the church for a place of worship to the French protestants, who hold it of the dean and chapter of Windsor to this day. They perform divine service in the French tongue, after the manner of the church of England.

The old building being entirely destroyed by the fire of London, the present church was erected, at the sole expence of the French protestants. It is a small, but neat place of worship, with a convenient vestry at the south-east corner. They have alms-houses, containing apartments for forty-five poor men and women, who are allowed two shillings and threepence, and a bushel of coals every week, and apparel every other year. They maintain their own poor, and their church is governed by a minister, elders and deacons.

At the south-east corner of Threadneedle-street, is a spacious building, called

MERCHANT-TAYLORS HALL.

In the front of this hall, is a large handsome door-case, adorned with two demi-columns, whose entablature and pediment are of the Composite order. The inside is furnished with tapestry, containing the history of their patron, John Baptist, and tho' these hangings are old, they are curious and valuable. The great hall is so capacious, that it is better adapted for the reception of numerous assemblies, than any other in the city, and is generally used for such purposes.

This company, antiently denominated "Taylors and Linen Armorers," was incorporated by letters patent, of the 5th of Edward IV. in the year 1466: but many of the members of the company, being great merchants, and Henry VII. a member thereof, he, by letters patent, of the 18th of his reign, A. D. 1503, re-incorporated the same, by the name of "The master and wardens of the Merchant-Taylors, of the fraternity of St. John the Baptist, in the city of London." They are governed by a master, four wardens, and a court of assistants. Their livery is very numerous, and their estates are very considerable; out of which they pay to charitable uses, pursuant to the wills of the respective donors, about two thousand pounds per annum.

At the south-east angle of Threadneedle-street, and partly in Bishopsgate-street, is situate the parochial church of

St. MARTIN'S OUTWICH.

This church was dedicated to St. Martin, bishop of Tours in France, about the year 376, and receives the addition of Outwich from two brothers of that name, who were some time proprietors thereof. The earl of Surry presented to the living in the year 1325: but he dying without issue, and leaving his estates to the crown, the advowson was purchased in 1387 by William and John Otewich, who, by licence of king Henry IV. in the sixth year of his reign, gave the advowson of this church, four messuages, and seventeen shops, with the appurtenances, in the said parish, to the master and wardens of the taylors and linen-armorers (now the company of Merchant Taylors) and to their successors, in perpetual alms, to be employed for the help and relief of the poor brethren and sisters of the said company; by virtue of which grant the Merchant-Taylors have the right of patronage. The additional epithet of Otewich or Outwich, might, in all probability, have been given by the above company, in grateful commemoration of their great and generous benefactors.

This church, which was rebuilt about the year 1540, is one of the few that escaped the fire in 1666. It is an old gothic structure, of the meaner style, sixty-six feet long, and forty-two broad; the height of the roof thirty-one feet, and the height of the steeple sixty-five feet. The body is of brick, strengthened at the corners by a massy rustic. The windows, which are large, are of the coarse gothic kind, and the top is surrounded with plain square battlements. From the tower rises a turret that is open, arched, and supported by four piers; and from the dome rises a fane. This church received so much damage by the fire in Bishopsgate-street in 1765, that the turret, dome and fane were entirely rebuilt: they are of the same principle as before, though the workmanship is rather more modern.

The living of this church, which is a rectory, including the parsonage-house, is not allowed to be more than 120l. per annum, except the fees. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are two church-wardens.

Opposite to this church, at the north east corner of Threadneedle-street, is situate

The SOUTH-SEA-HOUSE.

This building, in which the company's affairs are now transacted, is a magnificent structure of brick and stone, about a quadrangle, supported by stone pillars of the Tuscan order, which form a fine piazza. The front in Threadneedle-street is beautiful, and of the Doric order. The walls are of a great thickness, and the several offices admirably disposed. The back front, which runs as far as Old Broad street, facing the church of the proctors of St. Anthony's, having turned it out into the streets, with a bell about its neck, the pig might range about the city without danger. If any person gave it bread, or other feeding, the subtle creature would watch him, and whine after him for more: from whence arose the proverb, that, "he follows me like a Tamony, or St. Anthony's pig." But he adds, when any of these pigs became fit for the spit, the proctor took them up for the use of the hospital.

of St. Peter le Poor, was formerly the Excise-office; then the South-Sea company's office; and at this time known by the name of the Old South sea house.

The origin of the South-sea company is as follows: In the glorious and successful war against France, in the reign of queen Anne, the seamen employed in the royal navy had tickets granted them instead of cash; which they were frequently obliged to get discounted at 40l. and sometimes 50l. per cent. to avaricious men, who taking advantage of their necessities, amassed very considerable fortunes.

The debt due from the government upon this and other accounts, unprovided for by parliament, amounted to 9,177,967l. 15s. 4d. and these people taking it into their hands, were incorporated by act of parliament in the year 1710. The following year the company, after the discharge of the debt due to them from the government, was made perpetual; and her majesty incorporated them by the name of "The governor and company of merchants of Great Britain trading to the South-seas and other parts of America, and for encouraging the fishery." And in 1714, they lending the government an additional sum of 822,032l. 4s. 8d. the capital of the company was, by act of parliament, enlarged to ten millions; for which the members received six per cent. interest, or 600,000l. per annum. But in 1720, an act of parliament was passed, by which the company were granted the sole privilege of trading to the South-seas within certain limits, and enabled to increase their capital, by redeeming several of the public debts; but by the arts used on this occasion by some in power, the capital stock of the company was raised to 33,543,263l. By this iniquitous scheme many weakly persons lost their estates, and others acquired immense fortunes; and a considerable number of the directors were obliged by parliament to refund their ill-gotten treasures. (See p. 282, 283.)

This company, however, was not dissolved; and in the year 1733, it was enacted by parliament, that the capital stock of the South-sea company, which then amounted to 14,651,103l. 8s. 1d. and the shares of the respective proprietors, should be divided into four equal parts: three fourths of which should be converted into a joint stock, attended with annuities after the rate of four per cent. till redemption by parliament; and should be called the New South-sea annuities: and the other fourth part should remain in the company as a trading capital stock, attended with the residue of the annuities or funds, payable at the exchequer to the company till redemption.

It is necessary to observe with respect to this company, that, notwithstanding the terms of their charter, they have never carried on any considerable trade. Indeed, by the assiento contract they had, for some years, the privilege of furnishing the Spaniards with negro slaves for their mines and plantations in America, and of sending a large ship annually, with European goods, consisting chiefly of our woollen manufactures, to the Spanish West Indies; and for nine years they annually sent a small number of ships to fish on the coast of Greenland. At this time, however, they have no trade: they only receive interest for their capital, which is in the hands of the government, and also 8000l. a year out of the treasury, towards the expence attending the management of their affairs.

The business of this company is managed by a governor, sub-governor, deputy-governor, and twenty-one directors, annually chosen before the sixth of February, by a majority of votes. Such members of the company as have 1000l. in the capital stock in their own names, having one vote; such as have 3000l. two votes; such as have 5000l. three votes; and such as have 10,000l. stock or more, four votes, and none above: but no person can be governor, sub-governor, deputy-governor, or director, while he is governor, deputy-governor, or director of the Bank of England.

The hours of payment of dividends are from nine o'clock to twelve, and the hour of transfer from twelve to one.

The days of transferring South-sea stock are, Monday, Wednesday and Friday.

Old Annuities, ditto.

New Annuities, Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday.

3 per cent. 1751, Tuesday and Thursday. Except on holidays, which are the same as at the Bank.

On the north side of Throgmorton-street, nearly opposite Bartholomew lane, is the chief office for the Penny Post, which, before the enlargement of the Bank, was kept in St. Christopher's church-yard.

This office is under the direction of the post-masters general; who appoint a comptroller, accountant, receiver, and comptroller's clerk and messengers. There are six sorters, and eight sub-sorters of the letters, seventy-four messengers, or letter carriers, and 334 houses within the bills of mortality for receiving or taking in letters; which are divided amongst the six following offices:

1. The general office in Throgmorton-street.
2. The corner of Bull-head court, Newgate-street.
3. At Lincoln's-Inn.
4. In Westminster.
5. In King street, Little Tower-hill.
6. In St. Mary Overies, Southwark.

Each of these has a number of villages and places under its particular direction: from and to the most distant of which letters are carried and returned at least once in the day.

This useful method of circulating letters in, and ten miles round the metropolis; was projected by one David Murray, an Upholder, in Pater-noster-Row, in the year 1683, who communicated the scheme to Mr. William Dockwra, who carried it on for some time with great success, till the government laid claim to it as a royal prerogative; Dockwra was obliged to submit, and in return had a pension allowed him by the king of two hundred pounds per annum, during his life.

It was erected to carry any parcel of paper under one pound within a certain circuit for one penny, to be paid by the person that sent it; but in length of time it has been so managed as to oblige the party to whom the letter or parcel is directed or delivered, to pay one penny also, if that party happens to live out of the bounds of London, Westminster, or their suburbs and liberties, or out of the Borough of Southwark. And by a late act of parliament the weight of the parcels to be sent by penny-post is reduced to four ounces.

We shall conclude the account of this ward with mention of a free-school belonging to it for the education of fifty boys and thirty girls, situate opposite the Back-gate of Bethlehem Hospital. The house was rebuilt in 1763, and the charity is supported by private subscription.

CHAPTER VIII.

OF CANDLEWICK WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from a street formerly called Candlewick, or Candlewright-street (now Canon-street) which was principally inhabited by candle-wrights, or candle-makers, both in tallow and wax. It is bounded on the east by Bridge-ward, on the south by Bridge and Dowgate wards; on the north by Langbourn-ward; and on the west by Dowgate and Wallbrook wards.

Though this ward is but small, yet it is divided into seven precincts; and is governed by an alderman, eight common-council-men, (of whom one is the alderman's deputy) seven constables, thirteen inquest men, seven scavengers and a beadle.

Great Eastcheap, * which is a principal street in this ward, begins at the top of Fish-street-hill, and runs westward to the end of Clement's-lane, where Canon-street begins. On the south side of this street stands the Bear's-head tavern, accounted the oldest in London, and the house in which Shakespear laid some of the scenes of his Henry IV. where he introduces prince Henry and his companions. And at the upper end of Maidenhead-court is a baptist meeting-house.

Not far from this street is St. Michael's-lane, on the east side of which stands the parish church of St. MICHAEL, CROOKED LANE.

So called from its dedication to St. Michael, and its vicinity to the above-lane.

This church is of ancient foundation, as appears by John de Borham, who was rector thereof in the year 1304: at which time it was a very ordinary small building, and stood amidst lay-stalls and slaughter-grounds used by the butchers of Eastcheap-market. But in 1366 John Love-ken or Loufken, four times Lord-mayor of London, obtained a grant of the ground where the lay-stalls were, and built a handsome and capacious church thereon. This church received considerable additions from Sir William Walworth, Lord-mayor, who likewise founded a college for a master and nine priests; settled his own new built house adjoining to the church for an habitation of the said master and chaplains, or priests, for ever, and was buried in the north chapel by the choir.

This church, however, being entirely destroyed by the great conflagration in 1666, the present edifice arose in its stead. It is a plain structure built with stone, and enlightened by a series of large arched Windows. The Tower, which is at the west end, is carried square to a considerable height, and the upper-most window in the center of each face, is ornamented with a head, and handsome festoons. From hence, instead of a balustrade, is a range of open work of the Gothic kind, with vases at the corners. From within this part the tower rises circular, diminishing in three stages, with an open buttress rising from each corner of the square tower, to the top of the first stage; from this buttress rises a large scroll, to the top of the second, and a smaller to the top of the third stage, above which rises a kind of short round spire of a peculiar kind; it swells out at the bottom, and then rounding off rises to a small height, where it is terminated by a gilt ball and fane.

The patronage of this church was anciently in the prior and convent of Canterbury, in whom it continued till the year 1408, since which time it has been in the archbishops of that see, and is

* This street originally took its name from a market kept there, to serve the east part of the city; which was afterwards removed to Leadenhall-square. And by the early account we have of Eastcheap-market, and its vicinity to the ferry, or Roman trajectus, over the Thames, we have great reason to suppose this to be the first, or one of the first markets in London, even of a Roman date. In which state it continued for many ages, especially for victuals; as may be collected from the following song, called London Lickpenny, made by Lidgate, a monk of Bury, in the reign of Henry V. in the person of a countryman coming to London, and travelling through the same. In Westcheap (saith the song)

he was called on to buy fine laxon, Paris thread, cotton umble, and other linen cloths, and such like; but not a word of silks. In Cornhill, to buy old apparel, and household stuff, where he was forced to pay his own load, which he had lost in Westminster-hall. In Candlewright-street, drapers proffered him cheap cloth. In Eastcheap, the cooks cried, hot ribs of beef roasted, pieces well basted, and other victuals. There was clattering of pots, harp, pipe and fawtrie; yea by cock, nay by cock, for other greater oaths were spared. Some sang of Jenkin and Julian, &c. all which melody liked well the passenger, but he wanted money to abide by it, and therefore got him into a Graveland barge and home into Kent.

one of the thirteen peculiars in this city belonging to Canterbury. The rector, in conformity to an act of parliament granted in the reign of king Charles II. receives, besides his other profits, 100l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, and two collectors for the poor.

Among the several monuments in this church is that of Sir William Walworth, who slew Wat Tyler; (see page 85,) the inscription on which is as follows:

Here under lyth a man of fame,
William Walworth callyd by name;
Fishmonger he was in life-time here,
And twise Lord-mayor as in bookes appere;
Who with courage stout and manly might,
Slew Wat Tyler in king Richard's fight;
For which act done, and trew intent,
The king made him knight incontinent:
And gave him armes, as here may see,
To declare his fact and chivalrie.
He left this life the yere of our God,
Thirteene hundryd fourscore and three od.

Here is also a monument erected to the memory of queen Elizabeth; and the following very concise inscription on the tomb of William Wray:

Here lyeth, wrapt in clay,
The body of William Wray,
I have no more to say.

In an alley on the other side of St. Michael's-lane is an independent meeting-house.

On the north side, and at the extremity of Great Eastcheap, is Clement's-lane; on the east side of which is situate the parish church of

St. CLEMENT, EASTCHEAP.

This church is dedicated to St. Clement, disciple of St. Peter the Apostle, and ordained bishop of Rome in the year 93. It receives the additional epithet of Eastcheap, not only on account of its situation, but likewise to distinguish it from other churches dedicated to the same saint. It was founded in or before the year 1332; and before the suppression of religious houses, was in the gift of the abbot and convent of St. Peter's, Westminster. But queen Mary, in the first year of her reign, gave the advowson thereof to the bishop of London for ever, who is now the patron.

The living of this church is considerably augmented by the parish of St. Martin's Orgar being annexed to it, which, by act of parliament, makes it of the yearly value of 140l. in lieu of tythes.

This church sharing the common fate in the year 1666, was rebuilt in 1686; and is a very plain, neat structure, with a tower crowned only by a battlement. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, and two collectors for the poor.

The parish of St. Martin's Orgar is a rectory, the church whereof (before the fire of London) stood on the east side of St. Martin's-lane, near Canon-street; and is so denominated from its dedication to St. Martin afore said; and the additional epithet of Orgars is a corruption of Odgarus, or Ordgarus, who was the founder and patron thereof, who granted the same to the dean and canons of St. Paul's about the year 1181. From which time the advowson has continued in the said dean and chapter.

Since this parish has been united to St. Clement's Eastcheap, the site of the church is made a burial place for the parishioners. Part of the steeple, however, remains, in which is a dial projecting into the street; and part of the nave also being found repairable, a body of French protestants, in communion with the episcopal church of England, obtained a lease of the tower and ruinous nave from the minister and churchwardens, and got it confirmed by parliament in pursuance of which the purchasers erected a church for their own use; in which they continue to perform divine service according to the rights of the church of England. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, five auditors of accounts, two churchwardens, and a collector for the poor.

On the north side of Cannon-street is another lane, on the west side of which stands the parish church of

St. MARY ABCHURCH.

This church owes its name to its dedication to the Virgin Mary; and the additional appellation of Ab or Upchurch, was given it on account of its elevation in comparison of the neighbouring ground towards the Thames; and to distinguish it from the many other churches of the same name in this city. A church dedicated to St. Mary has stood here from very early times; and we find that in the year 1448, it was in the patronage of the prior and canons of St. Mary Overy's; but devolving to the crown in the reign of queen Elizabeth, her majesty granted the perpetual advowson to Corpus Christi college in Cambridge, in whom it has continued to the present time.

The old church being consumed by the fire in 1666, the present one was raised in its stead; and to which, by act of parliament, is annexed, the parish of St. Laurence Poultny, whereby the rectorial profits are greatly augmented, the two together producing the yearly value of 120l. in lieu of tythes. The vestry is general, and the parish officers are only two churchwardens.

This structure is built of brick, strengthened by rustic quoins of stone at the corners, with three windows on each side, of which the middle one is the principal, that rising higher, and taking up the space above, while the others, which are smaller have round windows over them; these have all stone cases. The tower rises square with the corners strengthened with rustic; and a large window in the center of each face, ornamented like the rest. From this tower rises a kind of dome, and upon its summit stands a plain spire supported by a lanthorn base.

The church of St. Laurence Poultney, which was a curacy, stood on the west side of Lawrence Poultney-lane, on the south-side of Cannon-street; and received the addition of Poultney, from its great benefactor Sir John Poultney, who, about the year 1345, founded in the ancient church, a college of Jesus and Corpus Christi, for a master, warden, thirteen priests and four choristers. This living is at present absorbed in the patronage of Abchurch, and the site of the old church and college remains only as a burial place for the inhabitants of the parish. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are two churchwardens, and two collectors for the poor.

CHAPTER IX.

OF CASTLE-BAYNARD WARD.

THIS ward is bounded on the east by Queenhithe and Broad-street wards; on the south by the river Thames; and on the west and north by the ward of Farringdon within.

It takes its name from an ancient castle which stood on the bank near the Thames, and was built by one Baynard, a nobleman of great au-

* The great privileges enjoyed by Robert Fitz-Walter, in consequence of this office, were as follows:

"The said Robert and his heirs ought to be and are chief banners of London, in fee for the castelary, which he and his ancestors had by Castle-baynard in the said city. In time of war the said Robert and his heirs ought to serve the city in manner as followeth: that is,
"The said Robert ought to come, he being the twentieth man of arms, on horseback, covered with cloth or armour, unto the great west door of St. Paul's, with his banner displayed before him of his arms. And, when he is come to the said door, mounted and apparelled as before is said, the mayor, with his aldermen and sheriffs, armed in their arms, shall come out of the said church of St. Paul unto the said door, with a banner in his hand, all on foot; which banner shall be gules, the image of St. Paul, gold; the face, hands, feet, and sword, of silver: and as soon as the said Robert shall see the mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs, come on foot out of the church, armed with such a banner; he shall alight from his horse and salute the mayor, and say to him, Sir mayor, I am come to do my service which I owe to the city.
"And the mayor and aldermen shall answer, We give to you, as to our banneret of fee in this city, the banner of this city, to bear and govern the honour of this city to your power.
"And the said Robert and his heirs shall receive the banner in his hands, and go on foot out of the gate, with the banner in his hands; and the mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs, shall follow to the door, and shall bring an horse to the said Robert, worth 20l. which horse shall be saddled with a saddle of the arms of the said Robert, and shall be covered with findals of the said arms.
"Also they shall present to him 20l. sterling, and deliver it to the chamberlain of the said Robert, for his expences that day. Then the said Robert shall mount upon the horse which the mayor presented to him, with the banner in his hand; and, as soon as he is up, he shall say to the mayor, that he must cause a marshal to be chosen for the host, one of the city; which being done, the said Robert shall command the mayor and burgeses of the city to warn the commons to assemble, and all go under the banner of St. Paul; and the said Robert shall bear it himself to Aldgate, and there the said Robert and mayor shall deliver the said banner of St. Paul to whom they think proper. And, if they are to go out of the city, then the said Robert ought to chuse two out of every ward, the most sage persons, to look to the keeping of the city after they are gone out. And this counsel shall be taken in the priory of the Trinity near Aldgate. And before every town or castle which the host of London shall besiege, if the siege continue a whole year, the said Robert shall have, for every siege, of the commonalty of London, one hundred shillings, and no more."

thority who came from Normandy with William the Conqueror. This castle, after the decease of the above Baynard, (which happened in the reign of William Rufus) fell into the hands of various people, and at length became the possession of Robert Fitz-walter, who was castelain and standard-bearer * of London in the reign of king John, A. D. 1213. At which time there arose

The rights belonging to him and his heirs in the city of London, in time of peace, were as follow:

"That is to say, the said Robert Fitz-Walter had a foke or ward in the city, where was a wall of the canonry of St. Paul, which led down, by a brewhouse of St. Paul, to the Thames, and so to the side of the mill which was in the water coming down from Fleet-bridge, and went by London-wall betwixt the friars preachers and Ludgate, and so returned by the house of the said friars to the wall of the canonry of St. Paul; that is all the parish of St. Andrew, which was in the gift of his ancestors by the said seniority; and so the said Robert had appendant unto the said foke all the things underwritten:
"That he ought to have a fokeman, and to place what fokeman he will, so he be of the fokemanry, or the same ward: and if any of the fokemanry be impleaded in the Guildhall of any thing that toucheth not the body of the mayor that for the time is, or that toucheth the body of no sheriff, it is not lawful for the fokeman of the fokemanry of the said Robert Fitz-Walter to demand a court of the said Robert; and the mayor and his citizens of London ought to grant him to have a court; and in his court he ought to bring his judgments, as is assented and agreed upon in the Guildhall, that shall be given him.
"If any therefore be taken in fokemanry, he ought to have his stocks and imprisonment in his foken; and he shall be brought from thence to the Guildhall before the mayor, and there they shall provide him his judgment that ought to be given of him; but his judgment shall not be published till he come into the court of the said Robert, and in his liberty.
"And the judgment shall be such, that, if he have deserved death by treason, he to be tied to a post in the Thames, at a good wharf, where boats are fastened, two ebbings and two flowings of the water.
"And if he be condemned for a common thief, he ought to be led to the elms, and there suffer his judgment as other thieves. And so the said Robert and his heirs hath honour, that he holdeth a great franchise within the city, that the mayor of the city and citizens are bound to do him right; that is to say, that, when the mayor will hold a great council, he ought to call the said Robert and his heirs to be with him in council of the city; and the said Robert ought to be sworn to be of council with the city against all people, saving the king and his heirs. And when the said Robert cometh to the hustings of the Guildhall of the city, the mayor, or his lieutenant, ought to rise against him, and set him down near unto him; and so long as he is in the Guildhall, all the judgments ought to be given by his mouth, according to the record of the recorders of the said Guildhall: and so many waives as come so long as he is there, he ought to give them to the bailiffs of the town, or to whom he will, by the council of the mayor of the city."

a great contention between the king and his barons, on account of Matilda, called The Fair, a daughter of the said Robert Fitz-Walter, whom the king unlawfully loved, but could not obtain; whereupon, and for other causes of the like sort, there ensued a war throughout the realm. The barons, being received into London, did great damage to the king; but in the end the king not only banished the said Fitz-Walter, among others, out of the kingdom, but likewise caused his castle, called Baynard's-castle, and two other houses, to be demolished. (See page 41.) After which a messenger was sent to Matilda the Fair about the king's suit; but she, not consenting to it, was poisoned.

King John being in France in the year 1214, with a great army, a truce was made between the two kings for five years. There being a river or arm of the sea between the two armies, a knight among the English called out to those on the other side to challenge any one among them to come and take a joust or two with him: whereupon, without any delay, Robert Fitz-Walter, who was on the French side, ferried over, and got on horseback, without any one to help him, and shewed himself ready to the face of this challenger; and at the first course struck him so violently with his great spear, that both man and horse fell to the ground; and, when his spear was broken, he went back again to the king of France. King John, seeing this, cried out, "By God's tooth, (his usual oath) he were a king indeed who had such a knight." The friends of Robert, hearing these words, knelt down, and said, "O king, he is your knight; it is Robert Fitz-Walter." Whereupon he was sent for the next day, and restored to the king's favour; by which means a peace was concluded, Fitz-Walter was restored to his estates, and had permission to repair his castle of Baynard.

This ward is divided into ten precincts, and is governed by an alderman, ten common-councilmen, (of whom one is the alderman's deputy) nine constables, fourteen inquest-men, seven scavengers and a beadle.

We shall begin the survey of this ward on the north side of Thames street, where, at the south west corner of Bennet's-hill is situate the parish church of

St. BENNET, PAUL'S WHARF.

This church is so called from its being consecrated to St. Benedict, and its vicinity to the above wharf. It is of very ancient foundation, as appears by Dicets, dean of St. Paul's, who has it in his register, under the year 1181. The old church being destroyed by the fire of London in 1666, the present one was erected in its place from a design of Sir Christopher Wren. It is a neat structure; the body is well proportioned: the tower has rustic corners, and the turret and small spire are raised from the crown of a dome.

This church is a rectory, the collation to which is in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's. The parish of St. Peter, Paul's wharf is united to it, and the rector receives 100l. per annum in lieu of tythes. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens and two overseers.

On the east side of Bennet's-hill, at the south west end of St. Paul's Cathedral, stands the college or office of arms, commonly called

THE HERALDS OFFICE.

This office was destroyed by the dreadful fire in 1666, and rebuilt about three years after; the expence of which, at a moderate computation, amounted to 5000l. but the corporation not being able to discharge that sum, petitioned his majesty for a commission to receive the subscriptions of the nobility and gentry. This petition was referred to the commissioners for executing the office of earl-marshal; and, upon their lordship's report, a commission was granted, bearing date the sixth of December, 1672: but the commission directing the money so collected to be paid to such persons, and laid out in such a manner, as the earl-marshal should appoint, it disgusted the officers so much, that it caused a coldness and inactivity in them to promote the subscription; so that, although they had reason to hope for large contributions, little more than 700l. was raised by this commission: what sums were necessary were made up out of the general fees and profits of the office, or by the contribution of particular members. Sir William Dugdale built the north west corner at his own charge; and Sir Henry St. George, Clarenceux, gave the profits of some visitations, made by deputies appointed by him for that purpose, amounting to 530l. the houses on the east side, and south east corner, were erected upon a building lease, agreeable to the original plan; by which means the whole was made one uniform quadrangular building, as it now appears, and is one of the best designed and handsomest brick buildings in London: and the hollow arch of the gateway is esteemed a curiosity. In November, 1683, the college part of the building being finished, the rooms were divided amongst the officers according to their degrees, by agreement among themselves, and afterwards confirmed by the earl-marshal; which apartments have been ever since annexed to their respective offices. The inside of the lodgings were finished, at different times, by the officers to whom they belonged.

It is a square inclosed by regular brick buildings, which are extremely neat, without expensive decorations. The floors are raised above the level of the ground, and there is an ascent to them by flights of plain steps. The principal front is in the lower story, ornamented with rustic, upon which are placed four Ionic pilasters, that support an angular pediment. The sides which are conformable to this, have arched pediments, that are also supported by Ionic pilasters. Within is a large room for keeping the court of honour, a library, with houses and apartments for the king's heralds and pursuivants.

This corporation consists of thirteen members, viz. three kings at arms, six heralds at arms, and four pursuivants at arms; who are nominated by the earl-marshal of England, as ministers subordinate to him in the execution of their offices, and and hold their places by patent during their good behaviour. They are all the king's servants in ordinary, and therefore, in the vacancy of the office of earl-marshal, have been sworn into their offices by the lord-chamberlain.

Their meetings are termed chapters, which they hold the first Thursday in every month, or oftener if necessary, wherein all matters are determined by a majority of voices of the kings and heralds, each king having two voices.

The kings are Garter, Clarenceux, and Norroy. Garter was instituted by king Henry V. in the year 1417, for the service of the most noble order of the garter; and, for the dignity of that order, he was made sovereign, within the office of arms, over all the other officers, subject to the crown of England, by the name of Garter, king of arms of England. By the constitution of his office he must be a native of England, and a gentleman bearing arms. To him belongs the correction of arms, and all ensigns of arms usurped or borne unjustly; and the power of granting arms to deserving persons, and supporters to the nobility and knights of the Bath. It is likewise his office to go next before the sword in solemn procession, none interposing except the marshal, to administer the oath to all the officers of arms; to have a habit like the register of the order; with baron's service in the court, and lodgings in Windsor castle; he bears his white rod; with a banner of the ensigns of the order thereon, before the sovereign: when any lord enters the parliament chamber, it is his post to assign him his place, according to his dignity and degree; to carry the ensigns of the order to foreign princes, and to do, or procure to be done, what the sovereign shall enjoin relating to the order; for the execution of which he has a salary of 100l. a year, payable at the exchequer; and 100l. more out of the revenue of the order; besides his fees.

The others are called provincial kings, and their provinces together comprise the whole kingdom of England; that of Clarenceux comprehending all to the south of the river Trent, and that of Norroy all to the north of that river; but, though these provincials have existed time immemorial, they were not constituted to these offices by the titles of Clarenceux and Norroy before Edward III.

Clarenceux is thus named from the duke of Clarence, the third son of king Edward III. It is his duty, according to his commission, to visit his province, to survey the arms of all persons, &c. and to register their descents, marriages, &c. to marshal the funerals of all persons within his province not under the direction of Garter; and in his province to grant arms, with the consent of the earl-marshal. Before the institution of Garter, he was the principal officer of arms, and, in the vacancy of Garter, he executes his office. Exclusive of his fees he has a salary from the exchequer of 40l. per annum.

The duty and office of Norroy, or North Roy, that is, North king, is the same on the north of the Trent as that of Clarenceux on the south.

The kings of arms were formerly created by the sovereign with great solemnity, upon some high festival; but, since the ceremonies used at the creation of peers have been laid aside, the kings of arms have been created by the earl-marshal, by virtue of the sovereign's warrant. Upon this occasion he takes his oath; wine is poured upon his head out of a gilt cup, with a cover; his title is pronounced; and he invested with a tabart of the royal arms richly embroidered upon velvet; a collar of SS. with two portcullises of silver gilt; a gold chain, with a badge of his office; and the earl-marshal places on his head the crown of a king of arms, which formerly resembled a ducal coronet; but, since the restoration, it has been adorned with leaves resembling those of the oak, and circumscribed, according to ancient custom, with the words, Miserere mei Deus secundum magnam misericordiam tuam. Garter has also a mantle of crimson sattin, as an officer of the order; with a white rod or scepter, with the sovereign's arms on the top, which he bears in the presence of the sovereign; and he is sworn in a chapter of the Garter, the sovereign investing him with the ensigns of his office.

The kings of arms are distinguished from each other by their respective badges, which they may wear at all times, either in a gold chain or a ribbon, Garter's being blue, and the provincials purple.

The six heralds are Windsor, Chester, Lancaster, York, Richmond, and Somerset; who take place according to seniority in office. They are created with the same ceremonies as the kings, taking the oath of an herald, and are invested with a tabart of the royal arms, embroidered upon sattin, not so rich as the kings, but better than the pursuivants, and a silver collar of SS. They are esquires by creation, and have a salary of 26l. 13s. 4d. per annum, and fees according to their degree.

The kings and heralds are sworn upon a sword as well as the book, to shew that they are military as well as civil officers.

The four pursuivants, who are, Rougecroix, Bluemantle, Rougedragon, and Portcullis, are also created by the earl-marshal, when they take their oath of a pursuivant, and are invested with a tabart of the royal arms upon damask. They have a salary of twenty pounds a year, with fees according to their degree. It is the duty of the heralds and pursuivants to attend in the public office, one of each class together, by a monthly rotation.

Besides these particular duties of the several classes, it is the general duties both of the kings, heralds, and pursuivants, to attend his majesty at the house of peers, and, upon certain high festivals, to the chapel royal; to make proclamations; to marshal the proceedings at all public processions; to attend the installation of the knights of the Garter, &c.

All these officers have apartments in the college, annexed to their respective offices. They have likewise a public hall, in which is a court for the earl-marshal, where courts of chivalry are occasionally held, and the officers of arms attend in their tabarts, his lordship being present. Their public library contains a large and valuable collection of original records of the pedigrees and arms of families, funeral certificates of the nobility, lity, and gentry, public ceremonials, and other branches of heraldry and antiquities.

Facing the north west corner of the herald's office is a passage into

DOCTORS COMMONS.

This is properly a college for such as study and practice the civil law, and where causes in civil and ecclesiastical cases are tried under the bishop of London, and the archbishop of Canterbury. The addition of commons is taken from the manner in which the civilians live here, commoning together, as practised in other colleges.

The front of this college is situate in Great Knight-riding-street, and consists of two square courts, chiefly inhabited by doctors of the civil law. Here are tried all causes by the court of admiralty, and the court of delegates. Here are offices where wills are registered and deposited, and licences for marriage, &c. are granted, and a court of faculties and dispensations. Several other offices are likewise kept here, viz. The registry of the archbishop of Canterbury, and the registry of the bishop of London: in which offices are registered all wills, and other matters done in the ecclesiastical courts of those sees.

The causes, whereof the civil and ecclesiastical law take cognizance, are these: blasphemy, apostacy from christianity, heresy, schism; ordinations, institutions of clerks to benefices, celebration of divine service, matrimony, divorces, bastardy, tythes, oblations, obventions, mortueries, delapidations, reparation of churches, probate of wills, administrations; simony, incests, fornications, adulteries, solicitation of chastity; pensions, procurations, commutation of penance, right of pews, and other such like, reducible to these matters.

The courts belonging to the civil and ecclesiastical law are various; such as

1. The Court of Arches. This is the highest court under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Canterbury. It takes its name from Bow-church which was originally built upon arches, and in which this court first sat for the dispatch of business. Here all appeals are directed in ecclesiastical matters within the province of Canterbury. The judge of this court is stiled the dean of the Arches, because he holds a jurisdiction over a deanery in London, consisting of thirteen parishes, exempt from the bishop of London's jurisdiction. The officers under this judge are, an examiner, an actuary, a beadle or crier, and an apparitor; besides advocates, and procurators or proctors.

2. The prerogative court. This court is thus denominated from the prerogative of the archbishop of Canterbury, who by a special privilege beyond those of his suffragans, can here try all disputes that happen to arise concerning the last wills of persons within his province, who have left goods to the value of five pounds and upwards, unless such things are settled by composition between the metropolitan and his suffragans; as in the diocese of London, where it is ten pounds. To this court belongs a judge, who is stiled Judex Curie, Prærogative, Cantuariensis, and a register, who hath convenient rooms in his office for the disposing and laying up safe all original wills and testaments. This register also hath his deputy, besides several clerks.

3. The court of faculties and dispensations. This court can empower any one to do that which in law he could not otherwise do, viz. to marry without the publication of banns; to succeed a father in an ecclesiastical benefice; to hold two or more benefices, incompatible, &c. This authority was given to the archbishop by the statute 25 Henry VIII. cap. 21. And the chief officer of this court is called Magister ad Facultates; under whom is a register and his clerks.

4. The court of admiralty. This court was erected in the reign of Edward III. and in former times kept in Southwark. It belongs to the lord high admiral of England, and takes cognizance of the death or maihem of any person murdered on the high seas. Here also are cognizable all matters relating to seamen's wages, &c. The judge of this court must be a civilian, and is called Suprema curiæ admiralitatis anglie locum tenens judex; under whom is a register and a marshal, who carries a silver oar before the judge; besides an advocate and proctor. This court is held in the hall of Doctors-commons, where the other civil courts are kept; except in the trial of pirates, and crimes committed at sea; on which causes the admiralty court sits at the sessions house in the Old Bailey.

5. The court of delegates. This is the highest court for civil affairs belonging to the church, to which appeals are carried from the spiritual courts; for upon the abolishing of the papal power within this kingdom by Henry VIII. in the year 1534, it was enacted by parliament, that no appeals should from thence forward be made to Rome; in default of justice in any of the spiritual courts, the party aggrieved might appeal to the king in his court of chancery upon which a commission under the great seal should be directed to such persons as his majesty should think fit to nominate. These commissioners to whom the king thus delegates his power, generally consist of noblemen, bishops, and judges, both of the common and civil law; and as this court is not fixed, but occasionally, these commissioners; or delegates, are varied at the pleasure of the Lord chancellor, who appoints them. No appeals lie from this court; but upon good reasons assigned, the lord chancellor may grant a commission of review.

The practisers in these courts are of two sorts, viz. advocates and proctors.

The advocates are such as have taken the degree of doctor of the civil law, and are retained as counsellors or pleaders. These must first upon their petition to the archbishop, obtain his fiat; and then they are admitted by the judge to practice. The manner of their admission is solemn. Two senior advocates in their scarlet robes, with the mace carried before them, conduct the doctor up the court with three reverences, and present him with a short latin speech, together with the archbishop's rescript; and then having taken the oaths, the judge admits him, and assigns him a place or a seat in the court, which he is always to keep keep when he pleads. Both the judge and advocates, if of Oxford, wear in court scarlet robes, and hoods lined with taffaty; but if of Cambridge, white miniver, and round black velvet caps.

The proctors or procurators, exhibit their proxies for their clients; and make themselves parties for them, and draw and give pleas, or libels and allegations, in their behalf; produce witnesses, prepare causes for sentence, and attend the advocates with the proceedings. These are also admitted by the archbishop's fiat, and introduced by two senior proctors. They wear black robes and hoods lined with fur.

The terms for the pleading and ending of causes in the civil courts, are but little different from the term times of the common law. The order as to the time of sitting of the several courts, is as follows: The court of arches having the pre-eminence sits first in the morning. The court of admiralty sits in the afternoon on the same day; and the prerogative court sits also in the afternoon.

In the account of this place we must not forget its library, which is a spacious room, well stocked with books of all sorts, especially in civil law and history: for which they are greatly indebted to James Gibson, esq; and to the benefactions in money given by every bishop at his consecration, to purchase books for this library.

This learned body were originally seated in Pater-noster-Row, and in the very place where now stands the Queen's-head tavern; which aforetime had been a house for a residentiary of St. Paul's. But that situation being found very inconvenient, doctor Henry Harvey, dean of the arches, purchased and provided a large house in Knight-riders-street which at that time was an old stone building belonging to and let out by the canons of St. Paul's.

The present college was built upon the ruins of the house, given by the above doctor Harvey, and burnt down in the general conflagration of this city in 1666: on which occasion the business of the institution was transferred to, and carried on at Exeter-change, in the Strand, till the new college was finished in a more convenient and elegant manner.

On the north side of Knightriders-street is Bell-yard, which leads into Great Carter-lane, inhabited chiefly by gentlemen belonging to or depending upon the courts of Doctors commons. On the north side is Dean's-court, which is but small, but graced with the remarkable buildings, viz. the prerogative court, and a large house on the west side, the seat of the deans of St. Paul's successively.

On the south side of Little Carter-lane is a place called Sermon-lane, corruptly for Shermonger's-lane, this having once been the place where the silver was prepared, cut, and rounded for the coiners in the Old-change. On the west side of this lane is a school belonging to Castle Baynard ward, purchased and beautified by alderman Barber, for the education of thirty boys and twenty girls.

In a court near this is the paying office for the city of London's new pavements: and nearer to the Old-change, on the south side of Little Carter-lane, is a celebrated Presbyterian meeting-house.

On the north side of Knightriders-street, and at the south-west angle of the Old Change, stands the parish church of

St. MARY MAGDALEN, Old Fish-street,

So called from its dedication to the above saint, and its vicinity to Old Fish-street. This was a vicarage in the tenure of the canons of St. Paul's in the year 1181: but now, and for some ages, it has been a rectory in the gift of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's. The old edifice was destroyed by the fire of London, and the present structure arose from its ruins, and was built in the year 1685.

It is a small well proportioned church, built with stone, sixty feet in length, forty-eight in breadth, and thirty in height to the roof. It is enlightened by a single series of arched windows, each ornamented with a cherub and scrolls, supporting a cornice, which runs round the building; but these windows are of such an unusual height from the ground, that the doors, which are low and plain, open completely under them: both these and the windows are of the same general construction, and the wall is terminated by a balustrade. The tower is divided into two stages, in the upper of which is a large window on each side. From the top of this tower the work suddenly diminishes in the manner of high steps on each side, and on the top of these is a turret, crowned with a very short spire, on which is placed a fan with flames.

This was originally a very poor living, but since the parish of St. Gregory's has been united to it, and made parochial for both parishes, it is raised by act of parliament to the value of 120*l.* per annum, in lieu of tythes. And though St. Gregory's still remains an impropriation to the petty canons of St. Paul's, who are to receive all tythes, oblations, and duties of that parish, in as large and beneficial a manner as formerly they have, or lawfully might have done; yet the parishioners thereof are obliged to pay their quota of the said 120*l.* which by act of parliament is to be levied on both these parishes, in lieu of tythes to the incumbent. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens and two overseers.

The church of St. Gregory, which was anciently a rectory, was situate at the south-west angle of St. Paul's cathedral; and took its name from Gregory the Great, bishop of Rome, who sent hither Austin the monk, to convert the English nation to christianity.

This is one of the peculiars belonging to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, where they are both patrons and ordinaries; and it is not charged with first fruits and tenths, but only with procurations yearly to the dean and chapter aforesaid. After its union with St. Mary Magdalen's, the ground on which it stood was laid open to St. Paul's church yard.

The

The vestry is general; and the parish officers are two churchwardens, and three overseers and collectors.

On the east side of Puddle-dock-hill, near the wharf, is situate the parish church of

St. ANDREW WARDROBE.

This church is a rectory of very ancient foundation, originally known by the name of St. Andrew near Baynard's castle; but that castle being afterwards destroyed, and the king's wardrobe built near the church, it changed its name from Castle-Baynard to that of St. Andrew Wardrobe. It is very probable this church was founded about the same time as Castle-Baynard was erected, and perhaps by the same nobleman: for the patronage descended to the noble family of Fitz-Walters, from whom it passed into many hands, and at length came to the crown, who have presented to this living from the reign of king Charles II. by the lord-chancellor, who alternately presents with the patrons of St. Anne's, Black-friars, annexed to it after the fire of London. And, by the act of their union, the living is made of the value of 140l. per annum, in lieu of tythes.

The old church being destroyed by the fire of London in 1666, the present structure, which was built in 1670, was made the parochial church of this parish and that of St. Anne, Black-friars. The body is enlightened by two rows of windows, but the tower has neither turret, pinnacle, nor spire. The roof is adorned with fret work of flowers, fruits, &c. the pews are very neat, and the walls well wainscotted, with two handsome galleries, a carved pulpit, a veneered sounding board, and a very complete altar-piece. The vestry is select; and the officers are two churchwardens.

The church of St. Anne, Black-friars, (which was a donative or curacy) stood on the east side of Church-yard alley, in the precinct of Black-friars; but having suffered in the fatal calamity of 1666, and not being rebuilt, the parish was annexed to the above mentioned St. Andrew's. The antiquity of this church will appear from the following account: In the year 1276 Gregory Rokeley, mayor, and the barons of London, granted and gave unto Robert Kilwarby, archbishop of Canterbury, two lanes or ways next the street of Baynard's-castle, and the tower of Mountfitchet, to be destroyed; on the site of which streets the said Robert built the church of Black-friars, with the residue of the stones that were left of the said tower, which were not used by the bishop of London in the repairs of St. Paul's cathedral.

This priory church was very large, and highly favoured by king Edward I. and his queen Eleanor; and, in process of time, divers parliaments and other great meetings were held here: particularly the tribunal by the cardinals Campejus and Wolsey for annulling the marriage of king Henry VIII. with queen Catharine of Arragon, his royal consort, and the parliament which soon after condemned cardinal Wolsey in a præmunire. This priory enjoyed many and great privileges; but they all fell at once; when this house surrendered into the king's hands, in the 30th of Henry VIII. and were granted to Sir Thomas Corden, who soon demolished both the house and church. The parishioners, who had been accommodated for their religious rites in the priory church, and now left without a place of worship, complained thereof in queen Mary's reign; and Sir Thomas being obliged to find a church for the inhabitants, allowed them a lodging chamber above stairs, which, in the year 1597, fell down. After this the parishioners purchased an additional piece of ground to enlarge their church, which they rebuilt by subscription; and it was consecrated and dedicated to St. Anne, on December 11. A. D. 1597, and ordained to be thenceforward called "the church or chapel" of St. Anne, within the precinct of Black-friars." This precinct increased so much with inhabitants, that, in the year 1613, they found it necessary to enlarge their church; and for that purpose purchased so much ground on the south side thereof as enlarged the church thirty-five feet, eleven inches in breadth, and fifty-four in length; whereon they built an ayle, as an addition to it, and also a vault for a burial place beneath: having before purchased the church, church-yard, porch and parsonage house, with the right of patronage, from Sir George Moore. But it had no tythes belonging to it.

The site of St. Anne's church, at this time, serves only as a burial place for the inhabitants of the precinct of Blackfriars. And though the parish was annexed to St. Andrew's Wardrobe, yet it is directed by its own officers, viz. two churchwardens and two overseers of the poor: and they have a general vestry, in whom centers the election of a minister for the united parishes alternately with the lord chancellor.

We shall leave this ward by the way of St. Paul's church-yard: on the south side of which, at the very extremity, is St. Paul's college, or the college or place of residence for the petty canons, which is a small court backwards, consisting of several houses appropriated to each stall. And nearly opposite this college, at the north west corner of the said church, (which is now called London-house-yard, and covered with houses, that pay a ground rent to the bishop of London) there formerly stood the bishop of London's-palace, a very large and magnificent house, which was destroyed by the fire of London in 1666.

In this palace king Edward V. took up his lodging when he was brought to London to take possession of the crown; and under king Edward VI. the Scotch queen was here entertained.

The dean's lodging on the other side, directly against the palace, was a fair old house; and also divers large houses were built on the same side, which, of old time, were the lodgings of prebendaries and residentiaries, who kept great households and liberal hospitality.

In the south church-yard of St. Paul's was the south side and west end of the said church, at which end were three stately gates or entries, curiously wrought of stone: in the center of the middle gate was placed a massive pillar of brass, in which the leaves of the said great gate closed, and were fastened with locks, bolts and bars of iron; iron; notwithstanding all which, on the twenty-fourth of December, 1565, by a tempest of wind, these gates were blown open, and the bars, bolts, and locks, broken asunder, or greatly bent.

At each corner of this west end was a strong tower of stone, made for bell towers; one of which was called the Lollard's tower, * and used as the bishops prison, for such as were detected for opinions in religion contrary to the faith of the church.

CHAPTER X.

OF CHEAP WARD.

THIS ward receives its name from the Saxon word Chepe, which signifies a market, and was formerly held in this division of the city. This market was peculiarly known by the name of West-cheap from its situation, to distinguish it from the market between Candlewick-street and Tower-street, which, from its situation also, was called East-cheap.

It is bounded on the east by Broad-street and Wallbrook wards; on the north by Coleman-street, Bassishaw and Cripplegate wards; and on the south by Cordwainer's ward. It extends from the entrance of Scalding-alley in the north east to near the east corner of Milk-street, on the north west; and from the west corner of the Mansion-house on the south east to within thirty-three feet west of Bow-lane on the south west: within which circuit is encompassed the Poultry, the east end of Cheapside, part of Pancras-lane, Queen-street and Bow-lane; and on the north side, Grocer's-alley, about 136 feet of the south end of the Old Jury, Ironmonger-lane, King-street, Laurence-lane, and the principal part of Cateaton-street and Honey-lane market, exclusive of all the courts, alleys, &c. within these limits.

This ward is divided into nine precincts; and is under the government of an alderman, twelve common-council-men, (of whom one is the alderman's deputy) eleven constables, thirteen inquest men, nine scavengers, and a beadle.

We shall begin the survey of this ward on the north side of Cheapside, where, behind the houses nearly opposite Bow-church is situate

HONEY-LANE MARKET.

After the fire of London Honey-lane, and other buildings were converted into this market, among which was the parish church of Allhallows, Honey-lane. It is the smallest market in the city, being but 193 feet in length, from east to west, and 97 from north to south. In the middle is a market house which stands on pillars, has rooms

41

* It was in this tower that Richard Hunne, a citizen of London, in the year 1515, a man of fair character, and well beloved, was made prisoner, on pretence of having Wickliffe's bible: but, indeed, the occasion of his ruin was a dispute he had with a clerk about a mortuary, which was made the cause of the whole clergy. He submitted to the bishop's correction, upon which he ought to have been enjoined penance, and set at liberty; but he was found hangover it, and is crowned with a bell tower. In this market are a number of standing stalls for butchers covered over, and also several stalls for fruiterers; the passages into it are inhabited by fishmongers, poulterers, &c. It is famous for the goodness of the provisions sold there, with which it is well supplied on Mondays, Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays.

From this market we return into Cheapside, and proceeding more eastward on the south side, we come to New Queen-street, which, before the fire of London was called Soper-lane, on the east side of which this ward turns down Pancras-lane into Bucklersbury.

On the north side of Pancras-lane were formerly two parish churches, viz. St. Pancras Soper-lane, and St. Bennet Sherehog. The former was consumed in the fire of London, and not rebuilt; the site of which, since that time has been used as a burial place for the inhabitants of the parish, which is annexed to St. Mary-le-Bow. And the latter sharing the same fate, the site has been likewise converted for a burial place to the parishioners who are united with the parish of St. Stephen, Wallbrook.

Turning to the south east end of Cheapside you enter Bucklesbury, (corruptly Bucklersbury) which leads to the head of Wallbrook, and is so called from one Buckle, lord of the manor, who resided and kept his court in a large stone house that stood where now is Barge-yard. This place is so called from the barges which were rowed up hither from the Thames when the stream of Wallbrook was open for navigation. And where Bucklersbury meets Cheapside, viz. at the west end of the Poultry, there formerly stood the great conduit, which was the first erected to convey sweet water in leaden pipes under ground from Paddington to this place. It was castellated with stone and cisterned with lead. But these conduits becoming less useful, as the New-river and Thames water-works improved; and such a large building standing almost in the middle of the ing in his chamber, and his neck broken; which murder, the bishop's sumner owned that he, and the chancellor, doctor Horsey, and the bell ringer, had committed: and when the coroners inquest proceeded to trial, the bishop began a new process against the dead body for heresy, which, not contented to have murdered, they afterwards burnt in Smithfield.

the street, being incommodious for coaches and carts, the magistracy did not rebuild it, but removed it quite away after the fire of London.

The Poultry, which begins on the west, by the Old Jewry where Cheapside ends, and reaches to the Mansion-house by Cornhill, is not only well built and inhabited by capital tradesmen, but may be counted the greatest thoroughfare for carriages and foot passengers from the western divisions of this metropolis; it lying close to the center of business, for those who frequent the 'Change, the Mansion-house, Lombard-street, the Bank, and other public offices.

In this street, at the west side of Scalding-alley, * is situate the parochial church of #### St. MILDRED'S POULTRY.

The foundation of this church appears to be very ancient; for so early as 18 Edward II. we find it with the chapel of Corpus Christi and St. Mary de Coney-hope annexed: which chapel of Corpus Christi and St. Mary stood at the end of Coney-hope-lane, or the rabbit market, now called Grocer's-alley; and being suppressed by king Henry VIII. on account of a fraternity found therein, it was purchased by one Thomas Hobson, who converted the chapel into a warehouse.

The old church which had been rebuilt in 1450, was burnt down in 1666; and when the present one was built, the legislature annexed thereunto the parish of St. Mary Colechurch; and the living was thereby endowed by parliament with 170l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

The patronage of this church, before the reformation, was in the convent and prior of St. Mary Overies; but from the suppression of that religious house, it fell to the crown, in whom it has continued to the present time.

This church is a plain substantial stone building, enlightened by a series of large windows and strengthened with rustie at the corners. The tower is crowned with a plain course, without pinnacles, turret, or any other ornament; except a clock, whose dial projects about half way over the street. The inside is paved with purbeck stone mixed with black marble; and at the west end there is a handsome gallery, and a good pulpit. The vestry is select, and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, two sidesmen, and six auditors of accounts.

St. Mary Colechurch, whose parish is annexed to that of St. Mildred's, was so called from its dedication to the Virgin Mary; and received the additional epithet of Cole from the name of its founder. It was built upon a vault, after the fashion of most of our modern churches, above ground, so that there was an ascent up to the floor of the church by several steps.

The origin of this church does not plainly appear, but we have reason to suppose it of great antiquity, from the baptism of St. Thomas-à-

Becket, (as commonly called) and St. Edmund, both archbishops, registered in this parish. And it is conjectured that the impropriation anciently belonged to the master and brethren of the adjoining hospital of St. Thomas de Acon Martyr, now called Mercer's chapel; the site of which, together with the advowson of St. Mary Colechurch, was granted by king Henry VIII. in the year 1542, to the company of mercers, in whom it has remained as a donative ever since.

When this church was burnt down in 1666, the parish was annexed to St. Mildred's Poultry: and the mercers company, empowered by act of parliament, built a free-school and other buildings, on the site thereof. In this school twenty-five boys are taught the classics, for which the master receives 40l. per annum, besides the use of a commodious dwelling-house.

The vestry is general; and the parish officers are two churchwardens.

On the north side of the Poultry, a little to the westward of St. Mildred's church stands

The POULTRY COMPTER.

This prison is called the compter, from the prisoners being obliged to account for the cause of their commitment before they are discharged; and the addition of Poultry is to distinguish it from another compter in Wood-street. The charge of these prisons is committed to the sheriffs, under whom are the following officers in each compter, who give security to the sheriff for the faithful discharge of their respective trusts.

1. The principal officer, next to the sheriff, is the secondary, whose business is, to return writs, mark warrants, impanel juries, for the courts both above and below, and also for the sessions.
2. The clerk of the papers; whose office is to impanel juries for the sheriffs court; and who enters upon judgment, and makes out all processess.
3. Four clerk-sitters, who enter actions, take bail, receive verdicts after trial, &c.
4. Eighteen serjeants at mace, each of whom has his yeoman or follower. Their office is to arrest persons for debt, to execute all processess, to serve writs, executions upon actions, and summonses from above, as well as from the courts below. Each of these serjeants gives 400l. security to the sheriff, for the due execution of his office. Four of these serjeants, and as many yeomen out of each compter, wait upon their respective sheriffs daily; and during the time of sessions, double the number. At which time in the morning they bring the prisoners down from Newgate to the Sessions-house; put them in the dock; and after waiting all day, return the prisoners back to the jail at night; they also attend at the execution of prisoners. Upon their days of waiting they always wear blue cloth gowns, which are given them annually by the sheriffs.

* In this alley was formerly a large house, known by the name of the Scalding-house; for the street called the Poultry containing a number of Poulterers stalls, the fowls they sold there were first scalded in this house.

To each compter also belongs a master-keeper, and under him two turnkeys, and other servitors.

The poorer sort of prisoners, as well in this compter as that in Wood-street, receive daily relief from the sheriffs table, of all the broken meat and bread; and there are also several benefactions made by charitable persons, for the releasement of those, whose debts are small, or perhaps have lain a considerable time for want of discharging the prison fees.

On the north side of the Poultry, and at the farther end of Grocers-alley (formerly called Coney-hope-lane) stands

GROCCERS HALL.

This building is situate on a spot of ground purchased by the Grocers company in the year 1411, of Robert Fitz-Walter, for three hundred and twenty marks. The building is well designed and executed for the purposes of a common hall; and is not only a stately edifice, but so capacious, that for many years it served for the uses of the Bank of England, which was kept in this hall, till the edifice in Threadneedle-street was erected for that purpose. The ancient stone and brick building at the north west corner of the garden, inhabited by the beadle of the company, is probably part of the ancient city mansion of the noble family of Fitz-Walter, and consequently the oldest building within the city walls.

The company of Grocers is the second of the twelve principal companies, and was anciently denominated Pepperers; but having changed their name to that of Grocers, were, under that denomination, incorporated by letters patent of Edward III, in the year 1345, by the name of "The wardens and commonalty of the mystery of the Grocers of the city of London;" which was confirmed by Henry VI. in the year 1429. These grants were afterwards confirmed by a new charter of Charles I. in the year 1640, with an additional power of searching and inspecting the goods and weights of all Grocers within the city and suburbs of London, and three miles round. They had anciently the management of the king's beam in the city, with the right of appointing a master-weigher, and four porters to attend it.

This corporation consists of a prime minister and three other wardens, with a numerous court of assistants. It is a livery company; and out of their possessions they pay about 700l. per annum to the poor.

About the middle of Grocer's-alley, on the west side is Dove-court, which leadeth into the Old Jewry, * nearly opposite, at present, (1769)

The EXCISE OFFICE.

This is a large brick building, formerly the dwelling-house of Sir John Frederick: and tho' it has nothing to recommend it in its outward appearance, yet it is capacious and well adapted for the particular uses to which the government have appointed it. It is the principal office of excise within his majesty's dominions, and is managed by nine commissioners whose appointments are 1000l. per annum each. Under these are a great number of officers, both within and without the house, viz. five commissioners for appeals; a secretary with three clerks; five accountants general; four general surveyors; a receiver general; comptroller of the cash; inspector general for coffee and tea; an auditor of excise; an auditor of hides, and a comptroller, with clerks in each office.

These receive the produce of excise on beer, ale, and spirituous liquors; on tea, coffee, and chocolate; on malt, hops, soap, starch, candles, paper, calicoes, gold and silver wire, vellum, parchment, hides and skins, plate, and wheels of body carriages, collected all over England, and pay it into the exchequer. And for the collecting, surveying, &c. of which monies, and things exciseable, they have a great number of out-door officers in all parts of the kingdom, regulated within certain districts, or divisions, both horse and foot, to gauge, and to prevent frauds and loss in the duties of excise. Before the commissioners of excise are tried all frauds committed in the several branches of the revenue under their direction; without any appeal, except to the commissioners of appeal for a rehearing.

This office is intended to be removed, as soon as the new structure, now erecting on the site of Gresham college, is finished.

On the north of Cheapside, almost in the center between the Old Jewry and Ironmonger-lane, is situate

MERCERS HALL and CHAPEL.

On this spot, in ancient times, stood an hospital dedicated to St. Thomas of Acars, or Acons, and was founded by Thomas Fitz-Theobald de Heili, and his wife Agnes, sister to Thomas-à-Becket, who was born on the same spot in the reign of king Henry II.

Thomas-à-Becket (to whom this hospital or chapel was probably dedicated) was the son of Gilbert Becket, a citizen of London, and of Matildis his wife, who was the daughter of a pagan prince, under whose custody Gilbert being taken prisoner, when he travelled into the Holy Land, was for a year and a half in confinement, and at last escaping by the help of this Matildis (who fell in love with him, being converted to the christian religion) he came again safe into England, whom Matildis, not long after, for love of him, adventured to follow, and getting away from her father, came at last to London, where finding Gilbert, he married her, and of her begat this Thomas, who was born in his father's house, which was then in the place where Mercerschapel in Cheapside now stands.

* This street was originally called the Jewry, from its being the residence of the Jews in this city; but the Jews being banished by Edward I. they, upon their re-admission into England, settled near Aldgate, in a place from them called Poor Jewry-lane; on which occasion this, their ancient place of abode was called the Old Jewry.

He was murdered in his own cathedral church at Canterbury, on Innocent's day, at even, anno 1170, as he was going up the steps towards the choir, by four knights, named Reynald Fitz-Urse, Hugh de Mortenill, William de Tracy, and Richard Briton, none of which (as the report is) lived above three years after, and then died very penitent. And as he suffered for his zeal in defence of the papacy, we find him soon after canonized, and worshipped by the pope's command.

Why this chapel was dedicated to St. Thomas-à-Becket, by the name of St. Thomas of Acons, is not perfectly known; but the following account, from the X. Scriptores, seems very probable: when the city of Acars, or Acon, in the Holy Land called also Ptolematis) was besieged by the christians, one William, an Englishman by nation, being chaplain to Radulphus de Diceto, dean of London, when he went to Jerusalem, bound himself by a vow, that if he should prosperously enter Acon, he would build a chapel to St. Thomas the Martyr, at his own charge, according to his ability; and would procure there, to the honour of the said martyr, a church-yard to be consecrated; which was done. Then many flocking from all parts to serve in this chapel, William himself, as a token of his christianity, took on him the name of prior; who, whilst he served bodily as a soldier of Christ, had an especial care of the poor, and he freely bestowed all his diligence and labour, in burying the bodies of such as died, as well natural, as of others who were slain with the sword, representing himself in man's sight, the next successor of that great Tobias.

There is another testimony out of the Theatre of honour, lib. 9. cap. 11. where the author repeating the military orders of the Holy Land, faith thus: "The order of St. Thomas was instituted by the king of England, Richard, surnamed Cœur de Lyon, after the surprisal of Acars, and being of the English nation, they held the rule of St. Augustin, wore a white habit, and a full red cross, charged in the middle with a white scallop; they took for their patron the archbishop of Canterbury, the metropolitan of England, Thomas-à-Becket, who suffered martyrdom (as his favourers say) under the king of England, Henry II. of that name. Peter de Rupibus, bishop of Winchester, who had been five years in the Holy Land, removed the church there of St. Thomas the martyr, from an unfit place to a more convenient, and caused the patriarch of Jerusalem to take order, that the brethren of this church, who were before laymen, might be under the order of the Templers, wearing a cross on their breast. He bequeathed also to this house of St. Thomas of Acons, 500 marks." So much M. Paris in vita Hen. III. p. 472. sub anno 1238.

Hereby it is clear, that the dedication of this hospital, or chapel, to St. Thomas of Acons, or Acars, must have relation to the like dedication of the chapel and holy order in the city of Acars, in the Holy land to the same archbishop; all these three dedications being near about one and the same time, within few years after the archbishop's death. And it is probable, that in imitation of those dedications at Acars, this in London might do the like.

From this St. Thomas anciently was a solemn procession used by the new mayor; who, the afternoon of the day he was sworn at the exchequer, met with the aldermen here; whence they repaired together to St. Paul's, and there prayed for the soul of the bishop William at his tomb; who was bishop of London in the time of William the conqueror. Then they went to the church-yard, to a place where Thomas-à-Becket's parents lay; and there they prayed for all faithful souls departed. And then they went all back to St. Thomas of Acons again; and both mayor and aldermen offered each a penny.

This hospital, after its surrender, 30 Hen. VIII. was purchased by the mercers company, and opened by them immediately under the name of Mercer's chapel. They were both destroyed by the fire of London in 1666; after which the school was re-established and built over or near the site of St. Mary Cole-church, at the south west end of the Old Jewry. The hall and chapel were rebuilt upon their former foundation, with one front in Ironmonger-lane, and the other towards Cheapside; the latter of which is adorned with a very handsome entrance; the door-case is enriched with the figures of two-cupids mantling the company's arms, and with festoons, &c. and over it the balcony is adorned with two pilasters of the Ionic order, and a pediment; with the figures of Faith, Hope and Charity, and other entablatures.

The inner court is adorned with piazzas, formed of columns of the Doric order; the hall room and great parlour are wainscoted with oak, and ornamented with Ionic pilasters; and the ceiling with fret work. The chapel is neatly wainscoted, and paved with black and white marble.

The company of mercers, which is the first of the twelve principal companies, was incorporated by letters patent, granted by king Richard II. in the year 1393, under the title of, "The wardens and commonalty of the mystery of the mercers of the city of London." The members of this company are not only exempt from quarterage, but upon their admission to the livery, pay only a small fine. They are governed by a prime, three other wardens, and a court of assistants; and pay in charitable benefactions about three thousand pounds per annum.

More westward from this hall is King-street, at the north extremity of which stands

GUILDHALL.

This is the hall in which are kept the nine courts for transacting the business of the city, viz.

1. The court of common-council.
2. The court of Lord mayor and aldermen.
3. The court of hustings.
4. The court of orphans.
5. The two courts of the sheriffs.
6. The court of wardmote.
7. The court of hallmote.
8. The court of requests, commonly called the court of conscience.

9. The

9. The Chamberlain's court for binding and apprentices, and making them free.

The Guildhall stood formerly in or near Aldermanbury, or Aldermens-court, from which situation of this hall the street is said to take its denomination, and consequently the hall must have been founded before the year 1189; for then we find this street to have had that name. The old hall, however, being fallen to decay, the present structure was begun in the year 1411, upon a larger and more noble plan, and ten years were employed in compleating it; towards the charge whereof the companies gave great benevolences. The executors of Richard Whittington gave a purbeck pavement to the hall, and glazed some of the windows, on each of which Whittington's arms were placed; others of the aldermen glazed different windows, and had also their arms painted on the glass.

The hall being, however, much damaged by the fire of London in 1666, was repaired and beautified three years after, at the expence of two thousand five hundred pounds, in so effectual a manner, that it has stood to the present time.

The entrance has a stately Gothic frontispiece, enriched with the king's arms under a cornice, pediment and vase, and between two cartouches and the city supporters, on acrosters, and these between two other vases, under which are niches; and in the middle of this front are the following words done in gold: (though so obliterated by time as not to be intelligible to the spectator)

Over the gate is a balcony, above which are placed in niches on each side, the figures of Moses and Aaron; and on the sides beneath are the four cardinal virtues, over the aperture; and below the balcony are depicted the arms of the twenty-four companies.

On entering this Gothic arch, you come into the hall, which is one hundred and fifty-three feet long, forty-eight broad, and fifty-five feet high. The roof is flat, and divided into panels; the walls on the north and south sides are adorned with four Gothic demi-pillars, painted white with blue veins, and gilt capitals, upon which are the royal arms, and those of Edward the confessor, who, in all probability, had a considerable share in the foundation of this ancient building.

Nearly fronting the gate are nine or ten steps, leading to the Lord-mayor's court, over which is a balcony supported at each end by four iron pillars in the form of palm-trees; by these is a small inclosure on each side on the top of the steps, used on some occasions as offices for clerks to write in, each being just sufficient to hold one person. Under these are two prisons called Little Ease, from the lowness of the ceiling, by which prisoners were obliged to sit on the floor. These prisons are intended for city apprentices, who upon complaint, and a strict examination into the offence, were sometimes committed thither by the Chamberlain, whose office is at the right hand at the head of the steps.

In the front of this balcony is a clock, on the frame of which is carved the four cardinal virtues, with the figure of Time on the top, and a cock on each side of him. Behind this clock are two giants of an enormous size, which stand on the outside of the balcony close to the wall, one on each side; they have black and bushy beards; one holds an halbert, and the other a ball set round with spikes, hanging by a chain to a long staff. These ornaments are supposed to represent an ancient Briton and a Saxon.

Round the hall, on fourteen demi-pillars, above the capitals, are the king's arms on the north-eastward, and the arms of London on the south-eastward pillar: and westward from them are the arms of the twelve companies.

At the east end are the king's arms, between the portraits, finely painted, of their present majesties king George III. and queen Charlotte; close by the first is the picture of queen Caroline; and by the latter his late majesty king George II. And at the same end of the hall, on the south side, are the pictures of king George I. and queen Mary; directly opposite to which, on the north side, are those of king William III. and queen Anne. The inter-columns are painted in imitation of porphyry, and embellished with the pictures, in full proportion, of twenty-two judges, which were there put up by the city in gratitude for their signal services done in determining differences between landlords and tenants, without the expence of law-suits, in rebuilding the city, pursuant to an act of parliament, after the fire of London. To these the city of London has lately added the picture, in full proportion, of the late chief justice Pratt, now lord Camden, and lord-high-chancellor of England.

At the east end of the hall is held the court of hustings, and occasionally that of the exchequer; and before the hustings is held the Court of Conscience. At the west end is held alternately the sheriffs court for the Poultry and Wood-street compters. Opposite to the Chamberlain's office, already mentioned, is the office of auditors of the city accounts, within which is the Lord-mayor's court office, where the lord chief-justice occasionally sits in trials by nisi prius. On the west side of the mayor's court office is the court of Orphans, where the lord chief-justice of the common-pleas occasionally sits. Adjoining to this court on the north is the Old Council Chamber, now used by the commissioners of bankrupts; contiguous to which is the New Council Chamber. Beneath the Mayor's court is the Town Clerk's office, where are deposited the city archives. To the east and north are the residences of the Chamberlain and Town Clerk; near which are two rooms wherein the business of bankrupts is executed. Adjoining to the north-west is the kitchen; in the porch is the Comptroller's office; and over it the Irish chamber. And over the piazzas on the west, are the offices belonging to the Common Serjeant, Remembrancer, and City Solicitor.

This hall is generally used for the entertainment of our kings, queens, and other potentates, foreign ministers, &c. and for chusing the Lord-mayors, sheriffs, members of parliament, &c.

Guildhall-chapel, which is situate between Blackwell-hall and Guildhall, was founded in the year 1299, dedicated to St. Mary Magdalen and All Saints, and called London college. A chauntry was founded in this chapel for four chaplains, and lands and tenements left for their support. It was rebuilt in the reign of Henry VI. and received new endowments: but at the suppression of religious houses it reverted to the crown, and was bought of king Edward VI. with other lands and tenements, for the sum of 456l. 13s. 4d. And the city holds it in soccage of the manor of Greenwich. It was defaced, but not burnt down by the fire of London in 1666, and was afterwards repaired.

This edifice is perfectly in the Gothic taste. In several niches are set the figures in stone of king Edward VI. of queen Elizabeth, with a phoenix under her; and of king Charles I. treading on a globe. The windows are extremely large, and the walls within-side are hung with tapestry. Over the aldermen's seats there is a wainscot covering, and a particular seat for the Lord-mayor, adorned with cartouches. There is a gallery at the west end, a handsome wainscot pulpit and desk, and a neat altar piece inclosed with rails and banisters.

The chapel remaineth to the mayor and commonalty, wherein they have service weekly; as also at the election of mayor, and at the mayor's feasts, &c.

On the south-side of this chapel was formerly a library belonging to Guildhall and the college. But it is said that in the reign of king Edward VI. Edward duke of Somerset, then lord protector, sent for the books with a promise of returning them; but that promise being never after fulfilled, the room has been long made a storehouse for cloths.

On the north side of Cateaton-street, and at the south west corner of Guildhall-yard, is situate the parish church of

St. LAWRENCE JEWRY.

This church is thus denominated from its being dedicated to St. Lawrence, a native of Huesca, in the kingdom of Arragon in Spain, who, after having suffered the most dreadful torments under the emperor Valerian, was cruelly broiled alive upon a gridiron, with a slow fire, till he died. And it received the additional epithet of Jewry, from its situation among the Jews, who formerly resided in the streets near that church; to distinguish it from St. Lawrence Poultney, now demolished.

This church, which was anciently a rectory, being given by Hugo de Wickenbroke to Baliol college in Oxford, anno 1294, the rectory ceased; wherefore Richard, bishop of London, converted the same into a vicarage; the advowson whereof still continues in the master and scholars of the said college.

This church being burnt, with many others, in the dreadful fire of London 1666, was rebuilt at the parish expence, with a very considerable benefaction by Sir John Langham; and the parish of St. Mary Magdalen, Milk-street, thereunto annexed.

It is eighty one feet long, sixty eight broad, forty feet high to the roof, and the steeple one hundred and thirty feet high. The body is enlightened by two series of windows, the lower ones large and uniform, and the upper small. At the east end is a pediment with niches, supported by Corinthian columns. The tower, which is lofty, is terminated by a balustrade with plain pinnacles, and within this balustrade rises a kind of lanthorn, which supports the base of the spire.

The income to the incumbent, for this united parish, is settled by act of parliament at 120l. per annum, paid by the parish in lieu of tythes, and 20l. per annum from Baliol college.

Here is a gift sermon every Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, well endowed by lady Cambden. And over the vestry is a free-school.

It is an impropriation in the gift of Baliol college. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are two churchwardens.

The church of St. Mary Magdalen, Milk-street, whose parish is annexed to St. Lawrence Jewry, stood on the east side and towards the south end of Milk-street, near Cheapside, in the milk market, and was in the gift of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, as early as the reign of king Henry I. The site of this church, after the fire of London, was laid into Honey-lane market: but the parishioners still maintain their own poor, and have one churchwarden.

Having thus arrived at the place from whence we set off, we shall leave this ward, and proceed to the next chapter.

CHAPTER XI.

OF COLEMAN-STREET WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from the principal street therein; so called from one Coleman, who, in all probability, was either the builder or a principal owner or inhabitant thereof. It is bounded on the north by Cripplegate ward, Upper Moorfields, and Bishopsgate ward; on the east by Bishopsgate ward, Broad-street ward, and Cheap ward; on the south by Cheap ward; and on the west by Bassishaw ward. Its extent from east to west is, from the grate by Lothbury church, to the south side of Ironmonger-lane; but no farther than the south west corner of Basinghall-street on the north side; and, in the other direction it extends south from Moorgate to the garden belonging to Grocers-hall in the Poultry.

This ward is divided into six precincts; and is governed by an alderman, six common-councilmen, six constables, thirteen inquest men, six scavengers, and a beadle.

The principal streets in this ward are, Coleman-street; the north part of the Old Jewry; Lothbury, from Coleman-street to St. Margaret's church on the north side, and on the south to about twenty-seven feet beyond Princes-street; the north side of Cateaton-street, from Basinghall-street to Coleman-street, and the south side from Ironmonger-lane.

The most remarkable buildings are, the parish churches of St. Stephen Coleman-street, St. Margaret's Lothbury, and St. Olave's Jewry; Founders-hall, and the Armourers and Braziers-hall.

In surveying this ward we shall begin at that part of it which takes in the Old Jewry; a street that runs north and south into Cheapside, and is inhabited by merchants and persons of repute. It retains the ancient name given to this part of London on account of its being the principal place of residence for Jews at their first arrival and settlement in England after the conquest; and before that known by the name of Colechurch-street, so called from the church of St. Mary Colechurch, situate at the south end thereof.

Near the center of this street, on the west side, is situate the parish church of

S. OLAVE'S JEWRY.

This church is of very ancient foundation, and was originally called St. Olave's Upwell, from its dedication to the saint of that name, and probably from a well under the east end, wherein a pump is at this time placed; but that gave way to the name of Jewry, owing to this neighbourhood becoming the principal residence of the Jews.

This parish was antiently a rectory, the patronage of which was in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, till about the year 1181, when it was transferred by them, with the chapel of St. Stephen, Coleman-street, to the prior and convent of Butley, in Suffolk: and became a vicarage. At the suppression of that convent the impropriation was forfeited to the crown, in which it still remains.

The old church was burnt down in 1666, and made way for the present edifice, which is built partly with brick, and stone facias. It is seventy-eight feet long, twenty-four broad, thirty-six feet high to the roof, and eighty-eight feet to the top of the tower and pinnacles, which are all of stone. The door is of the Doric order, well proportioned, and covered with an arched pediment. The tower is very plain; and on the upper part of it rises a cornice supported by scrolls; and upon this plain attic course, on the pillars at the corners, are placed the pinnacles, upon balls, and each terminated on the top by a ball. It is a well enlightened body. The floor is paved with purbeck, and the walls wainscotted. The pulpit is enriched with carvings of cherubims; the altar-piece is adorned with the king's arms, and the communion table is set upon an anabathrum of black and white marble.

In this church are likewise three famous pieces of painting, 1. Of queen Elizabeth, lying on a fine couch with her regalia, under an arched canopy, on which are placed her arms. 2. Of king Charles I. 3. Of the figures of Time, with wings displayed, a scythe in his right hand, and an hour glass in his left: at his foot is a cupid dormient, and under him a skeleton eight feet long.

To this church, which is vicarage, is annexed the parish of St. Martin, Ironmonger-lane, and both together are of the value of 120l. per annum, as settled by parliament, in lieu of tythes. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are two churchwardens.

In this church is a lecture founded at twenty-nine pounds per annum by lady Weld, Mr. Vaughn, and Sir John Frederick; to be preached every Wednesday, for eight months, to begin on the first Wednesday in October, and to end in the last Wednesday in May, annually.

The parish of St. Martin Ironmonger lane (annexed to St. Olave's Jewry) was a rectory, the church whereof stood at the corner of church-alley, and on the east side of Ironmonger-lane; the site of which remains now only as a burial place for the inhabitants of this parish.

The patronage of this rectory appears antiently to have been in lay hands; for Ralph Tricker, in the reign of Henry III. granted the same to the prior and canons of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield, which was confirmed to them by the said king in the year 1233; from which time it continued in the said prior and canons till the dissolution of their convent by Henry VIII. after which it came to the crown who now presents to these two united livings. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are two churchwardens.

to

Near to the north east corner of the Old Jewry stood the first synagogue of the Jews, which was destroyed in the massacre of that nation, when seven hundred Jews were murdered, and their goods spoiled by the citizens of London, in the year 1262. The site whereof was given by queen Eleanor to the friars called de penitentia Jesus, or de Sacca, an order of begging friars, 56 Henry III. After whose suppression, by a decree of the council of Lyons, king Edward I. in the year 1305, granted leave to the said friars to assign unto Robert Fitz-Walter their chapel and church, of old time called the synagogue of the Jews, which near adjoined with its back front to the mansion place of the said Robert, now Grocer's-hall. The site of that synagogue, &c. after various alterations is now partly covered with a good private dwelling-house in front, and backward with a handsome capacious meeting-house of the presbyterian denomination; and with two alms-houses in Windmill-court, for nine poor widows of armourers and braziers, founded by Mr. Tindal, and endowed by six shillings per quarter, and nine bushels of coals annually; and with twenty shillings per quarter to those widows who are incapable of doing any business.

On this spot, in ancient times, stood one large building of stone, made in the place of the Jews houses, which reached from the parish church of St. Olave to the north end of the Old Jewry, and from thence west to the north end of Ironmonger-lane; and from the said corner into Ironmonger-lane, almost to the parish church of St. Martin; but of what antiquity, or by whom the same was built, or for what use, is uncertain; more than that king Henry VI. in the 16th of his reign, gave the office of porter or keeper thereof to John Stent, for the term of his life, by the name of his principal palace in the Old Jewry. And king Richard III. committed the keeping of the prince's wardrobe (for so it was afterwards called) to his trusty servant John Kendall, his secretary, by his patent, dated December 12, 1483, and left him to dwell in the same. And in the reign of Edward VI. it was alienated from the crown, being called a great messuage, under the name of the prince's wardrobe; to which belonged divers houses; edifices, gardens, &c. being sold to Sir Anthony Cope, a privy counsellor in 3 Edward VI. for sixty pounds, and in consideration of services; the yearly value being reckoned at six pounds twelve shillings and four pence.

Nearly opposite the north end of the Old Jewry is Coleman-street, which is a broad spacious street, and well inhabited by eminent merchants, and reputable tradesmen and shopkeepers. Near the north east corner of this street stands

ARMOURERS HALL,

Which is an old pain brick building. The fraternity of armourers were incorporated by king Henry VI., about the year 1423, by the title of, "The master and wardens, brothers and sisters of the fraternity of or guild of St. George, of the men of the mysteries of the armourers of the city of London." The same prince also honoured the company by becoming one of their members. To this company, which formerly made coats of mail, is united that of the braziers, who are jointly governed by a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants.

On the west side of this street, and near the south end, stands the parochial church of

St. STEPHEN, COLEMAN-STREET.

This church is of great antiquity, and was originally a chapel belonging to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, who between the years 1171, and 1181, granted the church of St. Olave Jewry, together with this chapel, as an appendage to it, to the prior and abbot of Butley, in Suffolk.

This chapel was made parochial in the year 1456, but continued under the patronage of the prior and canons of Butley, till the suppression of that convent, when it came to the crown. However, in the year 1577, queen Elizabeth granted the patronage, together with the church and rectory, to Thomas Paskins and others, and in 1590 to William Daniel, serjeant at law, and other parishioners; which rectory impropriate, and right of advowson, have been held by the parish in fee-farm of the crown ever since.

The old church sharing the common fate in the dreadful fire of London in 1666, the present structure was erected in its stead about four years after. It is a plain, neat, and solid building, strengthened with rusticated at the corners, and enlightened by one series of large windows, with a handsome cornice, and one of the broadest ceilings and roofs that can be seen, without a pillar to support it. The steeple is a square tower, crowned with a lantern, which has four faces, and incloses the sacring-bell, to call the parishioners to prayers, read twice here every day, for which the parish pays the vicar 20l. per annum. The front is adorned with a cornice, two pine-apples, and the figure of a cock handsomely carved. Within it is well wainscotted and pewed; has a handsome pulpit neatly carved, and an altar-piece adorned with the king's arms, carved, gilt, and depicted, a black and white marble foot piece to the communion table, inclosed with a neat rail and bannister; and at the west end is a commodious wainscot gallery.

On the north side is the green church-yard: on the south is a large pavement that covers a burial vault the whole length of the church: to which pavement you ascend by several steps, through a gate, over which is cut in stone a most curious representation of the general resurrection.

This living is settled at 110l. per annum by act of parliament. The advowson is in the parishioners that pay to church and poor. The vestry vestry is in some cases select; and the parish officers are two churchwardens and four overseers.

Among the monumental inscriptions in this church are the following :

1. Our life is all but death ; time that ensueth,
Is but the death of time that went before :
Youth is the death of childhood ; age of youth.
Die once to God, and then thou diest no more.
2. Agnes the wife of Leonard Darr, whose sight,
By sickness much impair'd, in heav'nly light,
Look'd, liv'd and died, as dimness her were given;
That her soul's eyes might better look to heav'n.

On the east side of Coleman-street, farther north, is Great Bell-alley, which runs east and west, and makes an angle with Little Bell-alley, that runs north and south to Thompson's-rents. The west side of Little Bell-alley opens into Pitchers-court, Mulberry-court and White's-alley, which is long and narrow, leading into Coleman-street. In the middle of this alley is a place called Alms-house-yard, containing six houses, for six poor men and their wives, and the survivors of them, in the gift of the leathersellers company.

At the north east corner of Lothbury, which is well built and inhabited, stands the parochial church of

ST. MARGARET, LOTHBURY.

This church receives its name from being dedicated to St. Margaret, a virgin saint of Antioch, who suffered martyrdom in the reign of the emperor Decius; and the additional appellation of Lothbury is to point out its situation, and distinguish it from the other churches in this city of the same name. The antiquity of its foundation may be collected from the presentation of John de Haslingfield to this rectory, by the abbess and convent of Barking in Essex, on the sixteenth of August, in the year 1303, in whom the advowson continued, till the convent being suppressed, it fell to the crown; in whom it still remains.

The old church, which was built in 1440, being destroyed by the general conflagration in 1666, the present stone edifice was erected in its stead, and completed in 1690. It stands upon the ancient course of Wallbrook, and is a plain, neat building. It is sixty-six feet in length, and fifty-four in breadth: the height to the roof is thirty-six, and the height of the steeple 140 feet. The body is well enlightened by a row of lofty windows; over which the wall is terminated by a balustrade; and the principal door is ornamented with Corinthian columns, which support an angular pediment. The tower has large windows in the uppermost stage, and is terminated a little above by a plain cornice, upon which is raised a small dome that supports a slender spire. Within it is wainscotted; the floor neatly paved; the pulpit veneered; the altar-piece ornamented; and the font remarkably handsome, the basen being carved, and representing the garden of Eden, and the Fall of Man; the salvation of Noah and his family in the ark; the baptism of Jesus by John baptist, and Philip baptizing the eunuch: and the cover is adorned with the figures of St. Margaret, Faith, Hope, and Charity.

On the north side of the church, in the churchyard, is a good parsonage-house. The value of the living is settled by act of parliament at 100l. per annum in lieu of tythes. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, four overseers, and twelve auditors of accounts.

More westward from this church is Founders-court, at the north end of which is situate

FOUNDERS HALL.

This hall is not only used for transacting the business of the company, but likewise let out to a congregation of the Scotch kirk; of which denomination there is but one other in England.

The fraternity of Founders was incorporated by letters patent of the 12th of king James I. in the year 1614, by the name of "The master, wardens, and commonalty of the mystery of Founders of the city of London;" and they have power to search all brass weights, and brass and copper wares, within the city of London, and three miles thereof. And all makers of brass weights within that circuit are obliged to have their several weights sized by the company's standard, and marked with their common mark: and such of these weights as are of avoirdupois, to be sealed at the Guildhall of this city; and those of troy weight at Goldsmiths-hall.

This company enjoys the privilege of the livery, and is governed by a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants.

At the north-east extremity of this ward, on the south side of Moorfields, is situate

BETHLEHEM HOSPITAL.

This hospital, as before observed in the survey of Bishopsgate, was founded for lunatics, near the north east corner of Lower Moorfields, in Bishopsgate parish. But that becoming ruinous, and unable to answer the ends of that laudable charity, the Lord-mayor, aldermen, and common-council, granted the governors the piece of ground on which this hospital now stands; the foundation of which was laid in the month of April 1675. And the expence of erecting this edifice, besides that of building the wings, amounted to near 17,000l.

This magnificent building, (exclusive of the two wings which were added after its first erection) is 540 feet in length, and 40 feet in breadth.

The middle and ends, which project a little, are adorned with pilasters, entablatures, foliages, and other ornaments, and rising above the rest of the building, have each a flat roof with a handsome balustrade of stone, in the center of which is an elegant turret. That in the middle is adorned with a clock and three dials, a gilt ball, and a fane at the top.

The entrance is grand, and the figures on the piers, one representing raving, and the other melancholy madness, are finely expressed, and do honour to their author Mr. Cibber, father of the late poet laureat. Before this fabric is a handsome wall 680 feet in length, which, like the structure itself, is built with brick and stone. It encloses a range of gardens neatly adorned with walks of broad stone, grass plats and trees, wherein those of the lunaticks who are well enough to be suffered to go about, are allowed to walk there and enjoy the benefit of the fresh air. In the middle of this wall is a large pair of fine iron gates, and by them a small entrance for the admission of those who come out of curiosity to visit this hospital.

The inside chiefly consists of two galleries one over the other, which cross the wings, and are 193 yards long, thirteen feet high, and sixteen feet broad; without including the cells for the patients, which are twelve feet deep. These galleries are divided in the middle by two iron grates, in order to separate the men from the women; the latter being confined to the western part, and the former to the eastern part of the hospital. At the entrance, between these two grates in the lower gallery, and on the right hand close to the porter's lodge, is an handsome apartment for the steward, who is the manager, under the direction of the committee. On the left hand is the committee room, where they sit every Saturday to receive and discharge patients; and at each end of this gallery the warder of the division has a particular apartment. Above there are commodious apartments for the porter, matron, nurse, and servants. Below stairs there is a good kitchen, and all necessary offices for keeping and dressing provisions, washing, &c. And at the south east corner there is the surgeon's quarter, with a bath for the patients, so contrived as to be hot or cold, as occasion shall require.

There are about two hundred cells, or rooms for patients, which are generally full and furnished with a bed, when the patient is found capable of using one; or with clean straw every day, when the patient is mischievous, and destroys every thing that comes in the way.

The method of obtaining admission into this hospital is by petitioning to the committee; the petition to be signed by one or more of the governors. Then the committee and physician, who always attend on Saturdays, having examined and found the petitioner a proper object of their charity, he is admitted, upon bond given by two housekeepers in London, to take him away when discharged, and to be at the expence of his burial if he dies, and to provide him with cloaths.

When a patient is cured he is called before the committee and physicians, who examine him; and, if found fit to be discharged, the physician gives a certificate to that purport, and the steward of the house takes care to have him delivered to his friends: at which time the patient is furnished with medicines to prevent a relapse.

The hospitals of Bethlehem and Bridewell being made one corporation, they have the same president, treasurer, clerk, physician, surgeon and apothecary; yet each hospital has its proper steward and inferior officers, and a particular committee is chosen out of the governors for each. Out of that appointed for Bethlehem, there are six who meet every Saturday, to examine the stewards account of expences for the preceding week, and to sign it after it is approved: they also view the provisions, examine the patients that are to be received or discharged, and have the direction of other affairs belonging to this hospital.

Moorfields, in which this hospital is situate, is divided into four squares impaled, and each square planted regularly with elm trees round a grass plat. Between these squares, or quarters as they are generally called, are broad gravel walks from east to west, and from north to south, which, with the trees on each side, form a tolerable vista, and is so well frequented by the citizens of both sexes in the evenings and fine weather to walk in, that it has obtained the name of the city mall. The houses on the north and east are occupied principally by brokers, who deal in both new and old household goods. And the south side is entirely enclosed by Bethlehem hospital.

At the west end of this hospital formerly stood Moorgate; and on the paved stones, commonly called Pavement-row, there is a meeting house of the independent denomination.

Opposite the west end of Bethlehem, alias Bedlam hospital, is Fore-street, which is one of those improved by virtue of the late act of parliament. This street runs in a direct line to Cripplegate church; and from narrow, confined, irregular, and mean buildings, it is become an open, spacious street, accommodated with good houses, and well inhabited. The city wall from Moorgate to Cripplegate is removed, and the two posterns, that faced Basinghall-street and Aldermanbury have been taken down, and the passages into Fore-street widened, and lined with good and substantial houses. Among the various buildings which gave way to this improvement, was Loriners-hall, situated upon London-wall, between Moorgate and Basinghall-street.

This company of Loriners or bitt-makers were not incorporated till the year 1712, by the appellation of "The master, wardens, assistants, and commonalty of Loriners, London." They have a livery; and are governed by a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants, who at present transact their business at coach-makers-hall in Noble-street.

CHAPTER XII.

OF CORDWAINERS-STREET WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from the occupation of its principal inhabitants, who were cordwainers, or shoe-makers, curriers, or other workers in leather. It is bounded on the north by Cheap ward; on the west by Bread-street ward; on the south by Vintry ward; and on the east by Wallbrook ward.

The extent of this ward from the east begins on the west side of Wallbrook, and runs west towards Budge-row, and thence up Watling-street, as far as Red-lion-court: within which compass are these principal streets, or parts of them, viz. Watling-street, Bow-lane, Queen-street, Pancras-lane, Sithe-lane, Budge-row, Tower-royal, St. Thomas Apostles, and Little St. Thomas Apostles; exclusive of the courts, alleys, &c. It is divided into eight precincts; and is governed by an alderman, eight common-council-men, eight constables, fourteen inquest-men, eight scavengers and a beadle.

We shall begin the survey of this ward at Bow-lane, which begins at Trinity-lane, and falls into Cheapside by St. Mary-le-Bow-church. That part of it which is in this ward begins about fifty feet from Cheapside, on both sides the way; and sixty feet beyond Basing-lane; and then on the west only to Trinity-lane.

In this lane are the following courts, and places of note, viz.

Half-moon-court, by some called Lugg-yard, a place something open but ordinary: it is likewise called Whale-bone-court, from its being once inhabited by a person who used to boil whale-bone.

Taylor's-court, a handsome, open place.

Robinhood's-court, indifferent long, and well built.

New-court, a handsome genteel place, with a door next the street, to shut up on nights.

Goose-alley, but ordinary; at the upper end of which is Twelve-bell-court, which is but small and narrow. It hath a passage through Compter's-alley into Bow-church-yard; both places of small account.

George-alley, or yard, but narrow, hath a passage into New Queen-street, through Weld-court, which is a handsome square place, with well built and inhabited houses.

Rose-court, but mean and ordinary.

New Queen-street, which is built in the place where (before the fire of London) Soper's-lane stood, is a handsome spacious street well inhabited: it fronts King-street, which is opposite to Guildhall, and runs in a strait line down to the Thames, at the Three-cranes; but that part of it which is in the ward goeth no farther than St. Thomas-Apostles.

Pancras-lane comes out of New Queen street, and falls into Bucklersbury; but only the south side of it is in this ward. On the north side of this lane (before the fire in 1666) stood two churches, viz. Pancras Soper's-lane, and St. Bennet's Sherehog, both of which have been already mentioned.

Sithe-lane comes out of Pancras-lane, and falls into Budge-row, by St. Anthony's-church, a lane well built and inhabited by merchants.

Budge-row (which is so called from the Budge Furr and Skinners dwelling there) takes its rise from Watling-street, and runs eastward to Canon-street; from which it is severed by Wallbrook on the north, and Dowgate on the south. In this street is Dodson's-court, a large place, well built, and inhabited, and hath a passage into Cloak-lane. On the south side is a passage that leads into Tower-royal-street, which comes out of Budge-row, and falls into St. Thomas Apostle. In this street are two small courts, one of which bears the name of the street: the other is called Strawberry-court.

In Little St. Thomas are these courts:

Cross-keys-court, which is but small.

Key-court, likewise small and ordinary.

Eagle-court, pretty open, and indifferently well built and inhabited, with a freestone pavement.

Having thus surveyed the principal streets, lanes, courts, &c. in this ward, we shall now proceed to describe the most remarkable buildings, beginning with the parish church of

St. MARY LE BOW.

This church, which is a rectory, and the chief of the thirteen peculiars belonging to the archbishop of Canterbury, is situate at the north west angle of Bow-lane; and is so denominated from its dedication to the Virgin Mary, and the arches or bows wherewith the steeple was antiently embellished.

Though we cannot ascertain the time when, or by whom this church was founded, Sir Christopher Wren, the ingenious architect, who rebuilt the churches of this city after the conflagration in 1666, was of opinion that this was an ancient Roman christian church. It may, indeed, resemble the architecture of that people; but that it was not of their construction is evident from its having been erected in the time of William the Conqueror. And as it was the first church in this city, that was built with arches, it was therefore therefore denominated New-May church; which appellation has been since converted into that of St. Mary-le-Bow.

In the history of the ancient edifice, we find, that in the year 1271, a great number of people were destroyed, and many more maimed by the falling of the steeple*; after which it remained without one till the year 1512, when it was finished upon the old plan, with stone brought from Caen in Normandy; and thus continued till it was destroyed with the other buildings in the city, by the fire in 1666.

The present noble structure, which was built by the great Sir Christopher Wren, † was finished in 1673, and is chiefly admired for the elegance of its steeple, which is extremely light in its aspect, and though very high and full of openings, secure from any second fall by the geometrical proportion and lightness of its several parts.

The tower is square from the ground, and in this form rises to a considerable height; but with more ornament as it advances. The principal decoration of the tower part is the entrance, which is a noble, lofty, and well proportioned arch, on two of the sides faced with a bold rustic, and raised on a plain solid course from the foundation. Within the arch is a portal of the Doric order: the frieze ornamented in tryglyphs, and with sculpture in the metopes: over this arch is an opening, with a small balcony, which answers to a window on the other face. The first stage is terminated by an elegant cornice, over which again rises a plain course, where a dial projects. Above this, in each face, is a large arched window, with coupled Ionic pilasters at the sides near the corners. The cornice over the windows supports an elegant balustrade, with attic pillars over the Ionic columns, supporting turrets, each composed of four handsome scrolls, which join at the top, where are placed urns with flames. From this part the steeple rises circular. There is a plain course to the height of half the scrolls, and upon this are raised a circular range of Corinthian columns, while the body of the steeple is continued round and plain within them. These support a second balustrade, with very large scrolls extending from it to the body of the steeple. Above these are placed a series of composite columns, and from the entablature rises another set of scrolls, supporting the spire, which rests upon four balls, and is terminated by a globe, whence rises a vane in the form of a dragon.

The author of the Critical Review of the public buildings says, "The steeple of Bow church is a master-piece in a peculiar style of building: it is, beyond question, as perfect as human imagination can contrive or execute: and, till we see it outdone, we shall hardly think it to be equalled." In this church are twelve bells, whose harmony is said to be superior to any other set in the kingdom.

* See page 56.

† In digging the foundation for the new ground (the present edifice being brought about forty feet more towards the high-street, so as to make it range with the houses) Sir Christopher, to his great surprize, sunk about eighteen feet

After the fire of London, the parliament united to this church the parishes of Allhallows Honey-lane, and St. Pancras, whereby the incumbent's profits were considerably increased; he receiving, besides glebe, casualties, and three parsonage houses, 200l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens and two collectors.

Allhallows Honey-lane was a rectory; the church whereof stood where the east end of Honey-lane market is now situate.

The advowson of this church was anciently in private hands, as appears by Simon de Crapping, a citizen of London, presenting William de Coventre thereto in the year 1327. But in the year 1471 it came to the company of Grocers, in whom it still remains. It is united to St. Mary-le-Bow; but preserves its right as a parish to hold a general vestry, and to chuse one churchwarden, who is also collector for the poor.

The church of St. Pancras, which was a rectory, stood, before the fire of London, on the north side of St. Pancras-lane, near to Soper's-lane, now called New Queen-street.

The patronage of this rectory was in the prior and canons of Canterbury, till they granted the advowson thereof to Simon the archbishop in the year 1365; since which time it has been in the collation of the archbishop of that see. At present the parish being united by act of parliament to St. Mary-le-Bow, the site of the church remains only as a burial place for the inhabitants. The vestry is general, and the parish officers are two churchwardens.

Near the middle of Bow-lane, on the east side, is situate the parish church of

St. MARY ALDERMARY.

This church, which is a rectory, owes its name to its dedication to the Virgin Mary afore-said; and the additional epithet of Aldermay, or Elder Mary, from its being the oldest church in this city dedicated to the said virgin. It is one of the peculiars belonging to the archbishop of Canterbury; and was founded before the conquest, under the Saxon kings.

In the year 1510 Sir Henry Keble, Lord-mayor of London, bequeathed 1000l. towards rebuilding this church. And, in 1626, William Rodoway gave, towards the building of the steeple then greatly decayed, the sum of 3000l. and Richard Pierson, about the same year, gave 200 marks towards the same works, with condition that this steeple, thus to be built, should follow its ancient pattern, and go forward, and be finished, according to the foundation of it laid before by Sir Henry Keble, which, within three years after, was so finished, that, notwithstanding the body of the church was burnt in the fire of 1666, the steeple remained firm and good. That deep through made ground, under which he found a Roman causeway, four feet thick, of rough stone, close and well rammed, with Roman brick and rubbish at the bottom; on which causeway Sir Christopher laid the foundation of this weighty and lofty tower.

part of it which was consumed was afterwards rebuilt in its present form by the munificence of Henry Rogers, esq; as appears by the following inscription over the west door of the church.

Ædes hæc Deo O. M. jam olim sacra, quæ communi Urbis Incendis ad Cineres redacta, impensis Una Manu, sed larga & sanctissime prodiga, integre Quinque Librarum Millibus surrexit denus maxime munificentior. A. D. MDCLXXXI. Memoria Justæ in Benedictione.

This Gothic edifice is very spacious, it being an hundred feet in length and sixty-three in breadth; the height of the roof is forty-five feet, and that of the steeple an hundred and thirty-five. The body is enlightened by a single series of large Gothic windows. The wall has well contrived buttresses and battlements; these buttresses run up pilaster fashion, in two stages, not projecting in the old manner from the body of the building. The tower, which is full of ornament, consists of five stages, each of which, except the lowest, has one Gothic window; and the pinnacles, which are properly so many turrets, are continued at each corner down to the ground, divided into stages as the body of the tower, and cabled with small pillars bound round it, with a kind of arched work, and subdivisions between.

The parish church of St. Thomas Apostles being by act of parliament annexed to this church, the profits of the rector are greatly augmented, he receiving 150l. per annum in lieu of tythes, and about 100l. a year by glebe. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens (one of whom is collector) two sidersmen and four auditors of accounts.

There are two alms houses in this parish for the poor of the Salters company.

The church of St. Thomas Apostles, before the fire of London, stood where the burial place now is in Queen-street. It is a rectory of great antiquity, dedicated to St. Thomas the Apostle, and in the gift of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's; so that the archbishop of Canterbury and the dean of St. Paul's, present alternately to this united living.

The vestry of this parish is general; and the officers are two churchwardens and two sidersmen.

At the south-west corner of Sithe-lane, on the north side, and near the west end of Watling-street, is situate the parish church of St. ANTHONY, commonly called St. ANTLIN.

This church, which is a rectory, is so denominated from its dedication to St. Anthony, an Egyptian hermit, and founder of the order of Eremites of St. Anthony.

The patronage of this church is in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, who also give institution to it. Its foundation is not certainly known; but it was in the gift of the canons of St. Paul's in the year 1181.

The old church was destroyed by the fire in 1666, and the present edifice finished in 1682. It is built of stone, and is of the Tuscan order, firm and massy. The length of the church is sixty-six feet, and breadth fifty-four. The roof is a cupola of an elliptic form, enlightened by four port-hole windows, and supported by composite columns. The steeple consists of a tower, and a very neat spire.

The parish of St. John Baptist is annexed to this by act of parliament, and the rector receives 120l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

There are prayers in this church every morning, and a sermon preached on the six working days by different clergymen, each of whom receives about twelve pounds per annum. Which morning lecture was founded by the contribution of the parish, and of divers other pious persons, who gave in money 593l. 6s. 8d. and in yearly rents sixty-two pounds. Here is likewise a rent charge of ten pounds per annum paid to the rector on St. Thomas's day, left by one Mrs. Parker, who also gave five pounds to the clerk, and five pounds to the poor. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are two churchwardens and four auditors of accounts.

The church of St. John Baptist, whose parish is annexed to the above, stood so near Wallbrook, that it has sometimes been recorded by the name of St. John upon Wallbrook.

The antiquity of this church may be collected from the mention thereof by Ralph de Diceto, dean of St. Paul's in the year 1181, whose canons were the patrons, and gave it to the prioress and convent of St. Helen, London, in whom it continued till the suppression of their nunnery, when it came to the crown in which it still remains. So that the presentation to these united parishes is alternately in the king and dean and chapter of St. Paul's.

The site of St. John Baptist is converted into a burial place for the inhabitants of this parish, who still maintain the form of their own government, in a general vestry, and two churchwardens.

CHAPTER XIII.

OF CORNHILL WARD.

Cornhill-ward receives its name from the principal street therein, which was so called from a corn market anciently kept there.

This ward is bounded on the east by Bishopsgate ward; on the north by Broad-street ward; on the west by Cheap ward; and on the south by Langbourn ward. Its extent is very small: for, beginning on the north east, at the south east corner of St. Martin Outwich's church, it runs in several windings south west; to the west extent of Cornhill: then beginning again on the north at about fifty feet from the south west corner of Bishopsgate-street, it runs south to St. Peter's-alley in Gracechurch-street, and from thence by divers windings to the south west corner of Cornhill.

This ward is divided into four precincts, and is governed by an alderman, six common-councilmen, four constables, sixteen inquest-men, four scavengers, and a beadle.

On the north side of Cornhill are several lanes, courts, &c. as Star-court, Weigh house-yard, Newman's-yard, Finch-lane, Freeman's-court, Sweeting's-alley, Castle-alley, and the opening to the Bank. On the south side there are Peter's-alley, Michael's-alley, Birchin-lane, Change-alley, and Pope's-head-alley. There is no more than about 113 feet on both sides of Finch-lane from Cornhill in this ward; nor any more of Sweeting's-alley than as far as the east passage or entrance into the Royal Exchange, and one third at the south end of Castle-alley, the whole west side of which is covered with a new building, erected by the Bank, whose front is towards the new opening.

Birchin-lane, corruptly from Burehoover-lane, so denominated from the builder, has a small part, about 170 feet on both sides of the way, in this ward; and is chiefly inhabited by reputable tradesmen.

Change-alley, so called from its vicinity to the Royal Exchange, and the connexion or business there is between them, is situate with its north entrance facing the south gate of the Royal-Exchange. This place is universally known throughout the mercantile part of the world, on account of the business transacted there in money affairs; it being the grand market for buying and selling stocks, lottery tickets, &c. And the coffee-houses called Jonathan's, Garraway's, Baker's, &c. within this district, are contrived for the reception and entertainment of merchants, brokers, &c. who assemble here daily in great numbers from all parts of the world. But it is to be observed that no more of this alley is within Cornhill-ward, than the north passage, and the front houses opposite the Royal Exchange.

Pope's-head-alley takes its name from a noted tavern and eating-house formerly situated therein, whose sign, for several ages, was the Pope's-head.

This alley is narrow, and leads into Lombard-street; but well inhabited by those whose business requires their attendance near the Royal Exchange. Only the north entrance and front house in Cornhill is in this ward.

The remarkable buildings in this ward consist only of three, viz. St. Michael's church, St. Peter's church, and

The ROYAL EXCHANGE.

Which last is situate between Sweeting's-alley and Castle-alley; and was originally built by Sir Thomas Gresham. See page 205. The old edifice was destroyed in the great fire of London in the year 1666: in whose place the present magnificent structure was raised at the expence of 80,000l.

The ground plot of this building is 203 feet in length; 171 feet in breadth, and the area in the middle 61 square perches, and is surrounded with a substantial and regular stone building wrought in rustic. In each of the principal fronts, which are north and south, is a piazza; and in the center are the grand entrances into the area; under an extreme lofty and noble arch. The south front in Cornhill is the principal, on each side of which are Corinthian demi-columns, supporting a compass pediment; and in the intercolumniation on each side, in the front next the street, is a niche, with the figures of King Charles I. and king Charles II. in Roman habits, and well executed. Over the aperture, on the cornice between the two pediments, are the king's arms in relievo; on each side of this entrance is a range of windows, placed between demi-columns, and pilasters of the composite order, above which runs a balustrade.

The height of the building is fifty-six feet; and from the center, in this front, rises a lantern and turret 178 feet high, on the top of which is a fane in the form of a Grafshopper, made of polished brass, esteemed a very fine piece of workmanship; a Grafshopper being the crest of Sir Thomas Gresham's arms. This turret and fane has been very lately repaired and beautified.

The north front in Threadneedle-street is adorned with pilasters of the composite order; but has neither columns nor statues on the outside; and, instead of the two compass pediments, has a triangular one.

The

The inside of the area is surrounded with piazzas also; forming ambulatories for merchants, &c. to shelter themselves from weather, when met there upon business. Above the arches of this quadrangular piazza is an entablature standing round, and a compass pediment in the middle of the cornice of each of the four sides. Under the pediment, on the north side, are the king's arms; on the south the city arms; on the east Sir Thomas Gresham's arms; and on the west the merchants arms, with their respective enrichments.

There are twenty-four niches in the inter columns, twenty of which are filled with the statues of the kings and queens of England, standing erect in their royal robes, and with the regalia, except three, which are dressed like Roman Cæsars. Among these has been lately put up the statue of his present majesty king George III.

Within this area, under the piazzas, are twenty-eight niches, which are all vacant but that in which Sir Thomas Gresham's statue is placed in the north west angle; and that in the south west, where the statue of Sir John Barnard was placed in his life-time by his fellow citizens, to express the true sense of his merit, as a merchant, a magistrate, and as a wise, active and faithful representative of the city of London.

In the center of the area is erected, on a marble pedestal, about eight feet high, another statue of king Charles II. in a Roman habit, erected by Mr. Gibbon, and encompassed with iron rails. On the south side of the pedestal, under an imperial crown, a scepter, palm branches, and other decorations, is the following inscription:

Carolo II. Cæsari Britannico,
Patriæ Patri,
Regum Optimo, Clementissimo, Augustissimo,
Generis humani deliciis,
Utriusque Fortunæ Victori,

Regia benignitate floret,
Fidei intemeratæ et gratitudinis æternæ
Hoc testimonium
Venerabunda posuit
Anno salutis humanæ M.DC.LXXXIV.

On the west side of this pedestal is cut in relievo, a cupid resting his hand on a shield, containing the arms of France and England quartered, and holding in his left a rose.

On the north side are the arms of Ireland on a shield, supported by a cupid.

On the base of the pedestal on the south side is the following inscription:

"This statue was repaired and beautified by the company of Merchant adventurers of England, anno 1730; John Hanbury esq; governor."

And on the east side are the arms of Scotland, with a cupid holding a thistle; all done in relievo.

In this area merchants, and such as have dealings with them, meet every day, as in the center of mercantile business, between twelve at noon, and three o'clock: and for the more regular and easy dispatch of business, they dispose of themselves in separate walks, adapted to the respective places to and from which they trade.

Within the piazzas of the north and south fronts are two spacious stair-cases with iron rails, and black marble steps; these lead into a kind of gallery that extends round the four sides of the building, and in which were formerly about two hundred shops, occupied by milliners, haberdashers, &c. and lett from twenty pounds to sixty pounds a year each: but trade taking another turn, those shops have been long deserted; and the galleries are now let out to the Royal Exchange assurance office; the merchants seamen's office; the marine society, and to auctioneers, &c. And under the area are vaults occupied by the East-India company as a pepper warehouse.

In the turret is a good clock, which goes with chimes at three, six, nine, and twelve; it has four dials, and is so regulated every day, as to become a standard of time to all the mercantile parts of the town.

Within this building, as mentioned above, are kept the three following offices, viz.

1. THE ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE OFFICE.

This is a corporation established by act of parliament, for assuring houses and other buildings, goods, wares, and merchandize from fire; ships and merchandize at sea; and for lending money upon bottomry; and to insure lives. For which charter they agreed to pay 300,000l. into his majesty's exchequer, for discharging the debts of the civil list. But this not answering at first, the crown remitted most part of that money, and granted them a new charter to assure buildings, household furniture, wearing apparel by special agreement, goods, wares, and merchandize, except glass and china ware not in trade, and all manner of writings, books of accounts, notes, bills, bonds, tallies, ready money, jewels, plate, pictures, gunpowder, hay, straw, corn unthrashed, from loss or damage by fire, unless any of these goods excepted be assured by special agreement.

This corporation has several engines, and men, with proper tools and instruments, to extinguish fires; and also porters to remove goods when there happens an alarm of fire, who wear a badge on their arm, with the figure of the Royal Exchange upon it; and these badges are numbered, in order to ascertain the person who wears it, in case of any complaint against him.

The management of this corporation is in a governor, sub governor, deputy governor, and twenty-four directors; under whom are a treasurer, a secretary, an accomptant, and clerks.

2. The office for sick and wounded seamen in the merchants service.

This corporation was instituted for the relief of such seamen and their widows as have no right to Greenwich.

Greenwich-hospital by servitude aboard his majesty's navy, and are reduced to distress in the merchant's service. It consists of a number of merchants who were incorporated on the twenty-fourth of June, 1747, and are governed by a president, and a council of twenty-one.

3. The MARINE SOCIETY OFFICE.

The original intent of this society was to supply the royal navy with sea-boys and land-men. It was begun by a number of gentlemen, at the beginning of the late war; and had so good an effect, that great numbers of the lowest class of people, instead of remaining a pest to society, became useful ornaments to their country.

By this constitution every man of war, privateer, and merchant ship, is obliged to take a certain number of boys, viz. in a ship of 60 guns and 400 men, there must be thirty servants, which are provided and clothed by the marine society; who give to each boy, to be shipped, a felt hat, a worsted cap, a kersey sea jacket, a kersey pair of breeches, a striped flannel or kersey waistcoat, a pair of trowsers, two pair of hose, two pair of shoes, two handkerchiefs, three shirts, a pair of buckles and buttons, thread, worsted, and needles, a knife, a prayer-book and testament, and a bag to put their cloaths in. And to each landman shipped by them, a felt seaman's hat, a kersey sea jacket, a waistcoat and drawers of the same, a pair of drab breeches, a pair of thin trowsers, a pair of worsted hose, a pair of yarn hose, two shirts, two worsted caps, one pair of shoes, one pair of buckles, one pair of buttons, a knife, thread, worsted and needles, with a bag for their cloaths.

The charity is managed by a committee, which consists of a considerable number. Of this committee not less than three persons act, who meet every Thursday at eleven o'clock at the above office.

Leaving the Royal Exchange, we now cross to the other side the street, where, farther to the east, is situate the parish church of

St. MICHAEL, CORNHILL.

This church, which is a rectory, was founded and dedicated to St. Michael the Archangel before the year 1133, and then in the patronage of the abbot and convent of Covesham, alias Evesham; but they, in the year 1503, transferred the advowson to the Drapers company, who, in consideration thereof, settled a perpetual annuity of five pounds, six shillings and eight-pence upon the said abbot and canons, and their successors; besides an ancient pension of six shillings and eight-pence annually paid them out of the said church. By virtue of which contract, the said company of Drapers have been patrons ever since.

The old church being destroyed by the fire of London in 1666, the present Gothic structure arose in its stead: the body of which is 70 feet long, 60 broad, 35 in height, and 130 feet to the top of the tower. The lower part of the tower occupies the center, and on each side there is a regular extent of building. The principal door opens in the lower stage of the tower, which rises with angulated corners from the ground, forming a kind of base, terminated at the height of the body of the church. The second stage, which is plain and lofty, has two tall windows, one over the other, properly shaped for the style of the building; this is terminated with a truly Gothic cornice. The third stage is exactly in the form of the two others, only they are plain, and this is covered with ornaments, the angulated corners are fluted, and terminated by cherubim's heads under a cornice: the plain face between has four windows in two series. Above the cornice, over the uppermost of these windows, runs a battlement on the plain faces of the tower, and from the corners are carried up four beautiful fluted turrets, cased, a part of their height, with Doric turrets; these terminate in pinnacle heads, from within which rises a spire at each corner crowned with a vane.

The rector of this church, instead of uncertain tythes, has by act of parliament a settled stipend of 140l. per annum. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, three churchwardens, four overseers, and four sidemen.

Here is a lecture every Sunday morning, and on every holiday, founded by John Rayney, esq; who left houses in Gracechurch-street to the company of Drapers, charged with the payment of forty pounds per annum for the support thereof.

Contiguous to this church, on the south side, was anciently situate a handsome cloister, and a beautiful church-yard, wherein was a pulpit cross (resembling that of St. Paul's) erected by Sir John Rudstone, some time mayor of this city; who purchasing ground in the neighbourhood, not only enlarged the said church-yard, but likewise erected convenient apartments for the choristers, who daily officiated in the church: but the choir being soon after dissolved, the apartments were converted into habitations for decayed parishioners.

On the same side of the street, about 300 feet more to the east, stands the parochial church of

St. PETER, CORNHILL.

That this church is of great antiquity will appear from the following inscription, which is engraved on brass, and hangs up near the font for baptism:

"Be hit known to all Men, that the Yeerys of ovr Lord God, An. CLXXIX. Lucius, the fyrst Christen King of this Lond, then cally'd Brytayne, fowndyd the fyrst Chyrch in London, that is to sey, the Chyrch of Sent Peter upon Cornhyl; and he fowndyd ther an Archbishop's See, and made that Chyrch the Metropolitan and cheef Chyrch of this Kindom, and so enduryd the Space of CCCC. Yeerys and more, unto the Commyng of Sent Austen, an Apostyl of Englonde, the whych was sent into the Lond by Sent Gregory, the Doctor of the Chyrch, in the Tyme of King Ethelbert, and then was the Archbishoppys See and Pol removed from the aforesaid Chyrch of Sent Peters upon Cornhyl unto Derbernaum, that that now ys callyd Canterbury, and ther yt remeynyth to this Dey."

"And Millet Monk, whych came into this Lond with Sent Austen, was made the fyrst bishop of London, and hys see was made in Powllys Chyrch. And this Lucius, Kyng, was the fyrst Foundyr of Peter's Chyrch upon Cornhyl; and he regnyd King in thys Ilond after Brut, MCCXLV. Yeerys. And the Yeerys of our Lord God a CXXIV. Lucius was crownyd Kyng, and the Yeerys of hys Reygne LXXVII Yeerys, and he was beryd aftyr sum Cronekil at London, and aftyr sum Cronekil he was beryd at Gloucester, at that Plase wher the Ordyr of Sent Francys standyth."

If we could depend upon the authenticity of this inscription, it would clearly demonstrate, that this church was the first christian temple erected in Britain; as it is manifest, by Bede, that there was no christian church in London at the arrival of Mellitus; for Ethelbert, as an encouragement for him to proceed in the work of conversion, erected a church in this city for the accommodation of him and his proselytes, and dedicated the same to St. Paul. It is hardly, therefore, to be doubted but that this, and all the other ancient churches in London, owe their origin to the Saxons, Danes, and Normans.

The earliest authentic account we find of this church is, that William Kingston, before the year 1298, gave to it his tenement in Grass street, called the Horse-Mill. And that anciently belonged to the same a public library well furnished with books, which being disposed of in a private manner, the building was converted into a school-house for the education of youth.

The patronage of this rectory appears to have been originally in the noble family of the Nevils; for the lady Alice, relict of Sir Hugh Nevil, in the year 1362, made a feoffment thereof to Richard earl of Arundel and Surrey; and passing afterwards through various hands it was, in the year 1411, conveyed, by Richard Whittington, and others, to the Lord mayor and commonalty of this city, in whom the right of advowson still remains.

The old church, sharing the common fate in the year 1666, the present edifice was built on its ruins; and is a substantial structure, eighty feet long, forty-seven broad, forty feet high, to the roof, and one hundred and forty feet to the top of the steeple. The body is plain, with a single series of windows. The tower is likewise plain, with one window in each stage, and the dome, which supports the spire, is of the lantern kind. The spire is crowned with a ball, on which is a fane in form of a key, alluding to the key of St. Peter.

The rector of this church receives, besides other profits, 120*l.* a year by glebe, and 110*l.* a year in lieu of tythes. The vestry is select; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, two overseers, one collector and four sidesmen.

In the church-yard, on the south side is a monumental stone, erected at the expence of the parish, to the memory of John Butler, who, with unwearied diligence served the office of clerk to this parish for twenty-two years; and died the sixth of November, 1768; on which stone is engraved the following epitaph:

Oft have I view'd the gloomy place,

Which claims the relicts of the human race;

And read on the insculptur'd stone,

"Here lies the body of -----

"----- but now my own

"Dissolves to native dust, and as you see,

"Another here has done the same for me."

CHAPTER XIV.

OF CRIPPLEGATE WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from a gate which formerly stood in the north west part of the city, and which the reader will find particularly described in page 12.

It is bounded on the east by Little Moorfields, part of Coleman-street ward, Bassishaw ward, and Cheap ward; on the north by the parish of St. Luke's, Old-street; on the west by Aldersgate ward; and on the south by the ward of Cheap.

The extent of this ward reaches from Cheapside on the south to beyond Bridgewater-square in the north; and from Jewin-street in the west, to Back-street, or Little Moorfields in the east. And is to be taken within the city wall, and without, so far as the freedom reaches.

The part of this ward within the wall contains several streets and lanes, some in whole, others in part, viz. Milk-street on both sides, and the greater part of Honey-lane market; Cateaton-street, as far as to St. Lawrence's church, Lad-lane, Aldermanbury, Love-lane, Addle-street, London-wall-street from Little Wood-street to beyond the postern; Philip-lane; Great Wood-street, all but seventy feet on the west side towards Cheapside; Little Wood-street, Hart-street, the south side thereof; Monkswell-street the east side, Fell-street, Silver-street; Maiden-lane the east part thereof; Huggin-lane; Goldsmith's-street, the whole, except 25 feet on the west side; Gutter-lane, the west side from Maiden-lane, to over against the end of Carey-street, on the east side of the way only; and Cheapside, on the north side one hundred and seventy feet from the corner of Wood-street eastward.

The places in this ward without the wall are Fore-street, and the posterns leading to Moorfields. Back-street or Little Moorfields, Moor-lane, Grub-street, the south part to the post-and chain; Whitecross-street, the south side so far as the posts and chain; Redcross-street, about 450 feet on both sides; Beech-lane, Golden-lane, the south part to the post and chain; Barbican, the east part thereof, on both sides, for about 450 feet from the corner of Golden-lane; Jewin-street, the east part thereof, and on both sides to Redcross-street, for about 450 feet; Brackley-street, Bridgewater-street, and Letton street, all of them built in the place where Bridgewater-house formerly stood.

This ward is divided into thirteen precincts, viz. nine within the wall, and four without; and is governed by an alderman, twelve common-council-men (two of whom are the alderman's deputies) thirteen constables, thirty-four inquest-men, sixteen scavengers and three beadles.

We shall begin the survey of this ward at the south extremity within the wall, viz. with Milk-street, which begins from Cheapside, and terminates in Lad-lane. In this street, towards Cheapside, stood the parish church of St. Magdalen, Milk-street, which parish, after the fire of London, was united to St. Lawrence Jewry, and the ground converted into Honey-lane market.

Lad-lane is between Wood-street in the west, and Milk-street and Aldermanbury in the east: it is a street of good trade, and well inhabited.

Aldermanbury is a handsome street, graced with good buildings, which are well inhabited by merchants, wholesale dealers, &c.

Between Love-lane and Addle-street, on the west side, and in the broadest part of the street, stands the parish church of

St. MARY ALDERMANBURY.

This church is of very ancient foundation, and was formerly part of the possessions of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, who, in the year 1331, appropriated it to the hospital of Elsing Spital, which, at that time, stood near adjoining. It appears at all times to have been no otherwise than a donative or curacy; the patronage of which, since the dissolution of the above hospital, has been in the parishioners.

The old church being destroyed by the dreadful fire in 1666, the present structure was finished ten years after. It is built of stone, and very plain: the body is well enlightened and the corners are wrought with rustic. It is seventy-two feet long, and forty-five broad; the roof is thirty-eight feet high, and the steeple about ninety feet. It has a plain solid tower, constructed in the same manner as the body; and the angles in the upper stage are adorned with rustic: the cornice is supported by scrolls, and above it is a plain attic course. In this rises a turret with a square base that supports the dial. This turret is arched, but the corners are massy; and its roof is terminated in a point, on which is placed the fane.

The incumbent receives by act of parliament 150l. per annum, and 16l. from the improPRIATORS. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are two churchwardens, one of which is collector for the poor.

At the north west corner of Aldermanbury is situate the parish church of

St. ALPHAGE.

This church is so called from its dedication to St. Alphage, or Elphege, a noble English Saxon saint, and archbishop of Canterbury, who was murdered by the Danes at Greenwich in the year 1013.

The first church in London dedicated to this saint, stood adjoining to the city wall near the east side of Cripplegate. But at the suppression of religious houses by Henry VIII. the same being demolished, and the site thereof turned into a carpenter's yard, the south isle of the church of St. Mary Elsing Spital was converted into the present parish church.

The advowson of this church was anciently in the dean and canons of St. Martin's-le-Grand, in whom it continued till Henry VII. annexed it to St. Peter's, Westminster, when it fell to the abbot and convent; but that being dissolved, Queen Mary, in the year 1553, granted the patronage thereof to Edmund bishop of London, and his successors, in whom it still remains.

This church, which is a rectory, escaped the dreadful fire in 1666; but is so plain in its building as not to admit of any description.

The tythes paid to the minister is about 100l. besides the glebe and surplus fees. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are two churchwardens, and two collectors for the poor.

Adjoining to this church in Londonwall-street, stands

SION COLLEGE.

This building, which is situated upon the ruins of the priory of Elsing Spital, was founded and set apart for the meetings and improvements of the London clergy, who were incorporated by king Charles I. on the third of July, in the sixth year of his reign, by the name of "The president and fellows of the college of Sion, within the city of London." It consisted of a college for a warden, four priests and two clerks, and an hospital for an hundred old blind and poor persons of both sexes.

This college owes its foundation to Dr. Thomas White, vicar of St. Dunstan's in the west, who, among other charities, left 3000l. to purchase and build the same, with alms-houses for twenty poor people, ten men and ten women. He also gave 160l. per annum for ever to the college and alms-houses; 120l. for the support of the alms-people, and 40l. per annum for the expences of the foundation.

The ground was purchased in 1627; but the library was not appointed by the founder; for it being observed to Mr. Simson, one of doctor White's executors, that a convenient library might be erected over the alms-house, which was then building, Mr. Simson took the hint, and erected it at his own expence.

The work being finished, in prosecution of the will, the above incorporation was obtained, by which all the rectors, vicars, lecturers, and curates, are constituted fellows of the college; and out of the incumbents are annually to be elected on Tuesday three weeks after Easter, as governors, nors, a president, two deans, and four assistants, who are to meet quarterly to hear a latin sermon, and afterwards to be entertained at dinner in the college-hall, at the charge of the foundation. And in 1632 the governors and clergy being summoned, agreed upon a common seal, which had the good Samaritan, with the inscription Vade & fac similiter, and round it Sigillum Collegii de Sion Londini.

The books were given by various benefactors, and particularly a great many were brought thither from the old Cathedral of St. Paul, in the year 1647. But, in 1666, one third part of the books, the alms-houses, several chambers for students, and the apartments reserved for the governors and fellows to meet in, and for the residence of the librarian and the clerk, were destroyed by the great fire of London. However, this whole edifice was afterwards rebuilt in that plain manner of brickwork, as it now appears; except the chambers of the students; their ground being let out on leases. And the new library has been from time to time improved by a part of the Jesuits books seized in the year 1679; by the donation of lord Berkley, who gave half of his uncle Cooke's books to the library; by several legacies, to be laid out yearly in books; by a great number of private benefactors; by the copies of new publications, which bookellers are obliged, by an act of the tenth of queen Anne, to give to this library, in order to secure their own copy right and property; and by the books, which has been some time a custom given by every incumbent within the city and suburbs, upon his taking possession of his living; who presents a book to this library of at least ten shillings value. For the care and preservation of which library, there is one librarian, who has a genteel apartment at the south side of the college, that communicates by a door with the library.

The alms-houses consist of twenty rooms; for ten men within the college, and ten women without it. Four of whom are nominated by the city of Bristol, where Dr. White was born; eight by the merchant-tailors company; six by the parish of St. Dunstan, where he was minister forty-nine years; and two by St. Gregory's parish, where he had lived about twenty years: except any of the kindred of either of his wives appeared, who were first to be considered; but these were not to exceed four at a time.

A little to the east from Sion College, at the south-east angle of the new opening which leads from Aldermanbury to Fore-street, is a very handsome and capacious meeting-house, built of brick. And at the south-west corner of that opening which leads from Coleman-street to Fore-street, is another meeting-house of equal beauty and capacity.

Westward from Sion-College, and a little beyond Philip-lane, is Curriers-court, at the upper end of which is a neat, handsome building called

CURRIERS HALL.

The fraternity of Curriers appears to be of considerable antiquity, by their having founded a guild or religious society in the conventual church of White-friars in Fleet-street, in the year 1367. And in the year 1605, king James incorporated them by the appellation of "The master, wardens, and commonalty of the art or mystery of the Curriers of the city of London." It is a livery company, and the twenty-ninth on the city list; and is governed by a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants.

A little farther to the west from this hall is Wood-street, on the east side of which, at the south-west angle of Love-lane, is situated the parochial church of

St. ALBAN, WOOD-STREET.

This church is a rectory, and takes its name from its dedication to St. Alban, the first martyr of Great Britain. It is supposed to have been founded in the year 930, by king Adlestan, or Athelstan, the Saxon, who began his reign in or about the year 924, and was so well built, that this original foundation continued, with proper repairs, till the year 1634; when it was taken down, and a new church erected on the same spot. This church, however, being destroyed by the great fire in 1666, the present edifice was built from the same model as the former, in an entire Gothic style, consisting of a spacious body, and a handsome tower with pinnacles.

The patronage of this church was originally in the abbot and convent of St. Alban's, in Hertfordshire; from whom it passed into the hands of the master, &c. of the hospital of St. James, Westminster, with whom it continued till the founding of Eaton College by Henry VI. who granted the same to that college, with whom it still remains.

This church, after the fire of London, was made the parish church of St. Alban in Wood-street, and St. Olave in Silver-street, by 22 Car. II. And by another act 22 and 23 Car. II. the two livings together were made of the yearly value of 170l. to the incumbent in lieu of tythes.

The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, and four overseers of the poor.

In the old church, destroyed in 1666, were several very uncommon epitaphs, among which was the following:

Hic jacet Tom Shorthose,
Sine tombe, sine sheet, sine riches,
Qui vixit sine gowne,
Sine cloake, sine shirt, sine breeches.

The parish of St. Olave, Silver-street, is a rectory, the church whereof stood at the south-west corner of Silver-street. It was a small church of some antiquity, though we cannot trace it higher than the year 1593. Before the fire of London it was in the gift of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, who since that time have alternately presented to this living, with the provost and fellows of Eaton college.

The site of this church remains now only as a burying place for the inhabitants of the parish, who who still maintain a separate government by a general vestry, two churchwardens and four overseers for the poor.

Farther to the south from St. Alban's church, on the same side, is Wood-street Compter, or the city prison; the origin of which the reader will find in page 203; and as to other matters relating to its use and offices, see Poultry Compter, in the survey of Cheap ward.

ST. MICHAEL, WOOD-STREET.

This church is of some antiquity, as appears by John de Eppewell, who was rector thereof in the year 1328. The old church being destroyed by the fire of London in 1666, the present structure was finished a few years after; and the parish of St. Mary Staining annexed to it. The east end of this building is ornamented with four Ionic columns raised upon a continued pedestal, with arches between, and supporting a handsome pediment, in the middle of which is a circular window. Between the columns are three upright arched windows that fill the whole space. The rest of the body is plain, and the windows are raised so high, that the doors open under them. The tower consists of three plain stages with large windows, from the uppermost of which rises a small square course, the foundation of the base of the turret. The base is cut away from the breadth of the tower gradually to the diameter of the turret, which is plain, but handsome; and from its top rises a ball that supports the fane.

The patronage of this rectory was anciently in the abbot and convent of St. Alban's, in whom it continued till the suppression of their monastery; when, coming to the crown, it was, with the appurtenances, in the year 1544, sold by king Henry VIII. to William Barwell, who in the year 1588, conveyed the same to John Marsh, and others, in trust for the parish, in which it still continues; but being united with the parish of St. Mary Staining, which living is in the crown, the parishioners present twice, and the king once. The rector receives, besides his other profits, 100*l.* per annum in lieu of tythes. The vestry is general; and the parish-officers are, two churchwardens and four overseers.

The church of St. Mary Staining, or Stone church, before the fire of London, stood on the north side of Oat-lane. The reason why it received the additional epithet of Staining is very uncertain; some imagining it to be derived from the painter stainers, who might probably live near it; while others suppose that it was originally called Stany or Stony, from its being built with stone, to distinguish it from those in the city built with wood, &c.

The advowson of this rectory was anciently in the prioress and convent of Clerkenwell, in whom it continued till their suppression by Henry VIII. when it came to the crown, in whom it still remains.

The site of this church is used now as a burial place for the parishioners, who hold a general vestry, and have two churchwardens and four overseers.

On the same side Wood-street is Maiden-lane, the north part of which, from the Union Insurance office, is in Cripplegate ward. In this lane on the north, side is situate

HABERDASHERS HALL.

This is a good brick building, and the room called the hall is very neat and lofty. It is paved with marble and purbeck stone, wainscoted about twelve feet high; and the screen at the west end, where are two arched apertures, is adorned with pilasters of the Corinthian order. In this hall is kept an independent meeting.

The company of Haberdashers, which is one of the twelve principal companies of this city, and the eighth in order of precedency, was anciently known by the name of Hurriers and Mil-leners, from their dealing principally in merchandize imported from Milan in Italy. They were afterwards incorporated by king Henry VI. in the year 1467, by the style of "The fraternity of St. Catherine the Virgin, of the Haberdashers of the city of London." But at present they are denominated "The master and four wardens of the fraternity of the art or mystery of Haberdashers in the city of London:" but by what authority does not appear.

This corporation is governed by a master, four wardens, and a numerous court of assistants. It is a livery company; and has at all times been of such repute, that they have been intrusted with the benefactions of many pious persons, pursuant to the wills and directions of whom, they pay annually for charitable uses about the sum of three thousand five hundred pounds.

Nearer Wood-street, on the south side of Maiden-lane, stands

WAXCHANDLERS HALL.

This is handsome building, and well contrived for the business and entertainment of the company, which was incorporated by Richard III. on the sixteenth of February 1483, by the style of "The master, wardens, and commonalty of the art or mystery of Waxchandlers of London." It is a livery company, the twentieth in the city list; and governed by a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants.

Returning down Wood-street, towards the north, we come to Addle-street, near the north east end of which stands

BREWERS HALL.

This is a handsome and commodious building, with a genteel entrance into a large court paved with free stone, and the building above supported by handsome pillars.

This company, which is the fourteenth among the city companies, was incorporated by king Henry VI. in the year 1438, by the name of "The master, and keeper or wardens, and commonalty of the mystery or art of Brewers of the city of London." King Edward IV. not only only confirmed that charter, but granted them a further power to make by-laws.

This corporation anciently bore the arms of Thomas-à-Becket; impaled with their own: but that saint's bones being taken up and burnt, and unfainted, by the powers in being, Clarencieux, king at arms, in the year 1544, separated them, and gave the brewers a crest in lieu thereof. It is now a livery company; and is governed by a master, three wardens, and a court of assistants.

Nearly adjoining to this is situate

PLASTERERS HALL.

This is a very handsome building, and was formerly Pinners-hall. The plasterers company is the forty-sixth upon the city list, incorporated on the tenth of March 1501, by king Henry VIII. under the name and style of "The master and wardens of the guild or fraternity of the blessed Mary of plasterers, London." Which charter was confirmed on the eleventh of June, 1667, in the reign of king Charles II. It is a livery company, and is governed by a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants.

Directly opposite to Addle-street is Silver-street, formerly the situation of working silversmiths, who have now collected themselves nearer to Goldsmiths-hall. In a court on the south side of this street is a well built independent meeting-house.

On the north side of Silver-street, directly opposite the site of St. Olave's church, is Monkwell-street, (so called from a well belonging to the convent of monks, which once stood at the north end of it.

On the west side of this street, near the center is situate

BARBERS HALL.

This magnificent building consists of a spacious hall room, court room, theatre, library, and other commodious offices. The grand entrance from Monkwell-street is enriched with the company's arms, large fruit, and other decorations. The court room has a fret work ceiling, and is also adorned with the pictures of king Henry VIII. and the court of assistants, in one fine piece; a portrait of king Charles II. and other paintings. The theatre contains four degrees of Cedar seats, one above another, in an elliptical form, and the roof is an elliptical cupola: this room is adorned with a bust of king Charles I. the figures of the seven liberal sciences, and the twelve signs of the Zodiac; the skins of a man and woman on wooden frames, in imitation of Adam and Eve; the figure of a man flayed, done after the life, all the muscles appearing in their due place and proportion; the skeleton of an ostrich; an human skeleton, with copper joints, and five other skeletons of human bodies. But as this furniture was introduced by the surgeons, it is now of no use, and the theatre is entirely deserted. This hall is one of the works of that great architect Inigo Jones, and is a master-piece in its kind; that elegant simplicity which characterizes all his works, giving the spectator the highest satisfaction.

The art of surgery was anciently practised in this city only by the barbers, who were incorporated by letters patent granted by king Edward IV. in the year 1461; and in 1512, an act was passed to prevent any persons besides the barbers practising surgery within the city of London, and seven miles round. At length several persons, who were not barbers, being examined and admitted as practitioners in the art of surgery, the parliament united them in the thirty-second year of the reign of king Henry VIII. by the appellation of "The master or governors of the mystery or commonalty of barbers and surgeons of the city of London;" and by this act all persons practising the art of shaving were strictly enjoined not to intermeddle with that of surgery, except what belonged to drawing of teeth. Thus this company obtained the name of Barber-surgeons, which they continued to enjoy till the eighteenth year of the reign of his late majesty king George II. when the surgeons applying to parliament to have this union dissolved, were formed into a separate company; though the barbers were left in possession of the hall and theatre, and were constituted a body politic, under the name of "The master, governors, and commonalty of the mystery of barbers of London." It is a livery company, and under the direction of a master, three other governors, and a court of assistants.

Farther to the north, on the east side are the alms-houses founded in the year 1575, by Sir Ambrose Nicholas, knt. Lord mayor and Salter, for twelve aged people, and endowed at this time with three shillings per week in money, and eight sacks of coals to each yearly.

At the north west corner of Monkwell-street is situate Lamb's-chapel, which was founded as early as the time of king Edward I. and dedicated to St. James, and distinguished from other cognominal dedications, by the name of James's chapel, or Hermitage on the Wall, because situated in or near London-wall. This hermitage belonged to the abbot and convent of Geronndon in Leicestershire, who kept two Cistercian monks of their own order here. At the dissolution it was granted, in the reign of Henry VIII. to William Lamb, a rich clothworker of this city, who bequeathed it, with his house and appurtenances, lands and tenements, to the yearly value of thirty pounds per annum to this company, for paying a minister to read divine service on Sundays, Wednesdays and Fridays in the said chapel, and to relieve the poor in the undermentioned manner.

In this chapel the worshipful company of Clothworkers have four sermons preached to them upon the four principal festivals in the year, viz. upon the feast of the annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, March 25; on the feast of St. John Baptist, June 24; on the feast of St. Michael the Archangel, September 29; and on the feast of St. Thomas the Apostle, December 21. On which days the master, wardens, and livery of the company meet at some convenient place, near unto the chapel, where they go in their gowns and hoods to the chapel and hear a sermon; after which they relieve twelve poor men, and as many poor women, with twelve pence each in money; and once a year, viz. at Michaelmas, give them a frieze gown, and a lockram shift, and a good pair of winter shoes fit for their wearing.

Directly opposite to Lamb's chapel is Hart-street; on the north side of which is a charitable foundation by Mr. Robert Rogers, leather-seller and merchant-adventurer, for six ancient couple, who have a room below and another above, and four pounds per annum each, paid by the city of London, in whom is the gift of this charity.

Having thus surveyed that part of Cripplegate ward which is within the wall, we shall now proceed to that without the wall.

This is a large tract of ground, containing many streets, and all crowded with courts and alleys: the principal are Fore-street, Back street in Little Moorfields, Moor-lane, Grub-street, Whitecross-street, Redcross-street, Beech-lane, Golden lane, Barbican and Jewin-street.

Fore-street, which runs from the north end of Cripplegate church to Moor-lane, is a large spacious street, and by the late improvements is ornamented, particularly on the south side, with new buildings inhabited by reputable tradesmen.

On the West side of Little Moor-fields, otherwise called Back-street to distinguish it from Little Moor-fields Pavement-row, are many courts and alleys; as Crown-court, Hind-alley, Halfmoon-alley, Angel-alley, Hartshorn-alley, Butler's-alley, Oyster's-hall-court, Gun-alley, White's-alley, and Rope-maker's-alley; many of which are tolerable well built and inhabited.

Moor lane is but indifferently built and inhabited; but there are many passages from it, viz. Back-alley; Ram's head court, Sugar-loaf court; Seven-star court; Sugar-loaf-alley; Butler's-alley; Cur-yard; Cock-alley; Vine-court, and Maiden-head-court; all which, except the two last, are very ordinary places.

Returning down Fore-street, towards the west on the north side, we come to Grub-street, which, as far as Sun-alley, is in Cripple-gate-ward. In this street are the following courts and alleys, viz. Lun's-alley, Honey-suckle-court, well built; Fleur-de-lis-court, Little Bell-alley, Flying-horse-court, Oakley-court, Butler's-alley, Cross keys-court, Great-Bell-alley; all very mean. But Haberdasher's-square is tolerably genteel and well built.

A little farther from this is Whitecross street, which is well built and inhabited by considerable traders and dealers in various branches. The courts and alleys in this street are, Cock-alley, King's-arms-yard, King's-head-court, Cross-keys-court, Halfmoon-alley, Horshoe-alley, Bowling-alley, Anabaptist-court, Castle-court, Red-rose-court, and Fern's-yard; most of which are in a mean declining situation.

At the south west end of Fore-street, and facing Redcross-street, stands the parochial church of

St. GILES, CRIPPLEGATE.

This church was dedicated to a saint of that name, born at Athens, who was abbot of Niomes in France, and said to be the great patron of the poor and diseased. It was founded about the year 1090, by Alfune, the first master of St. Bartholomew's-hospital.

The patronage of this church, was in private hands, till Aelmund a priest, granted the same (after his own death, and that of Hugh his only son) to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's church, whereby they became not only ordinaries of the parish, but likewise proprietors of the rectory, and patrons of the vicarage, as they are at this time.

This church which escaped the dreadful conflagration in 1666, may be numbered amongst the best of our Gothic buildings. It is 114 feet in length, 63 feet in breadth, 32 feet high to the roof, and the tower, with the turret, 122 feet in height. The tower (in which is a ring of ten bells) is not gross in proportion to its height, and the turret at the top is light and open. It is built of old stone, boulder, and some brick finished over. The roof is flat, neatly ceiled, and over the altar painted in clouds.

This church is no more than a vicarage; but it is valued at 500l. per annum, in tythes, casualties, and vicarage-house. The vestry is select; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, two overseers, and four sidesmen.

Here is an endowment for prayers, at eleven o'clock in the morning, and at eight in the evening every day; and for a sermon at six o'clock every Sunday, and at three o'clock every Thursday, left by Mr. Throckmorton Trotman, and payable by the company of Haberdashers. Likewise six sermons in Lent, and another gift sermon on All-saints-day. The charitable donations on this day will best appear by the following monumental inscriptions; the two first of which are situate at the east end of the church, on the north side of the altar.

Roger Malon, of this parish, citizen and vintner of London, gave to the poore of the freedome of this parish 200l. wherewith an yearly rent of sixteen pounds or thereabout, is purchased for ever; to be bestowed on ten gownes of black cloth lined; to be distributed yearly upon tenne poore men of the freedom of this parish, upon All-saints-day, at the discretion of the vicar and churchwardens for the time being. He died the third day of September 1603, Ætatis sue 37, leaving his wife Jane, by whom he had three sons and three daughters, whereof one only now liveth, named Katherine; which Jane truly paid the above-mentioned two hundred pounds; and joined the erection of this monument; set up An. Dom. 1606 May the eighth day.

William Day, citizen and vintner of London, the sonne of Thomas Day, of Boscarn in Suffex, gentleman, and Elizabeth, his wife, gave to the poore of this parish eighty pounds; which was paid by his brother George Day, wherewith an yearly rent of six pounds, or thereabout, is purchased for ever; to be bestowed on twelve coats of greene cloth, to be distributed yearly upon twelve poor orphans, upon All-saints day; at the discretion of the vicar and churchwardens for the time being. Hee lyeth buried in his parish church of St. Michael in Cornhill, and dyed the twenty-eighth day of September 1603, Ætatis sue 32; set up Anno Domini, 1606, May the eighth day.

Near

Near the center of the north ile is the following:

Within this ile lyeth buried the body of Charles Langley, sometime of this parish, ale-brewer, who was buried the eighth day of June, An. Dom. 1601, and did give bountifully to the poore of this parish.

If Langley's life you list to know,
Read on, and take a view;
Of Faith and Hope I will not speake
His works shall shew them true.
Who whilst he liv'd with counsell grave
The better sort did guide;
A stay to weake; a staffe to poore,
Without back-bite, or pride.
And when he dyed he gave his mite,
All that did him befall,
For ever once a year to cloath
Saint Giles his poor withall.
All-Saints he pointed for the day,
Gownes; twenty, ready made,
With twenty shirts and twenty smocks;
As they may best be had.
A sermon eke he hath ordain'd,
That God may have his praise,
And others might be won thereby,
To follow Langley's wayes.
On vicar and churchwardens then
His trust he hath repos'd,
As they will answer him one day,
When all shall be disclos'd.
Thus being dead yet still he lives,
Lives never for to dye,
In Heaven's blisse, in World's fame;
And so I trust shall I.

The site of this parish of St. Giles was anciently a fen or moor, and the houses and gardens thereupon were accounted a village without the wall of London, called Mora; which, in process of time, increased greatly in number of buildings, and was constituted a prebend of St. Paul's cathedral of that appellation. And now this village is totally swallowed up by London; and the prebendary of Mora, or Mora without the wall of London, hath the ninth stall on the right side of the choir in St. Paul's cathedral: of whom it is said Nigellus Medicus was the first prebendary.

A little farther to the north from Cripplegate church is Jewin-street; * a place well built and inhabited, except at the west end which leads into Aldersgate-street. The most remarkable place in this street is Crowder's-well-alley, which receives its name from a well therein, (made at the expence of Sir Richard Whittington) whose water is reputed to be not only exceeding fine and wholesome, but salutary in many disorders.

Redcross-street, which faces the north end of Cripplegate church, is a noble, wide, and well built street, and inhabited by considerable tradesmen. In this street are a great number of courts and alleys on both sides; but none of them of any estimation, either for their buildings or inhabitants: but it is graced, near the middle, on the east side, with a library, founded by Daniel Williams, D. D. a presbyterian minister, for the use of the dissenting ministers of the presbyterian, independent, and baptist persuasions. In 1711 this reverend divine bequeathed his valuable collection of books and manuscripts for the said purpose, with a handsome salary for a librarian and a housekeeper: and in pursuance of his will, a neat building was erected in this street, with a genteel apartment for the librarian, &c. and a spacious room, capable of containing 40,000 volumes. In this library is a register, wherein parents may register the birth of their children.

This foundation, which has been greatly augmented since its first institution, is under the direction of twenty-three trustees, viz. fourteen ministers and nine laymen, who must be all presbyterians: under whom there is a secretary and steward. Here are likewise some curiosities; as an Egyptian mummy, and a glass basin which held the water wherewith queen Elizabeth was baptized.

At the north end of Redcross-street is Beech-lane,† which is tolerably well inhabited, but in general extreme dirty, and a place of little trade. In this lane are Ship-yard, King's-head court, and Glover's-court: in the latter of which stands

GLOVERS HALL.

The company of Glovers, who hold the sixty-second place amongst the city companies, were not incorporated till the 14th of Car. I. who, on the fifth of September, in the year 1638, granted them a charter by the name and style of "The master, wardens, and fellowship of the company of Glovers of the city of London." It is a livery company; and is governed by a master, four wardens, and a court of assistants.

At the north-east end of this lane are a set of alms-houses, built in the year 1540, pursuant to the will of lady Ann Askew, widow of Sir Christopher Askew, Lord-mayor of London in the year 1533, for eight poor widows of the Drapers company; with an allowance of three pounds per annum, and half a chaldron of coals, in trust of the Drapers company.

Golden-lane, which runs out of Redcross-street into Old-street, is but a mean place, and indifferently inhabited. Here are several courts and alleys, as Jacob's-well-alley, Cook's-head-court, Black-raven-court, Crown-court, Sun-court, Dixon's-rents, and Vine-court; some of which are tolerably well built and inhabited. In this lane Richard Gallard, of Islington, esq; citizen and

* This place, with the apurtenances, was anciently called Leyrestowe; which king Edward I. granted to William de Monte Forte, dean of St. Paul's, London: being a place (as it is expressed in a record) without Cripplegate, and the suburbs of London, called Leyrestowe: and which was the burying-place of the Jews, valued at 40s. per annum.

† This lane takes its name from the number of beech trees that formerly grew upon the site thereof; amidst which stood a great house, the mansion of the abbot of Ramsey, to receive him during his stay in London; and was afterwards called Drewrie-house.

painter-stainer of London, founded thirteen almshouses for as many poor people, and endowed each with two pence per week, and a load of coals yearly divided amongst them, charged upon certain lands in Islington.

Directly opposite the south end of Beech-lane is Barbican; at the east end of which, in ancient days, stood a watch tower, called Burgh-kenning,

i. e. Barbican, a kind of advanced post for Crip-plegate, to look out or watch for the safety of the city on that side. Adjoining to this tower was a palace, or grand house called Garter-house, built by Sir Thomas Writhelesly, Garter principal king at arms; on the top of which was built a chapel, by the name of Sanctissima Trinitatis in alto.

CHAPTER XV.

OF DOWGATE WARD.

Dowgate ward derives its name from the ancient water-gate called Dourgate, * which was made in the original wall that ran along the north side of the Thames, for the security of the city of London against all attempts to invade it by water.

This ward is bounded on the west by Vintry ward on the south by the river Thames, on the east by Candlewick and Bridge-wards, and on the north by Wallbrook ward.

The extent of this ward reaches from St. Martin's-lane in the east, to Cloak-lane in the west, and from thence both east and west to the river Thames, in almost a direct line: within which tract are contained, on the south side of Thames-street, between it and the Thames, Old Swan-lane, Cold-harbour, Allhallows-lane, Campion-lane, Friar's-lane, Coffin's-lane, Dowgate-dock, and the Steel-yard; St. Laurence Pountney-hill, almost as far as St. Laurence's church-yard; Suffolk-lane, as far as the passage into Bush-lane; Bush-lane, almost the whole; Dowgate-hill, as far as Tallowchandler's-hall northwards; Chequer-yard; Elbow-lane as far as the church-yard, only the south east side of the way; Cloak-lane, the south side, to 160 feet west of Dowgate-hill.

This ward is divided into eight precincts; and is under the government of an alderman, eight common-council-men, (one of whom is the alderman's deputy) eight constables, fifteen inquest-men, five scavengers, and a beadle.

We shall begin the survey of this ward at Dowgate-hill, which is a large, open street, and the houses, well built and inhabited. On the west side, near Budge-row, is the Church-yard of St. John the Evangelist, where formerly the church stood, not being rebuilt since the fire of London. Adjoining to the church-yard is Cloak-lane, which runs westward to College-hill.

* This was originally one of the four gates, or the fourth gate of this city, where anciently was the trajectus, or ferry of the Watling-street, (See page 18) whose direction was towards the north west, as was discovered in digging the foundation of Bow-church in Cheap-side, and one of the four great Roman military ways.

† The tallow-chandlers of this city, anciently, not only

On the west side of Dowgate-hill is situate TALLOWCHANDLERS HALL,

Which is a stately and large building, with piazzas, formed by arches and columns of the Tuscan order.

This society was incorporated by king Edward IV. in the year 1460, by style of "The master, and keepers of the art and mystery of Tallow-chandlers of the city of London."† It is a livery company, the twenty-first in the city list, and is governed by a master, four wardens, and a court of assistants.

A little farther from this, on the same side, stands

SKINNERS HALL.

This is a very handsome building, and well provided with apartments to accommodate both the company and their servants. The hall room is nearly wainscotted with oak, and the parlour with cedar.

This fraternity, which is the sixth of the twelve principal companies, was incorporated by king Edward III. in the year 1327, by the appellation of "The master and wardens of the guild or fraternity of the body of Christ, of the Skinners of London;" which was confirmed by Henry VI. in the year 1438, whereby every person, upon his being admitted into the freedom of the company, is to be presented to the Lord-mayor. And by these grants the corporation was restrained from making bye-laws.

The government of this company is vested in a master, four wardens, and a numerous court of assistants. The members pay no quarterage, owing to the great estate they are possessed of; out of dealt in candles, but likewise in oil, vinegar, butter, hops, soap, &c. at which time great frauds were committed by adulterating oil; for the preventing of which this company was, by act of parliament, empowered to search the same, and to destroy all such as should be found bad. But no reward being ascertained for the searchers, it was soon neglected.

which, according to the wills of the several donors, they annually pay to charitable uses about seven hundred pounds per annum.

Near the further end of Dowgate-hill anciently stood a castellated conduit for Thames water. And lower down was a college called Jesus commons, for the reception and maintenance of a certain number of poor priests. On the east side stood a royal messuage, the great old house called the Erber, near to the church of St. Mary Bothaw. It was alienated by king Henry VIII. who gave it to Sir Philip Hoby, who sold it to one Doulphin a draper, and he sold it to the drapers company. Sir Edward Pullison, lord mayor of London in the year 1584, rebuilt this house; in which Sir Francis Drake, who first taught the way to sail round the world, for some time resided.

Chequer-yard is a dirty passage on the east side of Dowgate-hill, which runs cross into Bush-lane; and is chiefly taken up with stables and coach-houses: on the south side thereof is Hand-alley, a paved passage that leads into Thames-street; and at the north east angle stands

PLUMBERS HALL.

This building is but small, though sufficiently convenient for the uses of the company; and is let out for a dancing school.

This company was incorporated by king James I. on the twelfth of April 1611, by the name of "The master, wardens, and commonalty, of the mystery of plumbers of the city of London." It is a livery company, the thirty-first in the city list; and is governed by a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants.

In that part of Bush-lane which branches off into Little Bush-lane; is

The ENGLISH COPPER-OFFICE.

This company was incorporated by charter in the third of William and Mary, September 22, 1692, by the title of "The governor and company of copper-miners in England." Which was confirmed by queen Anne, in the year 1710. And by subsequent grants, their power of working of mines was extended to all parts of Ireland and New England. This company is under the direction of a governor, deputy governor, and eighteen assistants.

Out of this lane there is a passage that leads into Suffolk-lane; on the east side of which stands

MERCHANT TAYLORS SCHOOL.

This school was founded by the company of merchant taylors, in the year 1658, for the education of boys. It was anciently kept in a house which belonged to the duke of Buckingham, and was called the Manor of the Rose; but that edifice being destroyed by the fire in 1666, the present structure was erected upon the same spot, at the expence of the merchant-taylors company.

The school is a long and spacious building, supported on the east by many stone pillars that form an handsome cloister, within which are apartments for the three ushers. Adjoining to which is a library supported also by stone pillars, and well furnished with books. And on the south of the library is the part called the chapel. Contiguous to these is a large house appropriated to the use of the head master.

The school consists of eight forms, in which near three hundred boys have their education; an hundred of whom, according to the constitutions of the company, are taught gratis; an hundred more at five shillings, and fifty at two shillings and six pence per quarter.

The head master receives from the company a salary of ten pounds six shillings per annum, and thirty shillings for water; besides the quarterage from the scholars, which renders his salary very considerable. The first usher has 30l. per annum, and the two others 25l. all of whom have proper apartments.

Several of the scholars are annually sent to St. John's College, Oxford, which seems to have been founded by Sir Thomas White chiefly for their use.

For the better inquiry into the proficiency of all the scholars, there are four probations in the year performed only by the master and ushers; the first on the eleventh of March; the second on the fifteenth of June; the third on the eleventh of September; and the fourth on the eleventh of December, not being Sundays, and then upon the next day following.

For the farther satisfaction of the master, wardens, and court of assistants of the merchant-taylors, the probations themselves undergo an examination twice every year, by two judicious men well learned in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, appointed by the master and wardens of the company. Upon these days, which are between the eleventh and twenty-first of March; and September, the master and wardens, or at least two of them are present. The examination, which is performed in the chapel, begins at six in the morning and ends at eleven. These are called the doctors days. After the examination is finished, the audience, which are generally numerous, return into the school, where certain public exercises are performed by the eight senior scholars, or monitors of the school.

There is yet another public examination of the scholars of the upper form, by the president and fellows of St. John's college Oxford, annually performed upon the eleventh of June, previous to the election of scholars to be made upon that day, to fill up the vacant fellowships in that college. And after the public exercises are finished, the dean of the college addresses himself to the scholars, out of whose number the vacancy is to be filled up, in a latin speech suited to the occasion. At this time an account is usually printed, containing the names and order of the head scholars, their birth, admission, and continuance in the head form; and also an account of the subjects of the orations.

Suffolk-lane leads into Thames-street, on the south side of which, towards the east extremity of this ward, is Old Swan stairs, a very noted landing place for passengers above bridge, upon the river Thames. This is the antient Edgate.

From Old Swan stairs we now proceed to the west extremity of this ward, and the first place is George-alley. This is very narrow and ordinary; from the south end of which to the Steelyard included, the wharfs are occupied chiefly by dyers, distillers, brewers, and dealers in iron.

White-cock-alley is likewise very narrow, at the south end of which there once stood Dyers-hall.

Cold-harbour, corruptly Coal-harbour, is a narrow-lane, inhabited by coopers and others employed in mercantile business. At the south west angle of this lane stands

WATERMANS HALL.

This is a handsome brick building, and is situated with its front toward the Thames.

The company of watermen do not appear to have had any charter of incorporation before the reign of Philip and Mary; at which time they were established by parliament, who enacted, that out of the watermen between Gravesend and Windsor, eight overseers should be chosen by the court of aldermen of the city of London, to keep order over the whole body. And it was farther ordained, that their wherries should be twelve feet and a half long, and four feet and a half broad in the midship, or be liable to forfeiture; and that the names of the watermen be registered by the overseers, and their fares appointed by the court of aldermen, &c. and the Lord-mayor and aldermen, and the justices of the peace of the counties adjoining to the Thames, have power to determine offences.

And by another statute made in the reign of king William III. lightermen, &c. on the Thames, between Gravesend and Windsor, are to be of the Society of watermen and wherry-men, who are made a company. The Lord-mayor and court of aldermen shall yearly elect eight of the best watermen, and three of the best lightermen, to be overseers and rulers; and the watermen shall chuse assistants, not exceeding sixty, nor less than forty, and the lightermen nine, at the principal stairs, for preserving good government.

On court days the rulers are to appoint a certain number of watermen to ply on Sundays, between Vauxhall and Limehouse, for carrying passengers cross the river, and to pay them for their labour, and apply the overplus of the money for decayed watermen, &c. * No person shall row or ply on the river except such as have served their time, or are servants or apprentices to watermen. And by an order of the rulers, watermen using any lewd expressions on the river Thames, are to forfeit two shillings and six-pence for every offence.

By stat. 2. George II. c. 26. no waterman on the Thames shall take any apprentice or servant, unless he registers the place of his known habitation with the clerk of the company, on pain of forfeiting ten pounds; and if any person not having served seven years to a waterman, shall row any boat for hire, he incurs the like penalty, but gardeners boats, dung boats, lighters, &c. are excepted.

All boats and barges belonging to the several members of this company, are obliged to be numbered and entered in the company's register. And to prevent any imposition on passengers, the following table of rates have been appointed by the court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, to be taken by the respective watermen rowing upon the river Thames, between Gravesend and Windsor.

Rates of Watermen plying upon the river Thames, either with oars or scullers.

* On the nineteenth of September, 1766, the committee of the new bridge agreed to invest the watermens company with 13,650l. consolidated 3 per cent annuities, to satisfy them for the loss of the Sunday's ferry at Black-friars, which was proved to have produced, upon an average, for fourteen years, the sum of 409l. 10s. per annum.

	£.	s.	d.
For every single person in the ordinary passage	0	0	9
For a hogthead	0	2	0
For a whole firkin	0	0	2

One sack of corn, salt, &c.	0	0	6
An ordinary chest or trunk	0	0	6
An ordinary hamper	0	0	6
The hire of the whole tilt boat	1	2	6

Any waterman that takes more than the above rates is liable to forfeit 40s. and to suffer six months imprisonment: and if he sets up a sail between Lambeth and London-bridge, on proper complaint made, he forfeits 5s.

It is necessary to add, that to prevent the losing the lives of persons passing on the river, it is enacted in a statute of the 10th of George II. that no tilt-boat, row-barge, or wherry, take at one time more than thirty-seven passengers, and three more by the way; nor in any other boat or wherry more than eight, and two more by the way; nor in any ferry-boat or wherry, allowed to work on Sundays, any more than eight passengers, on pain of forfeiting for the first offence 5l. for the second offence 10l. and for the third offence, to be disfranchised for twelve months from working on the river, and from enjoying the privileges of the company. And in case any person shall be drowned, where a greater number of passengers is taken in than is allowed, the waterman shall be deemed guilty of felony, and transported as a felon.

It is also enacted by the same statute, that every tilt-boat be of the burden of fifteen tons, and any other boat or wherry three tons; and that no Gravesend boats or wherries with close decks or bails nailed down, and not moveable, be navigated, tilt-boats only excepted, on the penalty of 10l.

Any watermen or wherry-men who wilfully or negligently lose their tide from Billingsgate to Gravesend, or from thence to Billingsgate, by putting ashore for other passengers, or by waiting or loitering by the way, so that the first passengers shall be set on shore two miles short of the place to which they are bound; such passengers shall be discharged from paying any thing for their passage.

The rules of this company are to appoint two or more officers to attend, one at Billingsgate, at every time of high-water at London-bridge, and the other at Gravesend at the first of flood; who shall publicly ring a bell for fifteen minutes, to give notice to the tilt-boats and wherries to put off. And if such wherry-men, &c. do not immediately put off on ringing the said bell, and do not effectually proceed on their voyage, but put on shore within two miles of Billingsgate or Gravesend, as the case may be; or if such boats are not navigated by two sufficient men, the youngest to be eighteen years old at least; in every such case the owners of such boats shall forfeit 5l. to be levied on the boats or goods of the owners of such boats. And if the company of watermen neglect setting up the said bells, and appointing proper persons to ring them, they shall forfeit 50l. as shall such persons appointed to ring the said bells, forfeit 40l. for every neglect.

This company has a court of assistants, which, by the act of 2 Geo. II. is restrained to thirty. It is the ninety-first in the list of companies; and is said to pay above 800l. per annum to their poor.

Between Campion-lane* and Allhallows-lane, stands the parochial church of

ALLHALLOWS THE GREAT.

This church, which is a rectory, and one of the thirteen peculiars in London belonging to the archbishop of Canterbury, was anciently denominated Allballows the More, and Allballows ad Fanum, in the Ropery, from its vicinity to a hay wharf, and situation among Rope-makers. It was founded by the noble family of the Despen- cers, who presented thereunto in the year 1361. From whom it passed with the heiress to the earl of Warwick and Salisbury; and at last to the crown, by settlement from the widow of Richard Nevil, earl of Warwick, upon king Henry VII. After which Henry VIII. exchanged the same with Thomas archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 1546, in whose successors it still continues.

This spacious and stately church, with a large cloister on the south side thereof, was consumed in the general conflagration in 1666, and the present edifice was finished in 1683; planned by Sir Christopher Wren, but not executed with the same accuracy that was designed. It is 87 feet long, 60 feet broad, and 33 feet high to the roof: built of stone, strong and solid. The walls are plain and massy: the ornaments are few and simple; and the windows, though large, in order to enlighten such a considerable breadth, are not numerous. The tower is plain, square, and divided into five stages, but terminates absolutely square and plain, without spire, turret or pinnacles. The cornice is supported by scrolls, and over these rises a balustrade of solid construction, suitable to the rest of the building. It is well finished, and ornamented within.

After the fire of London the parish of Allhallows the Less was annexed to this church; and the two together were made of the yearly value of 200l. in lieu of tythes. The vestry is select, and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, two overseers or collectors, and two sidersmen.

The church of Allhallows the Less was situated nearly adjoining to this, and was sometimes called Allballows on the Cellars, or super Cellarium, from its standing on vaults let out for cellars.

The advowson of this church, which was anciently a rectory, was in the bishop of Winchester; in whom it continued till a college was

* This was formerly called Hay-wharf-lane, on account of its being the market for supplying the city of London with hay.

founded in the church of St. Laurence Poulteney, about the year 1347, who purchased the patronage, and appropriated the same to his said college: from which time it became a curacy or donative: and falling to the crown, at the general suppression of religious houses, queen Elizabeth first granted it for twenty-one years to William Verle; and king James I. in the second year of his reign, sold it to Richard Blake, &c. and their heirs for ever, in free soccage. By which means the impropriation is now in the heirs or assigns of the right Reverend Dr. Edward Waddington, late bishop of Chichester.

The site of this church is now used as a burial place for the inhabitants. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, and two collectors for the poor.

More to the west, and close to Cofin-lane, is the Steel-yard, corruptly called Still-yard. This was originally the hall of the Almaine, Anseatic, or German merchants, where they had warehouses for wheat, rye, and other grain; and for cables, ropes, pitch, tarr, masts, hemp, flax, linen, cloth, wainscots, wax, steel, &c. It is a large, open place, with two wide passages for carts, to the river side, where is a crane, and stairs for landing iron, of which here are always large quantities kept. In this yard are some good houses for merchants who trade in iron, for which it is of great note, but was formerly of greater, from the merchants of Almaine. Here are likewise large warehouses for depositing goods belonging to the East India company.

Farther to the west and near Friars-lane, is situate

JOYNEERS HALL.

This building is remarkably curious for a magnificent screen at the entering into the hall room, having demi-savages, and a variety of other enrichments carved in right wainscot. The great parlour is wainscotted with cedar.

The company of joiners was incorporated by queen Elizabeth, on the eighteenth of April 1565, by the by the name of "The master and wardens and commonalty of the faculty of joyners and cielers of London." It is a livery company, the forty-first in the city list; and is governed by a master, two wardens and a court of assistants.

The remaining avenues on the south side of Thames-street are Brewer's-lane and Friar's-lane, which are very mean and serve chiefly as passages to the lay-stall at Dowgate-dock.

On the north side of Thames-street is Little Elbow-lane, so called from its bending form from St. Michael's Royal, into Thames-street; both which, and that part of Great Elbow-lane, that lies in this ward, are well inhabited.

On the north side of Great Elbow-lane, near the church is a very beautiful and convenient building, called

INNOLDERS HALL.

This company was incorporated by king Henry VIII. on the twenty-first of December, 1515, by the style of "The master, wardens, and company, of the art or mystery of innholders of the city of London." It is a livery company the thirty second on the city list; and is governed by a master, three wardens and a court of assistants.

In Little Elbow-lane is situate

DYERS HALL.*

This company was incorporated in the second of Edward IV. in the year 1472, by the name of "The wardens and commonalty of the mystery of dyers, London; with the privilege of keeping swans upon the river Thames. It is now governed by two wardens and a court of assistants; was anciently one of the twelve companies; but now ranks only in the thirteenth place; and enjoys the privilege of the livery.

CHAPTER XVI.

OF FARRINGTON WARD Within.

THIS ward, as well as that of Farringdon without, takes its name from William Farringdon, citizen and goldsmith of London, who with his son Nicholas, were possessors thereof for a great number of years. These two wards in ancient times, had but one alderman, and that not by election, but by inheritance or purchase, as will more fully appear by the following abstract of a deed made in the reign of king Edward I.

"Thomas de Ardene sunne and heire to Sir Ralph Ardene, knt. granted to Ralph le Feure, citizen of London, one of the sheriffs in the year 1277, all the aldermanrie, with the appurtenances, within the city of London and suburbs

suburbs of the same, between Ludgate and Newgate, and also without the same gates; which aldermanrie Ankerinus de Auerne held during his life, by the grant of the said Thomas de Ardene. To have and to hold unto the said Ralph, and to his heires, freely without all challenge; yeelding therefore yeerly to the said Thomas and his heires, one clove (or slip) of gilliflowers, at the feast of Easter, for all secular service and custome, with warrantie unto the said Ralph de Feure, and his heires, against all people, Christians and Jewes, in consideration of twenty markes, which the said Ralph de Feure did give before hand, in name of a gerfum or fine, to the said Thomas, &c.

Dated the 5th of Edward I.

Witnesse, G. de Rokelly, maior.

R. Arrar, one of the sheriffes.

H. Wales,

P. le Taylor,

T. de Bassing,

J. Horn,

N. Blackthorn, alderman of London."

After this, John le Feure, son and heir to the said Ralph le Feure, granted to William Farendon, citizen and goldsmith of London, and to his heirs, the said aldermanry, with the appurtenances, for the service thereunto belonging in the seventh of Edward I. in the year of Christ 1279. This aldermanry descended to Nicholas Farendon, son, to the said William, and his heirs. Which Nicholas, also a goldsmith, was four times mayor, and lived many years after. He made his will in the year 1361, which was fifty-three years after his first being mayor, and was buried in St. Peter's church in Cheap. So this ward continued under the government of William Farendon, and Nicholas his son, the space of fourscore and two years, and retains their name to this present day.

At the first nomination or division of this city into wards, it was called the ward Fori; and the addition of Within the wall of London, and Without the wall of London, was in process of time given to each part by act of parliament, when that large possession of the Farendons, or Farringdons, was divided into two aldermanries, to be governed by two aldermen, in the choice of the inhabitants.

This ward is bounded on the east by Cheap ward and Castle Baynard ward; on the north by Aldersgate and Cripplegate wards, and the liberty of St. Martin's-le-Grand; on the west by Farringdon without; and on the south by Baynard-castle ward, and the river Thames. It is divided into eighteen precincts, and is governed by an alderman, seventeen common-council-men, (of whom one is the alderman's deputy) nineteen constables, seventeen inquest-men, nineteen scavengers and two beadies.

This ward begins where once stood the great cross in Westcheap, alias Cheapside; thence it runs on the south side from Friday-street westward, including as much of Friday-street as the north east corner of St. Matthew's church on the east side, and till the south corner of the said church on the west side. From this street it runs along Cheapside to the Old Change, which is in this ward on the east side, as far as one house south of St. Augustin's church, adjoining to Watling-street; and on the west side to the place where once stood the east arch, or gate, built by Nicholas Farendon in 1361, at the entrance into the south church-yard of St. Paul's; and within the said gate, all that part which was formerly called the north church-yard. Then from the north end of the Old change to the site of the north gate of St. Paul's church-yard, which opened into Cheapside; so up the south side of Pater-noster-row to within about twelve doors of Avemary-lane, the west side of which is in this ward: and thence southward, Ludgate-street, (formerly called Bowyer-row, as far as the spot where lately stood Ludgate: and on the north side, up Pater-noster-row, beginning where the conduit stood, facing the Old Change, to Partier-alley, Ivy-lane, Newgate-market, and Warwick-lane, the east side of which, and the west end of Pater-noster-row, are in Baynard-castle ward. But this ward crosses Ludgate-street, and takes in the west side of Creed-lane, and all Black-friars.

From the above great cross, or the site thereof, this ward runs westward on the north side, and down Gutter-lane, as far as Huggen-lane on the east side, and to Kery-lane on the west. Then from the south end of Gutter-lane westward to Foster-lane, and down that lane to the north side of St. Foster's church-yard only on the east side, and to over against the south west corner of the said church-yard on the west side. But from thence to the wall on the west side of Noble-street is in Aldersgate ward. Then from the said wall down to Windsor-house, or Nevil's-Inn, and down Monkwell-street, on the west side, and then by London-wall to Cripplegate, all which is in Farringdon ward. Then from the south end of Foster-lane westward to St. Martin's-le-Grand, and away to Newgate, which includes both sides of the way in Newgate-street, and terminates the north side of this ward.

We shall begin the survey of this ward at the east extremity, which takes in that part of Cheapside where formerly stood the great cross erected by king Edward I. in the year 1290.

The street of Cheapside is spacious and large, graced with very lofty buildings, which are well inhabited by goldsmiths, linen-drapers, haberdashers, and other noted tradesmen, being the chief high street in the city, and of a very great resort, as leading to and from the Royal Exchange to all parts westward.

At the south west angle of Wood-street there once stood a church dedicated to St. Peter; but of what antiquity we know not, other than that Thomas de Winton was rector thereof in the year 1324. It was sometimes called by the name of St. Peter's in Wood-street, and at other times St. Peter of Westcheap. The church, however, being destroyed by the fire in 1666, the parish is united to St. Matthew's, Friday-street; and the site is now used as a burying place for the inhabitants.

More westward from Wood street, on the same side, is Gutter-lane, which is principally inhabited by working silversmiths, and such as are dependent on that trade. In this lane stands

EMBROIDERERS HALL.

This building, though small, is very handsome, and conveniently adapted for the management of the affairs of the company, who were incorporated by queen Elizabeth in the year 1591, by the title of "The keepers or wardens and company of the art or mystery of the Broderers of the city of London." It is a livery company, the 48th in the city list; and is under the government of two keepers or wardens, and a court of assistants.

A little farther to the west is Foster-lane, on the east side of which stands the parochial church of #### St. VEDAST, alias FOSTER'S.

This church, which is a rectory, is so denominated from its being dedicated to St. Vedast, bishop of Arras; and the additional appellation, either from the place of its situation, or the founder or rebuilders. The first mention made of this church is, that Walter de London was presented thereto in the year 1308.

The patronage of this church was anciently in, and continued with the prior and convent of Canterbury, till the year 1352, when coming to the archbishop of that see, it has been in him and his successors ever since; and is one of the thirteen peculiars in this city, belonging to the archiepiscopal see.

Though this church was not entirely destroyed by the dreadful conflagration in 1666, yet it received very considerable damage; and was afterwards repaired for the most part upon the old walls. The steeple stood till the year 1694, when it was found in such a weak condition that the parishioners had it taken down and rebuilt, at their own charge, entirely of stone. It is sixty-nine feet long, fifty-one feet broad, and thirty-six feet high to the roof; and is well enlightened by a range of windows placed so high, that the doors open under them. The tower is plain, and the spire, which is short, rises from a double base.

To this parish, after the fire of London, was annexed that of St. Michael Querne; both of which are settled at the yearly value of 160l. per annum, in lieu of tythes, with the right of presentation to the archbishop, and dean and chapter of St. Paul's alternately. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are only two churchwardens, and seven auditors of accounts.

The parish of St. Michael Querne is a rectory, the church whereof stood at the west end of Cheapside, fronting the street, the site of which after its destruction in 1666, was laid into the street by the act for rebuilding the city.

The earliest account we find of this church is in the year 1181, when the state thereof was returned to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's; at which time it appears to have been only a chapel, and as such it continued many years after. It was not made a rectory till possessed by Thomas Newton, who was buried in the choir in the year 1461. In ancient records it is called St. Michael ad Bladum, i. e. at the corn (which posterity has corruptly pronounced Querne) because, at the time this church was founded, there was a corn market that reached up from it westward to the shambles or flesh market; from which situation it was sometimes called St. Michael de Macello.

At the east end of this church stood the Old Cross in Westcheap, which was taken down in the year 1390. And in this church was buried John Leland, or Leyland, the celebrated antiquarian, who was a priest in holy orders, and minister of Haseley, in Oxfordshire, and other churches. He was empowered by commission under the broad seal, to search all libraries, &c. for the antiquities of England; and having retired to his house in St. Michael's parish, to finish the books he had promised to the king, he fell distracted, and died in 1552.

The parishioners of St. Michael Querne still preserve their rights and privileges; they hold a vestry, which is general, and chuse their own officers, who are two churchwardens and six auditors of accounts.

On the west side of Foster-lane, is the site of a small ancient parish church, which was a rectory, dedicated to St. Leonard, and recorded by the name of Ecclesia Sancti Leonardi in Venella S. Vedasti, London. It was founded by the dean of St. Martin's-le-Grand for the use of the laity in that liberty, in whom the patronage continued till Henry VII. annexed that deanry to Westminster-abbey, since which it has remained in the dean and chapter of Westminster, who, in right thereof, present alternately to the living of Christ-church, Newgate-street and St. Leonard. The site of the church is now a burying-ground for the parishioners, who hold a vestry which is general, and choose two churchwardens.

At the south-east angle of Foster-lane, and facing Cheapside, stands

SADLERS HALL.

This is a very neat building, the inside of which is adorned with fret work and wainscot; and though small, yet it exceeds many others both with respect to beauty and convenience.

The fraternity of Sadlers appears to be of such antiquity, that there is extant a convention between them and the dean and chapter of St. Martin's-le-Grand, about the reign of Richard I. But it does not appear that they were legally incorporated till Edward I. granted them a charter by the style of "The wardens or keepers, and commonalty, of the mystery or art of Sadlers of London." It is a livery company, the 25th in the city list; and is governed by a prime, three other wardens, and a court of assistants.

Returning some way eastward, on the south side of Cheapside, we take in that part of Friday-street which is in this ward: on the west side of which, and almost at the north end thereof, is situate the parish church of St.

St. MATTHEW, FRIDAY-STREET.

This church owes its name to its dedication to St. Matthew the Evangelist, and its situation in the street of that name.

The patronage of this rectory being anciently in the abbot and convent of Westminster, it continued in them till their suppression, when the conventual church being converted into a cathedral, Henry VII. conferred the same upon the bishop. But the new bishopric being soon after dissolved, Edward VI. in the year 1551, granted the same to the bishop of London, and his successors, in whom the advowson still continues.

The old church being destroyed by the fire of London in 1666, the present structure was erected on its ruins. It is a plain stone building, with one series of large arched windows; and at the east end is the steeple, which consists of a square brick tower, void of all ornament.

This church not only serves for the use of its own inhabitants, but likewise those of the parish of St. Peter's Westcheap, whose church being destroyed in 1666, and not rebuilt, the parish is united to this, and both together made of the yearly value of 150l. in lieu of tythes. The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens and collectors, and five auditors of accounts.

The church of St. Peter, Cheap, stood at the south-west corner of Wood-street; but of what antiquity we know not, other than that Thomas de Winton, was rector thereof in the year 1324. The patronage of this church was anciently in the abbot and convent of St. Alban's; with whom it continued till the suppression of their monastery, when Henry VIII. in the year 1546, granted the same to the earl of Southampton, in which family it continued till the year 1667, when, by the death of Thomas, earl of Southampton, it descended to one of his daughters, by which means it came to the Montague family; so that the right of presentation to St. Matthew Friday-street and St. Peter Cheap united, is alternately in the bishop of London and the Montague family.

This parish holds a general vestry, and is governed by two churchwardens or overseers, and seven auditors of accounts.

Farther to the west, on the same side, is the street called the Old Change, which leads into Watling-street: at the west end of which, on the north side, is situate the parish church of

St. AUGUSTIN, OR AUSTIN.

This church, which is a rectory, is so called from its dedication to Austin or Augustin the monk, and first archbishop of Canterbury. It was anciently denominated Ecclesia Sancti Augustini ad Portam, from its vicinity to the south-east gate of St. Paul's church-yard. The patronage

* This church was originally a distinct building from St. Paul's, at the east end of the cathedral; but that building was demolished to make way for the enlargement of St. Paul's church, in the year 1251 or 1256. In lieu of this living is, and always has been in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's.

The old church was burnt down in 1666, and afterwards rebuilt very substantially with stone. It is well pewed and wainscotted; and the altar-piece is spacious and beautiful, having, peculiar to it, a winged heart aspiring towards glory, with these words in gold on a blue ground, Sarsum corda, i. e. lift up your hearts.

After the fire of London this church was made parochial for St. Austin's and St. Faith's annexed to it; and the living of both united was made of the yearly value of 172l. in lieu of tythes. The vestry is select, and the parish officers are only two churchwardens.

The church of St. Faith,* when in being, was only a kind of chapel within the cathedral church of St. Paul. It was dedicated to St. Faith, a holy virgin of Agen, in Aquitaine in France, who suffered martyrdom for the christian faith under Dioclesian the emperor, because she would not offer sacrifices to the idol gods; and it was called Ecclesia sanctæ Fidei in cryptis, or the church of St. Faith in the vaults underground; being situated at the west end of Jesus chapel, under the choir of the cathedral church of St. Paul; which chapel being suppressed by king Edward VI. the parishioners of St. Faith were, in the year 1551, permitted to remove into the same, which continued as a parish church till the cathedral was demolished by the great fire in 1666. It is a rectory, and one of the peculiars belonging to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, where they are both patrons and ordinaries. The vestry is general, and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, and four auditors of accounts.

In leaving the east extremity of this ward, we proceed from the north west corner of Cheapside into Newgate-street, which takes its name from the gate at the west end, and is a place of good trade and well inhabited. On the north side of this street is Butcher-hall-lane, which in former times was known by the name of Stinking-lane, on account of the nastiness of the place, occasioned by the slaughter-houses in it. Since the removal of which it has been well built and inhabited. The lane runs, through several turnings, on the east into St. Martin's le Grand, and to Aldersgate; on the north through a broad paved passage into Town-ditch; and on the west into Christ-church hospital.

Farther to the west from Butcher-hall-lane, on the same side, is a passage which leads to

CHRIST-CHURCH, Newgate-street.

This church, which is dedicated to the name and honour of Our Saviour, originally belonged to the convent of Grey Friars, or Franciscans, which falling to the crown at the dissolution of that religious house, king Henry VIII. gave it to the mayor, commonalty and citizens of London, whereof a conveniency was made under the choir, and on the spot where St. Faith's church had stood, as a place of worship for the parishioners.

to make a parish church thereof, in lieu of the two churches of St. Ewen, in Newgate-market, near the north corner of Eldeneſs (now called Warwick-lane) and of St. Nicholas in the Shambles, on the north ſide of Newgate-ſtreet, where there is now a court. Both which churches and their pariſhes were thereupon demolished; and as much of St. Pulchre's pariſh as laid within Newgate, was added to this new erected pariſh church; which was then ordered to be called by the name of Chriſt-church. From which time it was made a vicarage and pariſh church, in the patronage of the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of the city of London, governors of the poor, called the hoſpital of Little St. Bartholomew's, alſo of the foundation of Henry VIII.*

The Old church being deſtroyed by the fire of London in 1666, only the choir or eaſt end thereof has been rebuilt, with a tower added to it, having none before. This edifice, however, is built of ſtone, very ſtrong, ſpacious, and beautiful.

The tower is ſquare, and of a conſiderable height, crowned with a light handſome turret, adorned with vaſes. The inſide is neatly ornamented; the walls and pillars are wainſcoted; and there are very large galleries on the north, weſt, and ſouth ſides. The pulpit is veneered and carved with the figures of our Saviour and his twelve apoſtles, ſitting at the laſt ſupper, and the four Evangeliſts. The altar is ſpacious; and the communion table ſtands on a foot-piece of black and white marble, encompassed with handſome rails and banniſters; and the front is made of white marble, neatly carved in relievo.

After the fire of London it was made the parochial church for the inhabitants of this, and the pariſh of St. Leonard Foſter-lane, which is annexed to it; and both together are made of the yearly value of two hundred pounds in lieu of tythes.

This living is alternately in the gift of the governors of St. Bartholomew's hoſpital, who, being impropiators, appoint a vicar; but the pariſh of St. Leonard is a rectory in the gift of the dean and chapter of Weſtmiſter, ſo that they preſent alternately. The veſtry is general; and the pariſh officers are two church-wardens and four collectors for the poor.

Here are ſeveral gift ſermons, viz. one on St. Matthew's day; on the fifth and ſeventeenth of November; on St. Stephen's day; on the firſt Sunday in lent; on the Sunday after aſcenſion-day; on Chriſtmas-day and Midſummer-day.

Facing the weſt end of the church, acroſs the public paſſage is the old church-yard, and the remaining ſite of the old church.

* The king gave five hundred marks per annum in land, for ever, for the maintenance of the ſaid church, with divine ſervice, repairs, &c. In conſideration whereof, the mayor, commonalty, and citizens, did covenant and grant (inter alia) to find and ſuſtain one preacher at this church, who was to be from time to time vicar thereof; giving unto him yearly for his ſtipend 16l. 13s. 4d. to the viſitor (now called the ordinary of Newgate) 10l. and to the other five prieſts in Chriſt's-church, all to be helping in divine ſervice, miniſtering the ſacrament and ſacramentals, 8l. each; to two clerks 6l. each; and to a ſexton 4l. yearly.

Adjoining to this church, at the north weſt corner we enter

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

This hoſpital was founded by king Edward VI. (See page 201) for the maintenance and education of poor fatherleſs children, † to be virtuously brought up, and fitted for trades.

This pious example of the young king was from time to time improved by his royal ſucceſſors. King Charles II. founded a mathematical ſchool and ward, lying on the weſt part of the hoſpital, for the inſtruction of forty boys in the mathematics, eſpecially in that part of it that reſpects navigation; and liberally endowed it with 1000l. per annum, paid out of the exchequer for ſeven-years, for the founding thereof.

Sir William Cheſter, kn. and aldermen of London, and John Calthorp, citizen and draper of the ſame city, at their own proper coſts and charges, made the brick walls and way on the back ſide, which leadeth from the ſaid hoſpital to the hoſpital of St. Bartholomew; and alſo covered and vaulted the Town ditch, from Alderſgate to Newgate; which before was very loathſome, and infectious to the ſaid hoſpital.

This hoſpital being thus erected, and put into good order, there was one Richard Caſtel, alias Caſtellar, ſhoe-maker, dwelling in Weſtmiſter, a man who was very aſſiduous in his faculty with his own hands; and ſuch a one as was named the Cock of Weſtmiſter, becauſe both winter and ſummer he was at work by four o'clock in the morning. This man thus truly and painfully labouring for his living, God bleſſed and increaſed his labours ſo abundantly, that he purchaſed lands and tenements at Weſtmiſter, to the yearly value of 44l. and, having no child, with the conſent of his wife, who ſurvived him, and was a virtuous good woman, gave the ſame lands wholly to Chriſt's-hoſpital aforeſaid, to the relief of the innocent and fatherleſs children; and for the ſuccour of the miſerable, ſore and ſick, harboured in the other hoſpitals about London.

By the conſtitution of this hoſpital the mathematical maſter muſt be thus qualified: he muſt be a ſober, diſcreet, and diligent perſon, of good life, a good ſcholar, very well underſtanding the latin and greek languages, a very good mathematician, well knowing and ready in the theory and practice of all its parts; to the end boys may be furthered in the latin tongue, and the maſter able to anſwer ſtrangers, if need be; and that they and others may find his abilities to ſatisfaction.

† In the year 1552 began the repairing of the Greyfriars houſe, for the poor fatherleſs children; and, in the month of November the children were taken into the ſame, to the number of almoſt 400. On Chriſtmas day in the afternoon, while the Lord-mayor and aldermen rode to St. Pauls, the children of Chriſt's hoſpital ſtood from St. Laurence's-lane end in Cheap, towards St Paul's, all in one livery of ruſſet cotton, 340 in number; and the Eaſter following they were in blue, and ſo have continued ever ſince.

Ten boys are to be put forth yearly apprentices to masters of ships; to the end that they may be fit in time to do service in the navy royal, and ten more to be received in their rooms. These youths, who are chosen out of the rest of the blue coat boys, are to be the most acute, and of the readiest wits, that they may be fit for mathematical studies. These, as a badge of distinction, wear on their breasts, fastened to their coats, a plate of silver, with some figures engraven, the dye whereof is kept in the lower, where they are all stamped. The chief figures are three liberal sciences, viz. arithmetic with a scroll of accounts in one hand, and laying her other hand upon a blue coat boy's head, having his cap under his arm. The next figure represents Geometry, with a triangle in her hand. The third astronomy, with a quadrant in one hand, and a sphere in the other. There is also the figure of a ship or two under sail, with a wind from heaven, blowing as it were upon it a prosperous gale. There are also in the clouds two angels, one of them a Mercury; and these words wrote round, declaring the royal founder, and the year when this school commenced, viz. Auspicio Caroli Secundi Regis, 1673. This badge they wear constantly, not only in the hospital, and about the town, but when they are put forth; which, when seen, secureth them from being pressed.

There have been sometimes 1000 poor children, and more, maintained here at one time.

There is a great and spacious hall, built after the great fire by Sir John Frederick, alderman of London, the expence of which amounted to five thousand pounds. In this hall at the upper end is a large picture, that covereth all the wall of the north end, and stretcheth on the east and west walls, representing king James II. but intended for king Charles II. had he lived but a little longer, sitting there, and his nobles, and the governors, and treasurer, and others in great numbers standing about him, with the pictures of king Edward VI. and king Charles II. as founders, drawn half way, painted as hanging up in the same table. And there is a particular representation of the mathematical school; it is done by Vario, and reckoned worth 1000l. There is likewise at the other end of this hall, a large picture more ancient of king Edward VI. the first founder, delivering his royal charter for this hospital to the mayor, who kneeleth with the aldermen behind him; a bishop, which we suppose is Ridley, with many others standing about; an ancient and a fine piece: nor must we forget the fine piece of the pool of Bethesda, very large, and painted in a masterly stile by Mr. Hogarth.

In this hall is a good organ, that oftentimes plays, when the boys also sing their psalms or anthems on Sundays and other special days.

There are eight wards where the children's beds are, and where they lodge and harbour: in each of these wards are harboured above fifty odd, one with another.

The girls have a ward also by themselves, which is situated passing out of the great hall on the east. It is fair and handsome, and indeed, the best ward of all. It was built at the cost of Mr.

John Morice and Sir Robert Clayton, the former giving a 1000l. the other much more.

There is another convenient ward apart by itself, for the sick, where they that fall into any distempers are removed, and due care taken of them. It consists of a room for the lodging of the sick, a kitchen, a consultation chamber, and other convenient places; with a proper nurse.

Of the ancient buildings remaining, there is an old cloister of the Grey-friars, and was part of the old priory. It serves for a thoroughfare, and a place of recreation for the boys, especially in rainy weather: but, being gone to decay, it was repaired, by the direction of that excellent architect Sir Christopher Wren, knt.

For schools, there are these: a grammar school, a mathematical school, a writing school, and a school for the girls, where they learn to read, to sew and to mark.

The grammar school is ancient; the other more modern, and set up since the great fire.

The writing school is a very fair structure, at the end of the great hall, lofty and airy; founded by Sir John Moore, knt. sometime one of the aldermen of the city, and president of this house. It containeth long writing boards, sufficient for three hundred boys to sit and write at. It cost the builder 5000l. whose statue, in white marble, at full proportion, is placed at the upper end, with this inscription:

“ Anno Dom. 1694.

“ This writing school, and stately building, “ was begun, and compleatly finished, at
“ the sole charge of Sir John Moore, knt.
“ and Lord-mayor of the city, in the year “ MDCLXXXI; now president of this “ house; he having been otherwise a liberal “ benefactor to the same.”

The masters of these schools are four, viz. a grammar master, who hath also an usher to assist him; a mathematical master; and a writing master; who have 100l. per annum each, for their salaries, besides houses.

There are also two school mistresses that teach the girls, who also have sufficient salaries, and houses to dwell in.

The grammar master hath also an addition of twenty pounds yearly, for catechising the boys; and his usher fifty pounds a year besides. In short twelve or thirteen hundred pounds per annum is expended in salaries to the officers, clerks, and servants; all of whom are chosen by the governors.

This hospital has been further improved, by entertaining a master to teach the boys drawing. Some skill in which art is so very useful to many, or most mechanical trades; as, besides painters, those of seamen, carpenters, joiners, plumbers, carvers, masons, bricklayers, &c.

The governors are many, and commonly persons that have been masters or wardens of their companies, or men of estates, or from whom there are expectations of charity. Out of these, one is president, and he commonly is some ancient alderman that hath passed the chair; and another is treasurer, who takes care of the affairs of the whole house, and of the revenues, and therefore is commonly resident, and hath a good house to dwell in, but without any salary: and such an one is chosen by the governors for this great trust, who is of note for his ability, integrity, and charity: and according to the repute he hath, so the hospital usually flourisheth, and the benefactions come in plentifully.

Every governor, when he is admitted into this society, hath this charge solemnly given him, in the presence of the president or treasurer, and other governors assembled in court:

“Worshipful,

“The cause of your repair hither at this present is, to give you knowledge, that you are elected and appointed, by the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen, to the office, charge, and governance of Christ’s-hospital.

“And, therefore, this is to require you, and every of you, that you endeavour yourselves, with all your wisdom and power, faithfully and diligently to serve in this vocation and calling, which is an office of high trust and worship: for ye are called to be the faithful distributors and disposers of the goods of Almighty God to his poor and needy members. In the which office and calling if you shall be found negligent and unfaithful, ye shall not only declare yourselves to be the most unthankful and unworthy servants of Almighty God; being put in trust to see the relief and succour of his poor and needy flock; but also ye shall shew yourselves to be very notable and great enemies to that work, which most highly doth advance and beautify the common wealth of this realm, and chiefly of this city of London.

“These are therefore to require you, and every of you, that ye here promise before God, and this assembly of your fellow-governors, faithfully to travail in this your office and calling, that this work may have its perfection, and that the needy number committed to your charge be diligently and wholiomely provided for, as you will answer before God, at the hour and time when you and we shall stand before him, to render an account of our doings. And, promising this to do, you shall be now admitted into this company and fellowship.”

Besides the chief governors, they have divers officers that receive salaries, viz. four clerks, a steward and a matron; for every ward, a nurse and her maid; a porter and four beadles.

They have also three servants, which they call street-men, that see to the well government of the carts of London. Likewise certain clerks for Blackwell-hall; whence are certain duties coming to the house.

The beer provided by this great family is supplied by two brewers, and the bread by three bakers.

There are two of the governors that are called almoners, who for a month, or more, take care to buy and lay in butchers meat, that is, beef and mutton; the steward attending them.

Every morning the children have for their breakfast bread and beer, at half an hour past six in the morning in the summer time; and at half an hour past seven in the winter. On Sundays they have boiled beef and pottage for their dinners; and for their suppers bread and butter.

On Mondays milk-pottage, Tuesdays roast mutton, Wednesdays rice-milk, Thursdays boiled beef and broth, Fridays boiled mutton and broth, and on Saturdays pease pottage.

Their supper is bread and cheese, or butter for those that cannot eat cheese.

They have roast beef about twelve days in the year, by the kindness of several benefactors; who have left, some three pounds, some thirty shillings per annum for that end and purpose.

To support all this, the hospital has a great annual revenue in houses and lands; the benefit of licensing and looking after the four hundred and twenty carts allowed by the city, each of which pays a certain sum for sealing; and the duty of about three farthings upon every piece of cloth brought to Blackwell-hall.

This hospital also provides for a considerable number of younger children at Ware and Hertford; at each of which places there is a school-master, with a salary of fifty pounds each, to teach those children to read. At Ware, the hospital school is built like a college, making a large quadrangle, for boys: consisting of a school-house, the master’s house, and thirteen houses for nurseries to keep the children. At Hertford, there is a school-house, a masters house, and twenty others, with two rooms on a floor, and gardens belonging.

On the north side of the cloisters are two doors: one opens into Town ditch, which is now a fine open area, with several good houses built, and well inhabited: the other opens a way into St. Bartholomew’s-hospital and Smithfield. And close to this door or gate, on the west side is a burial ground, in which are interred such as die in Newgate, &c.

The principal gate into this hospital is on the west, and almost at the south west corner of the old building, from the court which to this day is called the Grey-friars.* In queen Mary’s days there

* These were a society or religious order founded by St. Francis of Assisi, canonized by pope Gregory IX. in 1228. Of whom a detached body of nine brethren, five whereof were priests, and four lay brothers, were sent from Italy to settle and propagate their order in England. The priests placed themselves at Canterbury, in the year 1224. The lay-brothers came to London, and were entertained by the Friars Preachers in Oldborn for about fifteen days, or till they could be accommodated with a convenient house for themselves, which they soon obtained of John Travers, one of the sheriffs in 1224. In which house they made themselves cells, and continued till their numbers, in a few years, there was in this place a stinking loathsome dungeon, where it had been usual to confine and punish vagabonds; and in the Marian persecution it served for the imprisonment of such as fell under the displeasure of the popish ministry; amongst whom we read of one Thomas Green, servant to John Wayland, a printer, who was confined and cruelly whipped in this dungeon, for being concerned in printing a book called Antichrist.

At the west extremity of Newgate-street stands Newgate; the origin and description of which the reader will find in page 13, &c.

On the south side of Newgate-street is Warwick-lane, on the west side of which, near to the north end, is situate

THE COLLEGE of PHYSICIANS.†

This is a very noble edifice built with brick and stone. The entrance, which is grand, is under an octangular theatre, finishing in a dome, with a cone on the top, making a lantern to it. The inside is elegant, finely enlightened and very capacious; designed by Sir Christopher Wren. The central building, which contains the library and other rooms of state and convenience, was the design of Inigo Jones. The ascent to the door is by a flight of steps, and in the under part is a basement story. The whole front is decorated with pilasters of the Ionic and Corinthian orders; and on one side, over the door case, is the statue of king Charles II. placed in a niche, and in the other side that of Sir John Cutler. The buildings at the two sides of the court are uniform, and have the window cases handsomely ornamented. The orders are well executed, and the whole edifice both beautiful and commodious.

Here is a hall in which the physicians sit to give advice to the poor gratis; a committee room; a library, furnished with books by Sir Theodore Mayerne and the marquis of Dorchester, who was one of the fellows; a great hall for the quarterly meetings of the doctors, adorned with pictures and sculpture; a theatre for anatomical dissection; a preparing room, where there are thirteen tables, containing all the muscles in the human body; and over all, garrets to dry the herbs for the use of the dispensatory.

The physicians were incorporated in the tenth of Henry VIII. who, on the twenty-third of September, granted a charter to incorporate certain physicians in one body, and perpetual commonalty or fellowship of the faculty of physic; and to have a perpetual succession, and a common seal; and to choose yearly a president, to oversee, rule and govern the said fellowship in all even of the same faculty. By virtue whereof they were enabled to purchase and possess, in fee and perpetuity, lands, tenements and rents, and any other possession; that they might make statutes and ordinances for the wholesome government and correction of the college, and of all persons practising physic within seven miles of the city; and, within that compass, none to practise, as well as in the city, unless first allowed by the president and fellowship, upon pain of forfeiting five pounds for every month; that four be chosen yearly by the president and college, who shall have the supervising, search, examination, and government of all the physicians of the city and suburbs within seven miles; with an exemption that no physician shall be liable to serve any offices in wards or parishes, or be put upon juries, inquests; &c.

By a statute made in the thirty second of Henry VIII. the physicians of this college were exempt from keeping watch and ward, and from serving other offices within the city and suburbs; and they were empowered to chuse four physicians yearly to search the apothecaries wares, drugs, and stuffs. This charter was confirmed by queen Mary I.

Queen Elizabeth gave them another charter to take four human bodies, executed at Tyburn, to anatomize. king James I. and king Charles II. each of them granted them a charter.

By the power granted them by these and other their charters, they have called before them the president, or, in his absence, the vice president, and the censors, the surgeons, apothecaries, and other persons, that have practised physic without their allowance; and have sometimes warned them to forbear, and sometimes imposed pecuniary penalties or imprisonment upon them. For they may convene any physician or practitioner before them, and examine them concerning their skill in the faculty of physic; and if they shall not appear to their summons, or appearing refuse to answer, or to be examined, the college may assess a penalty or fine upon them for every default of appearance, or refusal to answer; the fine, for one default, not exceeding forty shillings, or, if any administer unwholesome and noisome medicines, he may be fined according to their direction, not exceeding ten pounds, or imprisonment, not exceeding fourteen days, unless for non-payment of fine, when it shall be lawful to detain them in prison till it be discharged.

On a complaint made, about the latter end of queen Elizabeth's reign, by Jenkins and Read, against the college, which had used some punishment towards them for evil practice of physic, years, required a more commodious convent. For which purpose John Ewen purchased a vacant piece of ground near St. Nicholas shambles, and, with proper assistants, built a house thereon for the said friars; and, having appropriated the same to the commonalty of London, he himself became a lay brother in the said house; which in process of time was greatly augmented by the benevolence of queen Margaret, second wife to Edward I. and other benefactors; amongst whom we find Sir Richard Whittington, who founded a library in the Grey friars convent, 129 feet long and thirty-one broad, and furnished it well with books.

† The first college belonging to this society was situate in Knight-riders-street, and given them by doctor Linacre, physician to Henry VIII. They afterwards removed to a house which they purchased in Amen-corner, where doctor Harvey, who found out the circulation of the blood in 1652, built a library and a public hall, which he granted for ever to the college, and endowed it with his estate, which he resigned to them in his lifetime. Part of which they assigned for an annual oration in commemoration of their benefactors, and to provide a good dinner for the society. This building perished in the flames in the fire of London.

and

and exercising that art without the licence, after a long and careful hearing on both parts, Popham, lord-chief justice, in the year 1602, gave his judgment, the sum of which was in these particulars:

1. That there was no sufficient licence without the college seal.
2. That no surgeon, as a surgeon, might practice physic, no, not for any disease, though it was the great pox.
3. That the authority of the college was strong, and sufficient to commit to prison.
4. That the censure of the college, rising from lesser mulcts, to greater, was equal and reasonable.
5. That it were fit to set to physicians bills the day of the month, and the patient's name.
6. That the lord-chief-justice could not bail or deliver the college's prisoner, but was obliged by law to deliver him up to the censure of the college.
7. That a freeman of London might lawfully be imprisoned by the college.
8. That no man, though ever so learned a physician or doctor, might practice in London, or within seven miles, without the licence of the college.

October 12, 1747, Mr. Mead read the draught of a new statute, forbidding any member of the college to meet or consult, in any case of physic, with persons prohibited from practice. Which statute was ordered to be engrossed, in order to be read at the next college meeting. And

On the fourth of April 1748, the following statute, prohibiting any fellow, candidate, or licentiate, to consult, in any case of physic, with persons prohibited by the college from the practice thereof, was read the second time, and approved by the majority of the college.

A statute against consulting with any person prohibited to practise physic.

" That we may, as much as in us lies, answer the good ends and laudable purposes of our institution, and the privileges and powers granted to us by the royal charter, and confirmed by several acts of parliament, for preventing the great mischiefs which often happen to the health of his majesty's subjects, and the dishonour arising to the profession of physic by empiricks and unskilful persons, who take upon them to practise physic in the city of London, or the suburbs thereof or seven miles circuit of the same, and refuse or are not qualified to undergo an examination by the president and censors of this college, touching their skill and knowledge in medicines, and the practice of physic:

„ We do ordain and order, that if the president shall at any time inform the college, at any of their solemn or greater meetings, ordinary or extraordinary, that any person practising physic, within the limits aforesaid, hath been duly summoned to attend the president and censors, to be examined by them touching his skill and knowledge in the practice of physic, and hath refused or neglected to attend according to such summons, or attending, hath refused to submit to be examined, according to the form and manner of examination prescribed by the statutes of their college, or, having been examined, hath been adjudged, by the president and censors, not sufficiently learned and qualified to practise; and that the president and censors have, for any of the said reasons, prohibited such persons to practise physic within the limits aforesaid; then, and in such case, no fellow, candidate, or licentiate of this college, at any time after such information so given to the college by the president, shall in any wise meet in consultations for the cure of any disease, with any person so prohibited to practise: and that if any fellow, candidate, or licentiate of this college shall, after such information so given, in any wise meet in consultation, for the cure of any disease, with any person so prohibited, every such fellow, candidate, and licentiate, being convicted thereof before the president and censors of this college for the time being, shall, for such his meeting, forfeit and pay to the treasurer of this college, for the time being, for the use of the college, the sum of five pounds of lawful money of Great Britain for the first offence; and if such fellow, candidate, or licentiate, shall, after such conviction, offend again in the like manner, and be thereof convicted in the manner aforesaid, he shall forfeit and pay to the said treasurer, for the use of the college, the sum of ten pounds of such lawful money as aforesaid; and if such fellow, candidate, or licentiate, shall refuse or neglect to pay either of the said sums or forfeitures, within the space of three calendar months next after notice in writing of such his respective conviction, given to or left for him at his then dwelling-house, or most usual place of abode, by the beadle of this college for the time being; or if such fellow, candidate, or licentiate, shall, after such second conviction, offend a third time in like manner, and be thereof convicted in the manner aforesaid; then, and in either of the last mentioned cases, he shall be expelled this college, and shall not be restored to be a fellow, candidate, or licentiate of this college until he shall have paid to the treasurer of this college for the time being, for the use of the college, all such sum or sums of money, as such fellow, candidate, or licentiate shall have forfeited by virtue of this statute.

" We do further ordain and order, that every fellow, candidate, or licentiate of this college, who shall in any wise meet in consultation, for the cure of any disease, with any person, who by virtue of this statute shall be expelled the college, shall incur and be subject to the same or the like respective forfeitures and penalties as are above-mentioned.

" And, for the better putting this statute in execution, we do ordain and order, that, when, and as often as any person or persons shall, by virtue of this statute, be expelled this college, notice thereof in writing, specifying the name

" or

* or names of such person or persons, signed by the beadle of this college for the time being, shall be given to, or left for every fellow, candidate or licentiate, at his dwelling-house, or usual place of abode."

Ordered that the college seal be put to the said statute next Comitia majora.

The officers of this college are, a president, eight electors, four censors, a register, and a treasurer, annually chosen the first week in October.

Near the north-east corner of Warwick-lane formerly stood the parish church of St. Ewen, whose parish was dissolved to make way for the establishment of Christ-church.

Farther to the east is a passage which leads into

NEW GATE MARKET.*

This is a handsome, commodious square piece of ground, measuring 194 feet from east to west, and 148 feet from north to south. In the middle is a market-house, under which are vaults or cellars, and the upper part of the building is employed as a kind of warehouse for the fruiterers, and the keepers of green-stalls by night. In the shops under this building tripe and other things are sold, and in the middle, near the market-house, are sold fruit and greens. At a convenient distance are shops for butchers, the sellers of butter, &c. and the houses beyond these, which extend along the sides of the market, are also taken up by butchers. The passages to the market from Pater-noster-Row and Newgate-street, are occupied by poulterers, fishmongers, cheesemongers, and dealers in bacon.

Farther to the east from this market we pass Ivy-lane, and come to Pannier-alley, the north end of which almost faces St. Martin's-le-Grand. In this alley is a stone pedestal, supporting a pannier, with a figure of a boy upon it, and this inscription:

When you have fought the city round,
Yet still this is the highest ground.

Returning a little to the west, on the south side of Pater-noster-Row, is Canon-alley, (commonly called King's-head alley) which leads into St. Paul's church-yard, in the center of which is situate the cathedral church of St. Paul.†

* Before the fire of London this market was kept in Newgate-street, where there was a market-house for meal, and a middle row of sheds, which were afterwards converted into houses, inhabited by butchers, tripe-sellers, &c. while the country people, who brought provisions to the city, were forced to stand with their stalls in the open street, where their persons and goods were exposed to danger by the passage of coaches, carts, and cattle that passed through the streets. At that time Butcherhall-lane was filled with slaughter-houses for the use of this market; and Blowbladder-street was rendered remarkable by blown bladders hanging in the windows of the shops where bladders were sold.

† The reader will find a particular description of this building in page 275, &c.

‡ Facing this cross stood the charnel, in which the bones of the dead were decently piled together, a thousand loads whereof were removed to Finsbury fields, in the reign of

About the middle of this church-yard formerly stood the pulpit cross, ‡ where sermons were preached every Sunday forenoon to the populace, and many public notices were usually issued out from the Lord-mayor and from the king. This cross was made of timber covered with lead, mounted upon steps of stone; and was supported by as many donations as amounted to 1814l. 6s. 8d. and the preachers were appointed by the bishop of London, and had 45s. for each sermon, and four days diet and lodging at such house as the said bishop should appoint, and was on that account called the Shunamite, and allowed 15s. per week. The preachers are now appointed to preach in the church, and are allowed 35s. by the city, and 5s. only by the church.

The government of St. Paul's cathedral is in a bishop, a dean, a precentor, chancellor, treasurer, five archdeacons, thirty prebendaries, twelve petty canons, or minor canons, six vicars coral, and several other inferior officers. All the prebends, or canonries are in the collation of the bishop of the diocese; and out of these thirty canons, there are three residentiaries, besides the dean; so called from their continual residence in the church, to transact the business of the church in the chapter, and daily to take care of the concerns of the church.

On the north side of St. Paul's church-yard § stands

The CHAPTER HOUSE.

This is a handsome building, belonging to St. Paul's, in which the convocation of the province of Canterbury sat to consult about ecclesiastical affairs, and to form canons for the government of the church: but though the upper and lower house are called by the king's writ at every session of parliament, they are now constantly prorogued, and dismissed by his majesty's authority.

On the east side of St. Paul's church-yard is situate

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL.

This was founded by Dr. John Colet, dean of St. Paul's, in the year 1507, for 153 children to be taught free by three masters: the particulars and origin of which will best appear from the following piece, wrote by the founder himself, and delivered to Mr. Lilly, on the 18th of June, in the year 1518.

Edward VI. and there laid in a moorish place, with so much earth to cover them as raised the ground for three windmills to stand upon. The charnel itself, together with a chapel called Sheryngton's chapel, the library which belonged to the old Chapter-house, and other chapels adjoining, were at the same time pulled down, and their materials, by order of Edward duke of Somerset, converted to the building of Somerset house in the Strand.

§ At the east end of this church-yard formerly stood the clochier, or bell-tower, in which were four great bells called Jesus Bells, because they actually belonged to Jesus chapel in St. Faith's church; but these, together with the fine image of St. Paul on the top of the spire, being won by Sir Miles Partridge, knt. of king Henry VIII. at one cast of the dice, were, by that gentleman, taken down and sold.

“ John Colet, son of Henry Colet, dean of St. Paul's, desiring nothing more than education, and bringing up children in good manners and literature, in the year of our Lord 1512, built a school [not fully finished till that year] at the east end of St. Paul's church, for 153 boys, to be taught free in the same.

“ And ordained there a master, a sur-master, and a chaplain, with sufficient and perpetual stipends ever to endure; and set patrons, defenders, governors and rulers of the same school, the most honest and faithful fellowship of the Mercers of London.

“ And, for because nothing can continue long and endure in good order without laws and statutes, I, the said John Colet, have expressed my mind, what I would should be duly and diligently observed and kept of the said master, sur-master and chaplain, and of the Mercers, governors of the school: that in this book may appear to what intent I founded this school.”

Then follow his ordinances: “ That he founded the school in the honour of Christ Jesu in pueritia, and of his blessed mother Mary. That the high master should be chosen by the wardens and assistants of the Mercers. That he be a man whole in body, honest, virtuous, and learned in clean Latin literature, as also in Greek, if such might be gotten; a wedded man, a single man, or a priest that hath no benefice with cure or service. His wages to be a mark a week, and a livery gown of four nobles delivered in cloth. His lodgings to be free; and to have the tenement of Stebbonhith to resort unto. That the sur-master be versed in learning, and well lettered, to teach under the master; either single man, wedded, or priest that hath no benefice with cure or service: to be whole in body. The high master to chuse him, as the room shall be void: and to be confirmed by the surveyors of the school. Lodgings to be assigned him in the Old Change. His wages to be 6s. 8d. per week, and a livery gown of four nobles delivered in cloth. That there shall be in the school a priest daily, as he could, to sing mass in the chapel of the school, and to pray for the children to prosper in good life and in good letters. That he was to be some honest, good, and virtuous man; to be chosen by the wardens and assistants of the Mercery. To learn himself, or, if learned, to help to teach the school, if it seemed convenient to the high master. To have no benefice with cure of souls, nor no other office or occupation. To teach the children the catechism, and instruction of the articles of faith and the ten commandments in English. His wages to be 8l. by the year, and a livery gown of 26s. 8d. delivered in cloth. His chamber and lodging to be in the new house in the Old Change, or the master's lodging.

“ Children of all nations and countries indifferently to be taught, to the number of 153. The master to admit these children as they be offered; but first to see that they can say the catechism, and also read and write competently; and to pay four pence for writing their name: which money the poor scholar that swept the school was to have. Thrice a day, viz. morning, noon, and evening, prostrate to say the prayers contained in a table in the school. No tallow candles, but only wax to be used, no meat, drink, or bottles, to be brought; nor no breakfasts nor drinkings in the time of learning. That the scholars use no cock-fighting, nor riding about of victory, nor disputing at St. Bartholomew's; which are but foolish babbling, and loss of time. That they have no remedies [i. e. that is play-days begged] except the king, an archbishop, or a bishop, present in his own person, desired it. The children every Childermas-day to go to Paul's church, and hear the child bishop sermon, and after to be at the high mass, and each offer a penny to the child bishop; and with them the masters and surveyors of the school. In general processions, when warned, they shall go two and two together soberly; and not sing out, but say devoutly seven psalms with the litany. That if any child admitted here, go to any other school to learn there, such child for no man's suit be again received into the school.

“ To be taught always in good literature both Latin and Greek, and good authors, such as have the very Roman eloquence joined with wisdom; especially christian authors, that wrote their wisdom with clean and chaste Latin, either in verse or prose. But, above all, the catechism in English; after that the accidence. Then Institutio Christiani hominis, which Erasmus made at my [i. e. Colet's] request; the Copia Verborum of the same author. Then other christian authors; as Lactantius, Prudentius, and Proba; Sedulius, Juvenius, and Baptista Mantuanus; and such other as shall be thought convenient for the true Latin speech.

“ The honourable company of Mercers of London to have all the charge, and care, and rule of the school. They to chuse every year of their company, two honest, substantial men to be the surveyors of the school, who, in the name of the whole fellowship, should take all the care and business of the school for that year. They to come into the school six days before Christmas, and so many days before easter, St. John Baptist, and Michaelmas; and pay the masters and chaplains their quarterly wages; and at the latter end of the year their liveries in cloth. And once in the year to give up their accounts to the master, wardens, and assistants; and that to be about Candlemas, three days before, or three days after. Then a little dinner to be made; and to call to account the receiving of all the estate of the school: and the master warden to receive a noble, the two other wardens five shillings; the surveyors two shillings; and for their riding to visit the lands eleven shillings, the clerk of the Mercery three shillings and four-pence with some other gifts. That which was spared that day in rewards and charges to be put into the treasury of the school. What remained to be given to the fellowship of the Mercery, to the maintaining and repairing all belonging to the school from time to time. The surplusage, above repairs and casualties, to be put into a coffer of iron, given by Colet, standing in their hall. And there, from year year to year, to remain apart by itself, that it might appear how the school of itself maintained itself. And at length, over and above the whole livelihood, if the said school grow to any further charge to the Mercery, that then also it might appear, to the laud, and praise, and mercy of the said fellowship.

“ Lastly, that he left it to the said company to add and diminish to and from this his book, and to supply it in every default, and also to declare in it, as time, place, and just occasion should require.”

The original building was consumed by the fire of London in 1666, soon after which the present edifice arose in its place; with the addition of a library, and an house on the south end thereof for the second master; whose dwelling before, and from the first founding of the school, was in the Old Change. This house hath a very handsome front, answerable to the high master's at the north end of the school; on which is engraven, ÆDES PRÆCEPTORIS GRAMMATICÆ.

St. Paul's school is a very singular and at the same time a very handsome edifice. The central building, in which is the school, is of stone; it is much lower than the ends, and has only one series of windows, which are large, and raised a considerable height from the ground. The center is adorned with rustic, and on the top is a handsome pediment, in which are the founder's arms placed in a shield; upon the apex stands a figure representing Learning. Under this pediment are two windows which are square, and on each side are two circular windows crowned with busts, and the spaces between them are handsomely ornamented by work in relievo. Upon a level with the foot of the pediment runs on either side a handsome balustrade, on which is placed on each side a large bust with a radiant crown, between two flaming vases.

The school-house is large and spacious. It consisteth of eight classes, or forms; in the first whereof children learn their rudiments; and from thence, according to their proficiency, are advanced unto the other forms, till they rise to the eighth. Whence, being commonly made perfect grammarians, good orators and poets, well instructed in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and sometimes in other oriental languages, they remove to the universities; and many of them enjoy exhibitions, some of ten pounds a year for seven years, if they continue so long, towards their maintenance there. The school is governed and taught by two masters, viz. an high master, and a sur-master, and a chaplain; whose customary office was to read the Latin prayers in the school, framed for the peculiar use thereof, and to instruct the children of the two first forms in the elements of the Latin tongue, and also in the catechism and christian manners; for which there is a room, called the Vestibulum, being the anti-room to the school, where the youth are to be initiated into the grounds and principles of christian knowledge, as a good and proper introduction into other human learning.

We now leave St. Paul's church-yard and enter Ludgate-street, on the north side of which is Ave-mary-lane. This lane is well built, and principally inhabited by booksellers, printers, and other tradesmen. On the west side is an open square court, with good houses, called stationer's-rents: out of which is a passage into Amen-corner, and another that leads to

STATIONERS HALL.*

This is a spacious brick building; and though it hath not many ornaments, yet it is well designed and fitted for business. There is an ascent to it by a flight of steps, and the light is thrown in by two series of windows; the lower large and upright, and the upper of an elliptical form. Underneath it, and at the north end, are warehouses for the company's stock.

This fraternity (which includes printers, booksellers, stationers, or dealers in paper, &c. and book-binders) was incorporated by Philip and Mary in the year 1556. By which their majesties did give and grant to ninety-seven printers, booksellers, stationers, &c. freemen of the mystery or art of a stationer of the city of London, and suburbs thereof, that they may be one body of itself for ever, with one master, and two keepers or wardens, by the name of “The master; and keepers or wardens, and commonalty, of the mystery or art of a stationer of the city of London.” And that the same master, and keepers or wardens, and commonalty, and their successors, may from time to time make and ordain, and establish for the good and well ordering and governing of the freemen of the aforesaid art or mystery, and of the aforesaid society, ordinances, provisions, and laws, as often as they shall see proper and convenient; provided that these ordinances, provisions and laws, be in no wise repugnant or contrary to the laws and statutes of this our kingdom of England, or in prejudice to the common-weal of our said kingdom.

And that the same, and their successors for ever, are enabled, and may lawfully and faithfully, without molestation or disturbance of us, or the heirs or successors of our foresaid queen, or of any other person, hold, as often as they please, lawful and honest meetings of themselves, for the enacting such laws and ordinances, and transacting other business for the benefit of the same mystery or art, and of the same society, and for other lawful causes in the manner aforesaid.

And that the foresaid master, and keepers or wardens, and the commonalty of the said mystery or art of a stationer of the foresaid city, and their successors, or the greater part of them, being assembled lawfully and in a convenient place, may

* This hall was a great house, built of stone and timber, of old time, pertaining to John Duke of Britain, earl of Richmond, as appeareth by the records of Edward II. Since that, it was Pembroke's-inn, near unto Ludgate, as be-yearly

yearly for ever, or oftener or seldomer, at such times and places within the said city, as they shall think fit, chuse from amongst themselves, and make one master and two keepers or wardens of the same mystery or art of a stationer of the foresaid city, to rule, govern, and supervise the foresaid mystery and society, and all the men of the same, mystery and their business; and to remove and displace the former master and the former keepers or wardens out of those offices as they shall see best.

It then ordained, that no person within the kingdom of England, or dominions thereof, either by himself or by his journeymen, servants, or by any other person, shall practice or exercise the art or mystery of printing or stamping any book, or any thing to be sold or to be bargained for within this our kingdom of England, or the dominions thereof, unless the same person is or shall be one of the society of the foresaid mystery or art of a stationer of the city aforesaid at the time of his foresaid printing or stamping; or has for that purpose obtained our licence or the licence of the heirs and successors of our foresaid queen.

With power for the master and wardens to search, as often as they please, any place or shop, house, chamber, or building of any stamper, printer, binder or seller of any manner of books within the kingdom of England or dominions thereof, concerning or for any books or things printed, stamped, or to be printed or stamped, and to seize, take away, have, burn or convert to the proper use of the said society all and singular those books and those things, which are or shall be printed or stamped contrary to the form of any statute, act or proclamation, made or to be made. And to imprison such as shall disturb, refuse or hinder them.

In which charter there is no mention of a court of assistants, which was first constituted by that charter of the 36 Charles II. contrived to pave the way to arbitrary power, the court finding it more easy to bias the few in a court of assistants, than the many which compose the whole commonalty. But the additions made by that charter of 36 Charles II. to the charter of Philip and Mary, were afterwards repealed and declared null and void; and this, and all other companies, were restored to their original rights by an act of parliament in 2 William and Mary; of which the following is an abstract:

And be it enacted (by an act for reverting the judgment in a quo warranto against the city of London, and for restoring the city of London to its ancient rights and privileges) by the authority aforesaid, that all and every of the several companies and corporations of the said city, shall from henceforth stand and be incorporated by such name and names, and in such sort and manner, as they respectively were at the time of the said judgment given, and every of them are hereby restored, to all and every the lands, tenements, hereditaments, rights, titles, estates, liberties, powers, privileges, precedencies and immunities, which they lawfully had and enjoyed at the time of giving the said judgment; and that as well all surrenders, as charters, letters patents and grants, for new incorporating any of the said companies, or touching or concerning any of their liberties, privileges or franchises, made or granted by the said king James, or by the said king Charles II. since the giving of the said judgment, shall be void, and are hereby declared null and void, to all intents and purposes whatsoever.

2 W. and M. sess. 1. cap. 8. §. 14.

This, however, was made a livery company soon after its incorporation: a copy of which grant or constitution is here subjoined.

HENSELL, MAYOR.

Item. It was this day ordered and agreed, at the earnest suit and prayer of John Cawood, and divers other said persons, being freemen of this city in the fellowship of the Stationers, that the same fellowship from henceforth shall be permitted and suffered to have, use and wear, a livery and livery-hood, in such decent and comly-wise and order as the other companies and fellowships of this citie, after their degrees, do commonly use and wear; and that they the said Stationers shall cause all such, and as many of their said fellowship as conveniently may be able, to prepare and make ready the same liveries with speed, so that they may henceforth attend and wait upon the Lord-mayor of this citie at all common shews hereafter to be made by the cityzens of this cytie, in such and lyke manner and sorte as the other cityzens of the sayd cytie, for the honour of the same cytie, of long tyme past have done and yet dayley do, as occasion shall require.

JACKSON.

On the twenty-ninth of October 1603, king James I. did, by his letters patent, grant unto the company of Stationers the privilege of the sole printing of almanacks, primers, psalters, and psalms, in metre or prose, with musical notes, or without notes. And by his letters patent, dated the eighth of March 1615, his said majesty confirmed the said grant for the sole printing of primers, psalters, psalms, and almanacks in the English tongue; and did further grant to the company of Stationers the sole right to print the A. B. C. the little catechism, and the catechism in English and Latin by Alexander Nowell; for the help and relief of the master, keeper or wardens, and commonalty or freemen of the mystery or art of Stationers of the city of London, and their successors.

The company of Stationers is at this time governed by a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants; not chosen by the commonalty, but by and amongst themselves.

With respect to the produce of the sole printing of almanacks, &c. it is made a joint stock, with a capital of about 15000*l.* which is divided into twenty whole shares of 320*l.* each, possessed by those who are of the court of assistants; for which deposit they each receive 40*l.* per annum dividend:

dividend: then into forty half shares, at 160l. each; for which deposit they each receive 20l. per annum dividend: then into eighty quarter shares, at 80l. each; for which deposit they each receive 10l. per annum dividend: and then into 160 half quarter shares at 40l. each; for which deposit they receive 5l. per annum dividend; out of the profits arising from the printing stock engrafted upon the said grants by king James I. for the help and relief of the master, wardens, and commonalty; but these shares are all divided amongst those who have fined for, or served the office of master-warden.

When a married stockholder dies, the profits arising from his share devolve to his widow; which she enjoys during her widowhood, or life: but if she marry again, or die, another person is chosen to enjoy the profits of her share; who, at his election, pays the deposit money, not to the company, but to the late widow, her husband's or her executors. The master and wardens are always in the direction of the stock, to whom are joined six other members from the court of assistants annually; who adjust all accounts relating to it, and at Christmas report the state thereof to the board. There is a stock-keeper, which is a place of very considerable profit and great trust.

The Stationers have several very extensive estates in trust, out of which they pay, in pensions and other charities, upwards of 400l. per annum.

At the upper end of Amen-corner was originally situated the College of Physicians, destroyed by the fire of London in 1666; on the site of which stand three good houses, now the habitations of the residentiaries of St. Paul's.

Between Stationer's-alley and the new buildings at the north-east corner of the Old Bailey, is situated the parish church of #### St. MARTIN, LUDGATE.

This is a rectory of very great antiquity, and is said to have been founded by Cadwallo, the valiant king of the Britons, who reigned forty-eight years, and died the twentieth of November, in the year 677, and was buried in this church.

The patronage of this rectory was in the abbot and convent of Westminster, till the suppression of their monastery by Henry VIII. who erecting Westminster into a bishopric, conferred the same upon the new bishop. But that see being dissolved by Edward VI. queen Mary, in the year 1553, granted the advowson thereof to the bishop of London and his successors, in whom it still continues.

The old church was destroyed by the fire in 1666, and when rebuilt was enlarged with the site of the parsonage house; in consideration of which the parliament settled the value of the living at 160l. in lieu of tythes; 30l. of which is in lieu of the parsonage house.

The present edifice is tolerably well enlightened; the steeple consists of a plain tower and pretty lofty spire, raised upon a substantial arcade.

Here are four gift sermons in the year, and daily prayers at eleven in the morning and six in the evening. The vestry, in choosing parish-officers is general, but in making rates it is select; the officers are, two churchwardens and four side-men.

Adjoining to the south-west corner of this church formerly stood Ludgate; the origin and description of which the reader will find in page 15.

Directly opposite the church of St. Martin is a gateway that leads into the precinct of Black-friars, so named from the religious foundation of Friars-preachers, or Black-friars; in whose convent was held that which was called the Black Parliament. And in this house king Edward I. had his charters and records kept: at which time this precinct was crowded with the habitations of noblemen and gentlemen. In ancient times, during the existence of the priory of Black-friars, this was maintained as a liberty without the jurisdiction of the city of London. But, as soon as the priory was dissolved, and the records of that religious place lost or embezzled, the mayor pretended a title to their liberties: but king Henry VIII. being informed thereof, sent to him to desist from meddling with the liberties, saying, "He was as well able to keep the liberties as he friars were." Wherefore the mayor no further meddled, and Sir John Portynaire had the keys of the gates delivered to him, and a fee for keeping the same.

At this time there were four gates and a wall to enclose this liberty, and a porter to keep the said gates; within which artificers and tradesmen, though not free of the city, might exercise their arts and business without controul.

In queen Mary's reign the city applied to parliament to grant them jurisdiction over Black-friars precinct, but in vain. Nevertheless the ample privileges which the inhabitants of Black-friars did enjoy, have been for many years lost; so that now the sheriffs officers can arrest there; the shopkeepers are obliged to be free of the city; and two common-council-men are annually elected out of it, and added to the number that used to serve for this ward of Farringdon within.

Proceeding farther to the south, we come to a narrow street called Water-lane; on the west side of which are several passages that lead to Fleet-ditch. In this division is situated that laudable foundation called

SCOTS HALL.

This corporation was instituted for the relief of the poor and necessitous people of Scotland, that reside within the cities of London and Westminster. It owes its origin to James Kinnier, a Scotfman, and merchant of this city: who, on his recovery from a long and dangerous illness, resolved to give part of his estate towards the relief of his indigent countrymen; for which purpose having prevailed with a society of Scotfmen; who composed a box club, to join their stock, he obtained a charter, by which he and his co-adjutors were, in the year 1665, constituted a body politic and corporate, with several privileges, which king Charles II. confirmed the following year by letters patent, wherein are recited the privileges granted in the former charter, with the addition of several new ones, viz. That they might erect an hospital within the city or liberties of London and Westminster to be called, "the Scots hospital of king Charles II." to be governed by eight Scotsmen, who were to chuse from among themselves a master, who, together with these governors were declared to be a body politic and corporate, and to have a common seal. They were also empowered to elect thirty-three assistants, and to purchase in mortmain 400l. per annum over and above an annual sum mentioned in the first charter; the profits arising from these purchases to be employed in relieving poor old Scotsmen and women, and instructing and employing poor orphans, the descendants of Scotsmen within this city.

This humane foundation had like to have been crushed in its bud by two very dreadful events, the plague and the fire of London, which happened in the very years when the charters were granted. However, those who had the direction of the work began in the year 1670 to prosecute it with vigour; and found themselves not only in a condition to provide for their poor, but took a lease of a piece of ground in Black-friars, to build upon, for the term of a thousand years, at a ground rent of 40l. and by charitable contributions were enabled to erect their hall, with two houses at Fleet-ditch, and four in Black-friars, which were soon after finished at the expence of 4450l.

All matters belonging to this corporation are managed by the governors without fee or reward; for they not only, upon all such occasions, spend their own money, but contribute quarterly for the support of the society, and the relief of the poor; they provide for the sick; they grant pensions to the reduced and aged; they bury the dead, and give money to such as are disposed to return to Scotland. The sums disbursed by the society amount to about 600l. per annum.

The officers belonging to this corporation are, a treasurer, a register, two stewards and a beadle.

Black-friars school was founded by Peter Joy, esq; citizen of London, in the year 1716, who endowed the same with a perpetual fund of 160l. 17s. 3d. per annum, for the educating and cloathing of poor children; out of which the master receives a salary of forty, and the mistress of 30l. yearly, for instructing forty boys and thirty girls in reading, writing and accounts. This school Mr. Joy left in trust with the governors of Sion college.

On the east side of Water-lane stands

A P O T H E C A R I E S H A L L.

This is a beautiful edifice, and has a pair of gates leading into an open court, handsomely paved with broad stones; at the upper end of which you ascend by a grand flight of stairs into the hall room, built with brick and stone, and adorned with columns of the Tuscan order. The ceiling of the court room and of the hall are elegantly ornamented with fretwork; and the wall is wainscotted fourteen feet high, and adorned with the bust of doctor Gideon Delaun, apothecary to king James I. and with several pieces of good painting; amongst which is the portraiture of king James I. and of the gentleman who procured their charter, and had been obliged to leave France for religion, after he had suffered several trials and persecutions.

In this building are two large laboratories; one chemical and the other for galenical preparations; where great quantities of the best medicines are prepared, after the drugs have been exposed a considerable time for the inspection of such of the faculty of physic as chuse to view them, for the use of apothecaries and others; and particularly for the surgeons of the royal navy, who here furnish their chests, with all useful and necessary medicines.

This company was incorporated at first with the grocers in the year 1606; but such a connexion not answering the purposes of their incorporation, they were separated by another charter granted by king James I. in the year 1617, and incorporated by the name of "The master, wardens, and society of the art and mystery of apothecaries of the city of London:" at which time there were no more than one hundred and four apothecaries shops within the city and suburbs of London.

The members of this company, who by divers acts of parliament are exempt from ward and parish offices, are governed by a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants. It is a livery company, and the fifty eighth on the city list.

Farther to the south is printing-house-lane; which leads up to, and takes its name from, the King's printing-house; situate in a court at the east end thereof; where, by patent from the crown are to be printed the bible and common-prayer books, acts of parliament, proclamations; king's speeches, &c. It is a handsome brick building, and very commodiously adapted for the execution of business.

Before we leave Black-friars, and this ward, we must mention a memorable circumstance that happened after the fire of London. Some workmen digging in a place there, where the convent was, to clear it from the rubbish, by the appointment of Mr. William Bradford, in order to building, they came to an old wall in a cellar, of great thickness, where appeared a kind of cupboard; which being opened, there was found in it four pots or cases of fine pewter, very thick, with covers of the same, and rings fastened on the top, to take up, or put down at pleasure. The cases were flat before and round behind. And in them were repositied four human heads, unconsumed, reserved, as it appeared by art; with their teeth and hair, the flesh of a tawny colour, wrapped up in black silk, almost consumed. And a certain substance, of a blackish colour, crumbled into dust, lying at the bottom of the pots.

Who these were, there is no record as we hear of; but they appear to have been some zealous priests or friars, executed for treason; whereof there were many in the rebellion in Lincolnshire in the year 1538, or for denying the king's supremacy; and here privately deposited by these Black friars.

CHAPTER XVII.

OF FARRINGTON WARD Without.

THE ward of Farringdon without is the farthest in the west of this city, and was originally a part of the ward of Farringdon within, till divided by act of parliament, 17 Richard II. from which time this part has been distinguished by the addition of without, i. e. without the city walls.

It is bounded on the east by the ward of Farringdon within, the precinct of the late priory of St. Bartholomew near Smithfield, and the ward of Aldersgate; on the north by the Charterhouse, the parish of St. John's Clerkenwell, and part of St. Andrew's parish without the freedom; on the west by High-holbourn, and St. Clement's parish in the Strand; and on the south by the river Thames.

The extent of this ward may be gathered from the bounds without Newgate, and the spot where Ludgate stood: for on the east part thereof is the whole precinct of the late priory of St. Bartholomew, and a part of Long-lane, on the north, towards Aldersgate-street; and all Smithfield, to the bars in St. John's-street. Then out of Smithfield, Chicken-lane, towards Turnmill-street. Back again by the pens in Smithfield to Cow-lane, which turns towards Holbourn; and Hoffer-lane out of Smithfield; also toward Holbourn; till it meets with a part of Cow-lane. Cock-lane, out of Smithfield, over against Pie-corner. Giltspur-street, out of Smithfield to Newgate. Then from Newgate, west by St. Sepulchre's-church, to Turnagain-lane on Snow-hill. From the place where the conduit stood on Snow-hill to Holbourn-bridge up Holbourn-hill, to the bars on both sides.

At the bottom of Holbourn-hill, on the north side is Gold-lane, commonly called Field-lane, remarkable for shops that sell offal of beasts and baked sheep's heads. Farther from this is Hatton-garden-street, Leather-lane, and Brook-street.

From Newgate, on the south side, lieth the Old Bailey, which stretches down by the wall of the city to Ludgate-hill. On the west side of which street breaks out another lane, called St. George's-lane, till you come unto the south end of Seacoal-lane; and then turning towards Fleet-market, it is called Fleet-lane.

Out of the high-street from Newgate, turning down south, is the Little Old Bailey, which runs down to the east of St. George's-lane. Then is Seacoal-lane, which turns down into Fleet-lane. Near unto this Seacoal-lane, in the turning towards the conduit on Snow-hill is another lane, called in record Windagain-lane, for that it turned down to Turnmill-brook, and from thence back again; it being impassable. Beyond Holbourn-bridge is Shoe-lane, which runs out of Holbourn unto the place where the conduit stood in Fleet-street.

Next to Shoe-lane in Holbourn, on the same side is Bartlet's buildings, a kind of square, well built and inhabited; and Paul's-head-alley, which leads into Fetter-lane; this lane stretcheth south into Fleet-street, near the east end of St. Dunstan's church. Beyond which westward is Chancery-lane; and further on near the bar, is Shire-lane, so called because this lane divides the city liberties on this side from the shire or county. From whence to the bars are the bounds without Newgate, including the north side of Fleet-street.

This ward runs up from the site of Ludgate to Temple-bar, and hath on the north side the south end of the Old Bailey. Then it proceeds down Ludgate-hill to Fleet-street, and from thence to Temple-bar, leaving the market on the north. From Ludgate again, on the south, we have Bride-lane, which runs south by Bridewell; Dorset-street; Salisbury-court; and Water-lane, which runs down to the Thames; then White-friars and the Temple. So that Temple bar is the extent of this ward.

It is governed by an alderman, sixteen common-council-men (two of whom are the alderman's deputies) twenty three constables, forty-eight inquest-men, twenty-four scavengers, and four beadles.

We shall begin the survey of this ward nearly adjoining to that part where we finished the preceding, viz. Ludgate-hill. This is a handsome, spacious street, well built, and principally inhabited by silk-mercers of great eminence; between which and Fleet-street, on the north side, is situate

FLEET MARKET.

This market is erected on the very place where once ran the united streams of the river of Wells, the Oldbourne, and the river Fleet, and fell into the Thames. It is now arched over, upon which are built two rows of shops, with a handsome walk paved with rag stones between, almost the whole length; into which cover there is light conveyed by windows from the roof. In the center is a neat turret with a clock. At the south end the fruiterers have stands on each side, under a kind of piazzas, where are convenient places for depositing their stock. And at the north end is a large area for all sorts of vegetables.

On the east side of this market, and a little to the south of Fleet-lane, is situate the

FLEET PRISON.

This was a prison in the reign of Richard I. It is a general court for debtors, and such as are in contempt of the courts of Chancery and Common.

mon-Pleas. And any prisoner for debt may be removed by Habeas Corpus from any prison in England to the Fleet; and enjoy the rules, or liberty to walk abroad, and to keep a house within the liberties of this prison, provided he can give security to the warden for his forth coming.

The rules or liberties of the Fleet are, all the north side of Ludgate-hill, and the Old Bailey up to Fleet-lane; down that lane into the market, and then turning the corner on the left, all the east side along by the Fleet prison to the bottom of Ludgate-hill,

The prison itself is a large brick building of considerable length, with galleries in each story, which reach from one end of the house to the other; and on the sides of these galleries are rooms for the prisoners. All manner of provisions are brought into this prison every day, and cried as in the public streets. It has the benefit of an open yard, which is enclosed with a high wall.

It is properly the prison belonging to the court of Common-Pleas. The keeper is called Warden of the Fleet, and is a place of very great profit as well as trust; being allowed considerable fees from the prisoners for turning the key, for chamber rent, &c. and endowed with the rents of the shops in Westminster-hall.

Directly opposite the south end of the Fleet-market, is a large spacious opening that leads to the new bridge now building at Black-friars; which bridge is in such forwardness as to be opened for carriages the nineteenth of November 1769.

On the west side of this opening lies Bridewell precinct, in which stands the hospital called

BRIDEWELL.

This building is situated on the spot where once stood a royal palace, even before the conquest: and which continued, with some little intermission, in that royal state till the reign of king Edward VI. It was rebuilt by king Henry VIII. in the year 1522, for the reception of the emperor Charles V. who gave it the name of Bridewell; on account of a remarkable well thereunto adjoining, and its vicinity to St. Bride's church.

In the year 1553 king Edward VI. gave this royal palace to the mayor, commonalty and citizens of London, to be a working-house for the poor and idle persons of the city, and to be a house of correction, with seven hundred marks land, formerly of the possessions of the house of Savoy, and all the beddings and other furniture of the said house, towards the maintenance of Bridewell, and the hospital of St. Thomas in Southwark. But king Edward dying soon after this grant was made, prevented the city's entering upon the premises and taking possession, till it was confirmed two years after by queen Mary. After which Gerard the mayor entered and took possession thereof: and in order to forward so good a work, the following act of common-council was made the last day of February, in the second and third years of Philip and Mary:

"Forasmuch as king Edward VI. has given

"his house of Bridewell unto the city, partly for
"the setting of idle and lewd people to work,
"and partly for the lodging and harbouring of "the poor, sick, weak, and sore people of this "city, and of poor way-faring people, repair"ing to the same; and has for this last purpose
"given the bedding and furniture of the Savoy:
"therefore in consideration that very great
"charges will be required to the fitting of the "said house, and the buying of tools and bed"ding, they ordered the money to be gotten up
"amongst the rich people of the companies of
"London, &c."

In the following reigns, granaries and store-houses for coals were erected at the expence of the city within this hospital, and the poor were employed in grinding corn with hand mills; which were greatly improved in the reign of queen Elizabeth, when a citizen invented a mill, by which two men might grind as much corn in a day, as could be ground by ten men with the other mills, and being to be worked either by the hands or feet, if the poor were lame in the arms, they earned their living with their feet, and if they were lame in their legs, they earned their living with their arms.

The old building was entirely destroyed by the dreadful fire in 1666, together with all the dwelling-houses in the precinct of Bridewell, from whence had arisen two thirds of its revenue; the hospital, however, was rebuilt in 1668, in the manner it at present appears.

It consists of two courts; in which the buildings are convenient and not very irregular, designed not only for prisons and places of hard labour and punishment, but for indigent citizens; for arts-masters in several branches of trade, as flax-dressers, taylor, weavers of all sorts, shoemakers, pin-makers, &c. who together retain one hundred apprentices, clothed in blue doublets, and breeches, and white hats, who are entitled to the freedom of the city, and to 10l. each after they have served seven years.

This hospital is likewise used as a house of correction for all strumpets, night-walkers, pick-pockets, vagrants, and incorrigible and disobedient servants, who are committed by the Lord-mayor and aldermen; as are also apprentices by the chamberlain of the city, who are obliged to bear hemp, and, if the nature of their offence requires it, to undergo the correction of whipping.

Here is likewise a chapel, with a square roof, and two galleries at the north and west sides, supported by columns of the Tuscan order: at the west end are places for the hospital boys; and others for the prisoners. The walls are brick; and the wainscot and finishing very neat. The altar piece consists of two pilasters, with their entablature and circular pediment of the Corinthian order; between which are the commandments done in gold on black, and the Lord's prayer and creed in gold on blue in gilt frames, and farther enriched with gilt cherubims, leaves, fruits, &c. carved in relievo. The whole chancel is neatly paved with black and white marble.

To

To this chapel and precinct belong a preacher, chosen by the governors; a reader, chosen also by the governors, two chapel-wardens, one in the house, the other in the precinct; and one constable living within the house, who is generally the porter.

The court-room is adorned with columns of the Composite order, a gallery, &c. but the most valuable embellishments are the several handsome tables, wherein the names of the benefactors are depenciled in gold letters. In this room is a chair for the president, and convenient seats for the governors.

All the affairs of this hospital are managed by governors, who are above three hundred besides the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen, all of whom are likewise governors of Bethlehem-hospital; for these hospitals being one corporation, they have the same president, governors, clerk, physician, surgeon, and apothecary. This hospital, has, however, its own steward, a porter, a matron, and four beadles, one of whom has the task of correcting the criminals.

Opposite the east gate of this hospital lately stood a handsome stone bridge over Fleet-ditch, which communicated with Black-friars; but the bridge has been taken down, and the ditch arched over and made level with the street on each side, to improve the avenue to the new bridge that is building at Black-friars.

Proceeding up Fleet-street, on the south side, we come to Salisbury-court, (alias Dorset-court) so called from the house and gardens which were once the residence of the earls of Dorset. This Dorset or Salisbury-court claimed a peculiar liberty to itself, and to be exempt from the city government; and the inhabitants would not admit of the city officers to make any arrest. And at this time any person may open shop in this liberty, though he be not a freeman of the city of London.

On the east side of this court is a paved free-stone passage, which leads to the parish church of

ST. BRIDGET, alias ST. BRIDE.

Though the origin of this church is unknown, yet it appears not to be of a late date, by its having had three rectors before the year 1362. It was originally a very small church, till about the year 1480, when it was greatly enlarged by William Venor, warden of the Fleet prison, who caused a spacious fabric to be erected at the west end thereof consisting of a middle and two side isles; to which the old church served as a choir. There was a vicarage also here, ordained and endowed about the year 1529; and king Henry VIII. after the dissolution of the convent of Westminster, having given this rectory and parish church of St. Bride to the collegiate church of Westminster, founded by him, this church has continued a vicarage ever since. In 1610 the earl of Dorset gave a parcel of ground, on the west side of Fleet-ditch, for a new church-yard, which was consecrated the second of August that same year, by doctor George Abbot, bishop of London.

The old church being destroyed by the fire of London, the present edifice arose in its stead. It was designed by Sir Christopher Wren, and by him compleated within fourteen years, in such a masterly and elegant manner, as to exceed most of our parish churches in delicacy and beauty. It is one hundred and eleven feet long, eighty-seven broad, and the steeple two hundred and thirty-four feet high. It has a plain and regular body, the openings all answering one another: the roof is raised on pillars: and the altar-piece is very magnificent. The circular pediment over the lower part is supported by six Corinthian columns. The steeple is a spire of extreme delicate workmanship, raised upon a solid, yet light tower; and the several stages by which the spire gradually decreases are well designed, and executed with all the advantage of the orders.

The vicar, according to act of parliament, receives 120*l.* which is paid quarterly by the church-wardens. The tythe roll is about 270*l.* per annum, which the parish hold by lease from the dean and chapter of Westminster.

The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, two church-wardens, four overseers, four sidesmen, and three collectors.

Within the steeple of this church there hang one of the most melodious ring of bells in and about London.

Nearly opposite Salisbury-court is Shoe-lane, which is remarkable for the habitation of artists in several branches of Watches, clocks, toys, gilding, chafing, &c. and many eminent printers have their offices in the adjacent courts, &c.

More to the west is Water-lane, which divides White-friars from Salisbury-court. Though this lane is tolerably well built, yet it is very indifferently inhabited, by reason of its being greatly annoyed by the carts which are continually going to and from the lay-stall and wharfs at the bottom of it.

After the dissolution of the priory of White-friars, * the church and buildings, in process of time, became ruinous and were pulled down; afterwards converted into buildings, and now contain several courts, lanes and alleys; as Dog-well-court, Essex-court, Ashen-tree-court; Davis's-yard, which is converted into a glass-house for making flint glasses; Waterman's-lane, as leading to the river Thames, where there is a pair of stairs to take water at; all places of indifferant account.

In the year 1608, the inhabitants of White-friars obtained several liberties, privileges and exemptions by a charter granted them by king James I. which rendered the place an asylum for insolvent debtors, cheats and gamesters, who gave

* This place took its name from the White Friars, or Carmelites, who had their house next to Fleet-street, and their garden probably extended from thence to the water-side. They were clothed in white, and having made a vow of poverty, lived by begging. Their convent was founded by Sir Richard Gray, knt, ancestor to the lord Gray of Codner in Derbyshire, in the year 1241, and was afterwards rebuilt by Hugh Courtney, earl of Devonshire, about the year 1350. In the conventual church were interred many persons of distinction.

to this district the name of Alsatia; but the inconveniences the city suffered from this place of refuge, and the riotous proceedings carried on there, at length induced the legislature to interpose; and to deprive them of privileges so pernicious to the community.

The inhabitants of White Friars, or Carmelites, maintain their own poor, collect their taxes, have no church-wardens, but two collectors, and chuse their own officers.

More to the west, on the same side of Fleet-street, and nearly opposite the south end of Chancery-lane, is a handsome arched gateway which leads into

The T E M P L E.

This place is thus denominated from the edifice being founded by the Knights Templars in England, who had first a house in Holbourn, and afterwards settled here in the reign of Henry II. when it was dedicated to God and the Blessed Virgin in the year 1185, by Honourous patriarch of the church of the holy resurrection in Jerusalem.

The origin of these Knights Templars was as follows: several of the crusaders having settled at Jerusalem about the year 1118, formed themselves into an uniform militia, under the name of Templars, or knights of the Temple, a name they assumed from their being quartered near a church built on the spot where Solomon's temple had stood. These first guarded the roads, in order to render them safe for the pilgrims who came to visit the holy sepulchre; and some time after they had a rule appointed them by pope Honourous II. who ordered them to wear a white habit; after which they were farther distinguished by having crosses made of red cloth on their upper garments. In a short time many noblemen in all parts of Christendom, became brethren of this order, and built themselves temples in many cities and great towns in Europe, and particularly in England, where this was the principal.

These Templars were in so flourishing a situation in the thirteenth century, that they frequently entertained the nobility, the pope's nuncio, foreign ambassadors, and even the king himself; and many parliaments and great councils have been held in this place.

In the year 1308 all the Templars in England, as also in other parts of Christendom, were apprehended and committed to divers prisons; and three years after king Edward II. gave Aimer de la Valence, earl of Pembroke, this house of the Templars, with all their possessions within the city of London. At his death it reverted to the crown; and in 1324 was given to the knight's hospitallers of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, who had driven the Turks out of the isle of Rhodes, and had their chief houses where St. John's-square is now situated. These knights, soon after, let this edifice to the students of the common-law, in whose possession it has continued to this day.

The Temple which contained all that space of ground from the White-friars westward to Essex-house, is divided into two inns of court, viz. the Inner Temple, and the Middle Temple. These inns have separate halls, but both houses resort to the Temple church.

In the year 1684 was built the Middle Temple-gate, next Fleet street, which is a fine structure, in the stile of Inigo Jones. It has a graceful front of brick-work, with four large stone pilasters of the Ionic order, and a handsome pediment, with a round in the middle of it, having these words inscribed in large capitals: SURREXIT IMPENSIS SOCIETAT. MED. TEMPLI, MDCLXXXIV. and beneath, just over the arch, is the figure of a holy lamb.

Over the colonade at the end of Pump-court, is the following inscription in memory of a fire that happened there some years ago:

In the treasury chamber of the Middle Temple is preserved a great quantity of armour, which belonged to the Knights Templars, consisting of helmets, breast and back pieces, together with several pikes, a halberd, and two very beautiful shields, with iron spikes in their centers, of the length of six inches in diameter, and each of about twenty pounds weight. They are curiously engraved, and one of them richly inlaid with gold: the insides are lined with leather stuffed; and the edges adorned with silk fringe; and broad leathern belts are fixed to them, for the better convenience of their being slung on the shoulders.

In garden court, in the Middle Temple, is a library founded by the will of Robert Ashley, esq; in the year 1641, who bequeathed his own library for that purpose, and three hundred pounds to be laid out in a purchase, for the maintenance of a librarian, who must be a student of the society, and be elected into that office by the benchers.

This library is regularly kept open (except in the time of the long vacation) from ten in the morning till one in the afternoon, and from two in the afternoon till six in the summer, and four in winter.

The Inner Temple is situated to the east of Middle Temple-gate, and has a cloister, a large garden, and more spacious walks than the other. This society consists of benchers, barristers, and students; the former of whom, as governors at commons have their table at the upper end of the hall, and the barristers and students in the middle.

All the members of this society who have chambers, are obliged to be in commons a fortnight every term, for which they pay about ten shillings per week. Sixteen of these terms, with a regular course of study, qualifies a student for the bar.

The fees of the house, on the admission of a member, are three pounds, six shillings and eightpence, which, with other disbursements, amount to four pounds and two-pence.

The

The parliament, wherein the affairs of the society are treated is generally held twice every term.

The officers and servants of the house are, a treasurer, a sub-treasurer, a steward, a chief and three under butlers, an upper and under cook, a pannier-man, a gardener, and two porters.

The Middle Temple, which joins to the Inner Temple on the west, is thus denominated from its having been the middle or central part of the ancient temple or priory of Knights Templars. The chief officer of this house, like the other, is a treasurer, who is annually chosen from among the benchers, and whose office is to admit students; to assign them their chambers, and to receive and pay all the cash belonging to the society. The officers and governors of this inn, are in all respects like that of the Inner Temple, except the charge of admission, which is five pounds; and the time to qualify a student for the bar is twenty-eight terms instead of sixteen.

The most remarkable building in the Temple is the old church which belonged to the Knights Templars of Jerusalem, and was originally founded in the year 1185. The old structure was taken down in 1240, and another erected after the same model. The present edifice was one of those that escaped the fire of London in 1666; but in 1695 the south west part was new built, and in 1706 the whole was thoroughly repaired.

This beautiful gothic structure is built of stone, firmly put together, and enriched with ornaments. It consists of a long body with a turret, and a round tower at the west end, that has much the air of a piece of fortification. The length of the church from the altar to the screen is eighty-three feet, its breadth sixty feet, and the height of the roof thirty-four. The round tower is forty-eight feet high; its diameter at the floor fifty-one feet, and its circumference one hundred and sixty feet.

The windows which enlighten the body of the church are large and well proportioned. They are composed of three Gothic arches, a principal, and a lower on either side. These window stand so close that there are but very slender piers left between them to support a heavy roof; they are therefore strengthened with buttresses; but these buttresses, as in most other Gothic structures, exclude more light than the piers would have done, had they been larger, and the windows considerably less. The tower, which is very massy, has few windows, and those small, yet there are buttresses carried up between them; the top is crowned with plain square battlements, and from the center rises a spire.

The turret upon the body of the church is small and plain, and serves to receive a bell. In short, what can be seen of the outside has a venerable aspect, but the principal beauties are within.

On entering the round tower, you find it supported with six pillars, wainscotted with oak six feet high, and adorned all round, except the east part, which opens into the church, with an upper and lower range of small arches, and black apertures; but what is most remarkable in this part is, the tombs of eleven of the Knights

Templars who lie interred here; eight of which are covered with the figures of armed knights, five lying cross legged, as men vowed to the Holy Land against the infidels and unbelieving Jews; the other three strait-legged; the rest are coped stones, all of grey marble. The first of the cross-legged was William Marshall the elder, earl of Pembroke, who died in the year 1219. William Marshall, his son, earl of Pembroke, was the second; he died in 1231. And Gilbert Marshall, his brother, earl of Pembroke, slain in a tournament at Hertford, near Ware, twenty miles from London, who died in the year 1241.

This tower is divided from the body of the church by a very handsome screen in the modern taste; on passing which we find the church has three roofs supported by tall and slender pillars of Sussex marble. The windows are all adorned with small neat pillars of the same stone, and the floor paved with black and white marble. The isles are five in number, three, as usual, running east and west, and two cross isles. The walls are neatly wainscotted with oak above eight feet high, and the altar-piece which is of the same wood, is much higher, finely carved, and adorned with four pilasters and two columns of the Corinthian order: it is also ornamented with cherubims, a shield, festoons, fruit and leaves. The pulpit, which is placed near the east end of the middle isle is finely carved and veneered; the sounding board is pendant from the roof, and enriched with several carved arches, a crown, festoons, cherubims and vases.

The screen at the west end of the isles is like the altar piece, of wainscot, and adorned with ten pilasters of the Corinthian order, with three portals and pediments. The organ gallery is supported by two fluted Corinthian columns, and ornamented with an entablature and a compass pediment, with the king's arms well carved. Near the pediment, on the south side is an enrichment of cherubims and a carved figure of a Pegasus, the badge of the society of the Inner Temple; and in the pediment on the north side an enrichment of cherubims, and the figure of a Holy Lamb, the badge of the society of the Middle Temple: for though these two houses have one church, they seldom sit promiscuously there; but the gentlemen of the Inner Temple on the south, and those of the Middle Temple northward from the isle. In the church are the tombs of many judges, masters in chancery and eminent lawyers.

Since the reign of Henry VIII. there has been a divine belonging to this church named a master or custos, who is constituted by his majesty's letters patent, without institution or induction. Besides the master there is a reader, who reads divine service every day, at eight o'clock in the morning, and at four in the afternoon. Formerly they had a fixed lecturer for Sundays in the afternoon, who had eighty pounds a year from each house, convenient lodging, and his diet at the benchers table; but of late the lecture is carried on by various preaches appointed and paid by the treasurers of the two houses.

At the west extremity of Fleet-street, and the city liberty stands

TEMPLE

TEMPLE BAR.

This is a very handsome gate, where anciently were posts, rails, and a chain, as in other places where the city liberties terminated. Afterwards a house of timber was erected across the street, with a narrow gateway, and an entry through the south side of it. But since the fire of London the present structure was erected, and is the only gate at the extremity of the city liberties.

This gate is a very noble one, and has two posterns, one on each side, for the advantage of foot passengers. It is built entirely of Portland stone, of rustic work below, and of the Corinthian order. Over the gateway, on the east side, in two niches, are stone statues of queen Elizabeth and king James I. with the king's arms over the key-stone, and on the west side are the statues of king Charles I. and king Charles II. in Roman habits.

This is the gate, which of late years the state has appointed to be the place to fix, on its summit, the heads of such as have been executed for high treason.

Returning from Temple-bar, on the north side of Fleet-street, is Chancery-lane; on the east side of which are Serjeant's-inn, Simond's inn, the Rolls chapel, and the Curfitor's-office. And on the west side are, Lincoln's-inn, the Six Clerks office, the examiner's-office, the Masters in Chancery's-office, &c. But they are all out of the city liberty, except Serjeant's-inn; where judges and serjeants have their several chambers, not dwelling-houses, as in the other that goes by the same name in Fleet-street.

Farther to the east from Chancery-lane, and on the same side, stands.

CLIFFORD's-INN.

This is one of the inns of chancery, and has three courts and a garden adorned with rows of lime-trees set round grass-plots, and with gravel walks which are kept in good order. It was formerly lord Clifford's mansion; but now the habitation of gentlemen in the law, chiefly attorneys and officers belonging to the Marshal's-court.

Adjoining to this inn is situate the parish church of ST. DUNSTAN, in the West.

This church is so called from its dedication to Dunstan aforesaid, and the epithet of West, to distinguish it from another church of the same name, situated in the east. It is a very ancient foundation, in the gift of the abbot and convent of Westminster, who, in the year 1237, gave it to king Henry III. towards the maintenance of the foundation of the house called the Rolls, for the reception of converted Jews. It was afterwards converted to the abbot and convent of Alnwick, in Northumberland, in which patronage it continued till that religious house was suppressed by king Henry VIII. And Edward VI. granted the advowson of this church, under the name of a vicarage, to lord Dudley. Soon after which the rectory and vicarage were granted to Sir Richard Sackvill, whose descendants alienated the impropriation to George Rivers, 22 Jac. I. but they kept the vicarage in their presentation till the year 1631. The impropriation and vicarage are both at this time in the heirs of Mr. Taylor, late clerk of Bridewell. The impropriation is valued at 300l. per annum; and the vicar receives 240l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

This church escaped the fire of London in 1666, but has been repaired several times at a very great expence. It consists of a large body, and a small tower, every way disproportionate. And what renders this edifice still more disagreeable is, its being covered with a number of small shops or sheds, that not only add to its deformity, but makes it project into the street, so as to be an incumbrance in the public way. The clock projects to the south near the west end, and for the amusement of the gaping vulgar, two human figures are placed in a kind of Ionic loggia, and by means of clock-work, strike two bells hung over them, and declare the hour and quarter.

Here are several gift sermons, viz. on the thirtieth of January, twenty-ninth of May, Good-friday, &c. And a lecture every Sunday and Thursday in the afternoon, from the beginning of Michaelmas term to the end of trinity term, founded by Dr. White.

Here are two charity schools, one for fifty boys, four of whom are taught navigation: the other for forty girls, who are educated, cloathed, and put out to service.

The vestry is select; and the parish-officers are two churchwardens, two overseers, and two collectors.

A little farther to the east from this church, and near Fetter-lane, is Crane-court, at the upper end of which stands the seat of

THE ROYAL SOCIETY.

This society, which took its rise from a private body of learned and ingenious men, was founded for the improvement of natural knowledge. It was begun in the chambers of bishop Wilkins, then no more than a member of Wadham College, Oxon, about the year 1650; and in 1658 they hired an apartment in Gresham-college, and formed themselves into a body, under lord Brouncker, their first president. Their reputation was so well established at the time of the restoration, that king Charles II. incorporated them by a charter, in which his majesty was pleased to stile himself their founder, patron, and companion, which gave them the name of the Royal Society. By which charter the corporation was to consist of a president, a council of twenty-four, and as many fellows as should be found worthy of admission; with a treasurer, secretary, curators, &c.

No sooner was this Royal Society thus incorporated by king Charles II. than that prince made them a present of a fine silver mace gilt, to be carried before the president; and, as a farther mark of favour, their royal patron, by his letters patent of the eighth of April, 1667, gave them Chelsea-college with its appurtenances, and twenty-six acres of land surrounding the same. But afterwards wards the society neglecting to convert a part of it into a physic garden, as was intended, and the king being resolved to erect an hospital for old and maimed soldiers, thought no place more proper for such a design than this college; he therefore purchased it again of them for a considerable sum.

A little before the society received these letters patent from his majesty, the honourable Henry Howard, afterwards duke of Norfolk, made them a present of a very valuable library, which consists of 3287 printed books in most languages and faculties; chiefly the first editions soon after the invention of printing; and a valuable collection of manuscripts in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and Turkish, amounting to 554 volumes, which, together with the former, are thought to be of such value, as not to be paralleled.

Exclusive of this library, which takes up a large room, another curious and valuable collection was left the society in the year 1715, by their secretary Francis Aston, esq; which, together with the numerous benefactions of the works of the learned members, in all faculties, but more especially in natural and experimental philosophy, amount to above 3600, and are placed in glass cases in another room.

The museum belonging to the society was founded by Daniel Colwall, esq; in the year 1677, who gave his great and curious collection of natural and artificial rarities, which compose the greatest part of the catalogue, published anno, 1681, by doctor Grew, under the title of Museum Regalis Societatis. But these curiosities, by the generous benefaction of other curious persons, are now increased to above six times the number of those mentioned in the catalogue.

Upon the society's removal from Gresham-college to their house in Crane-court, in Fleet-street, Richard Waller, esq; one of the secretaries of the incorporation, at his own expence, in the year 1711, erected the repository in the garden for the reception of the said rarities, which are beautifully disposed therein for the entertainment of the curious. It abounds with a great variety of the following species of rarities, viz. human, quadrupedes, birds, fowls, palmipedes, eggs, nests, fishes, viviparous, oviparous, exanguinous, sealed and shelled, double and multiple, insects, reptiles, woods, stalks and roots, fruits of all sorts, mosses, mushrooms, plants, sponges, &c. animal and vegetable bodies petrified, corals and other marine productions, fossils, gems, stones irregular, metals, antimony, mercury and other metallic bodies, salts, sulphurs, oils and earths, philosophical and mathematical instruments, Indian, American, and other weapons, with a variety of apparel, &c.

This society, by the above-mentioned royal and other benefactions, the admission money, and annual contribution of its members, was in so flourishing a condition, that they applied to his majesty king George the first, for an additional privilege to purchase, in mortmain, 1000l. instead of 200l. per annum, which he was pleased to grant by his letters patent, in 1725. Among the fellows of this society was his late majesty king George II. and many of the greatest princes in Europe.

The officers chosen from among the members, are, the president, who calls and dissolves the meetings, proposes the subjects of consultation, puts questions, calls for experiments, and admits the members that are from time to time received into the society.

The treasurer, who receives and disburses all the money.

The two secretaries who read all letters and informations; reply to all addresses or letters from foreign parts, or at home; register all experiments and conclusions, and publish what is ordered by the society.

The curators, who have the charge of making experiments, receive the directions of the society, and at another meeting bring all to the test.

Every person to be elected a fellow of the Royal Society, must be propounded and recommended at a meeting of the society, by three or more members; who must then deliver to one of the secretaries a paper signed by themselves with their own name, specifying the name, addition, profession, occupation, and chief qualifications; the inventions, discoveries, works, writings, or other productions of the candidate for election: as also notifying the usual place of his abode, and recommending him on their own personal knowledge. A fair copy of which paper, with the date of the day when delivered, shall be fixed up in the common meeting-room of the society, at ten several ordinary meetings, before the said candidate shall be put to the ballot: but it shall be free for every one of his majesty's subjects, who is a peer, or the son of a peer, of Great Britain or Ireland, and for every one of his majesty's privy-council of either of the said kingdoms, and for every foreign prince or ambassador, to be propounded by any single person, and to be put to the ballot for election on the same day, there being present a competent number for making elections. And at every such ballot, unless two thirds at least of the members present give their bills in favour of the candidate, he cannot be elected a fellow of the Royal Society; nor can any candidate be balloted for, unless at least twenty-one members are present.

After a candidate has been elected, he may, at that, or the next meeting of the society, be introduced and solemnly admitted by the president, after having previously subscribed the obligation, whereby he promises, "that he will endeavour to promote the good of the Royal Society of London, for the improvement of natural knowledge."

When any one is admitted, he pays a fee of five guineas, and afterwards 13s. a quarter, as long as he continues a member, towards defraying the expences of the society; and for the payment thereof he gives a bond; but most of the members on their first admittance chuse to pay down twenty guineas, which discharges them from any future payments.

Any fellow may however free himself from these these obligations, by only writing to the president, that he desires to withdraw from the society.

When the president takes the chair, the rest of the fellows take their seats, and those who are not of the society withdraw: except any baron of England, Scotland, and Ireland, any person of a higher title, or any of his majesty's privy council of any of his three kingdoms, and any foreigner of eminent repute, may stay, with the allowance of the president, for that time; and upon leave obtained of the president and fellows present, or the major part of them, any other person may be permitted to stay for that time: but the name of every person thus permitted to stay, that of the person who moved for him, and the allowance, are to be entered in the journal book.

The business of the society in their ordinary meetings, is, to order, take account, consider and discourse of philosophical experiments and observations: to read, hear, and discourse upon letters, reports, and other papers containing philosophical matters; as also to view and discourse upon the rarities of nature and art, and to consider what may be deduced from them, and how far they may be improved for use, or discovery.

No experiment can be made at the charge of the society, but by order of the society or council. And in order to the propounding and making experiments for the society, the importance of such experiment is to be considered with respect to the discovery of any truth, or to the use and benefit of mankind.

The philosophical transactions are printed at the charge of the society, and the clerk delivers gratis one of the copies to every fellow of the society who shall demand it, either in person, or by letter under the hand of such fellow, within one year after the clerk has begun to deliver such copies.

The meetings of the Royal Society are on Thursdays, at five o'clock in the afternoon. The members of the council are elected out of the fellows, upon the feast of St. Andrew in the morning, when, after the election, they all dine together.

Eleven of the old council are elected for the ensuing year, and ten are elected out of the other members. Then the president, treasurer, and secretary are elected out of these. But the same persons are usually re-chosen into these offices.

In Chancery-lane is a place for keeping the records of chancery, called

The Rolls, or Chapel for the custody of Rolls or Records in Chancery.

This house was founded by king Henry III. in the place where stood a Jew's house forfeited to that prince in the year 1233. In this chapel all such Jews and infidels as were converted to the christian faith, were ordained, and in the buildings belonging to it were appointed a sufficient maintenance; by which means a great number of converts were baptized, instructed in the doctrines of christianity, and lived under a learned christian appointed to govern them: but in the year 1290, all the Jews being banished, the number of converts decreased, and in the year 1377, the house, with its chapel, was annexed by patent to the keeper of the Rolls of Chancery.

The chapel, which is of brick, pebbles and some free-stone, is sixty feet long, and thirty-three feet in breadth; the doors and windows are Gothic, and the roof covered with slate. In this chapel the rolls are kept in presses fixed to the sides, and ornamented with columns and pilasters of the Ionic and Composite orders. These rolls contain all the records, as charters, patents, &c. since the beginning of the reign of Richard III. those before that time being deposited in the Record Office in the Tower; and these being made up in rolls of parchment, gave occasion to the name.

At the north-west angle of this chapel is a bench where the master of the rolls hears causes in chancery. And attendance is given in this chapel from ten o'clock till twelve, for taking in and paying out money, according to order of court, and for giving an opportunity to those who come for that purpose to search the rolls.

The minister of the chapel is appointed by the master of the Rolls, and divine service is performed there on Sundays and holidays at about eleven and three.

On the walls are several old monuments, particularly at the east end is that of Dr. Young, master of the Rolls, who died in the year 1516. In a well-wrought stone coffin lies the effigy of Dr. Young in a scarlet gown; his hands lie across upon his breast, and a cap with corners covers his ears. On the wall just above him, Our Saviour is looking down upon him, his head and shoulders appearing out of the clouds, accompanied by two angels.

The office of the Rolls is under the government of the Master of the Rolls, whose house is by the chapel.

The place of Master of the Rolls is an office of great dignity, and is in the gift of the king, either for life or during pleasure. He is always the principal master in chancery, and has in his gift the office of the Six Clerks in Chancery, of the two Examiners of the same court, and of the Clerk of the Chapel of the Rolls, who acts immediately under him in that office. He has several revenues belonging to the office of the Rolls, and by act of parliament receives a salary of 1200l. per annum out of the hanaper.

Nearly opposite Crane court is

SERJEANTS INN.

This inn consists of a court surrounded with handsome new buildings, among which are the society's chapel and hall; and a very handsome edifice belonging to the Amicable society. The officers belonging to this Inn are, a steward, a master cook, and a chief butler.

On the east side of Fetter-lane is Nevil's-alley, in which is situate the episcopal church of the Moravians, properly called the Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren; an ancient German episcopal church, who claim their succession from John Hus and Jerome of Prague. They came into England about the year 1737, and have been instrumental instrumental in propagating the gospel in our plantations on the continent of North America, where their settlements are reported to be an example to all others for their industry, sobriety, and christian conduct both in faith and practice.

The north end of Fetter-lane leads into Holbourn, where, turning to the west, are the bars that in this quarter divide the city liberty from the country; and close within these bars, on the south side of Holbourn, is

STAPLES INN.

This is one of the inns of Chancery, and consists of two large courts, surrounded with very good buildings.

More to the east, on the north side of Holbourn, stands

FURNIVAL'S INN.

This is called from its founder Sir William Furnival, knr. and is likewise one of the inns of Chancery. It is a handsome old building, which you enter by a large gate; and behind there is a pleasant garden.

Proceeding still eastward, on the south side of Holbourn, we come to

BERNARD'S INN.

This is that inn of Chancery formerly called Markworth's inn. The society is governed by a principal and twelve ancients, who, with the other members, are obliged to be in commons a fortnight in two terms, and ten days in each of the other, on penalty of forfeiting five shillings per week.

Barnet's buildings is a very handsome spacious place, graced with good houses of brick, with gardens behind them, and is principally inhabited by gentlemen.

A little farther from this on the same side is

THAVIE'S INN.

This is likewise an inn of Chancery, and was founded by John Thavie, esq; who lived in the reign of Edward III. It is governed by a principal and eleven ancients, who, with the rest of the members, are to be ten days in commons in issuable terms, and a week in every other term.

Adjoining to this inn, and at the north west angle of Shoe-lane, is situate the parish church of

St. ANDREW, Holbourn.

This church, which is a rectory, was originally in the gift of the dean and canons of St. Paul's London, who transferred it to the abbot and convent of Barmouthsey; and they continued patrons thereof till their convent was dissolved by Henry VIII. His majesty granted this church to Thomas lord Wriothesley, afterwards earl of Southampton, from whom it descended by marriage to the late duke of Montague, in whose family the patronage now remains, and is said to be worth 600l. per annum.

The present edifice was finished in 1687, and is 105 feet in length, 63 in breadth, 43 in height, and a tower 110 feet high, erected in 1704. It has a considerable space before it, which is entered by an elegant pair of iron gates. It is a neat building with two series of windows, and a handsome balustrade round the top. The tower, which rises square, consists only of two stages, and round the top is a balustrade with a pinnacle at each corner; on the crown of each is placed a pine apple, from which rises the fanes; and the inside is extremely neat and well finished.

Nearly opposite this church stands

ELY HOUSE.

This is the ancient mansion-house for the city residence of the bishops of Ely. The buildings belonging to it are very antique, consisting of a large hall, several spacious rooms, and a good chapel. Here is also a fine capacious court-yard, and a considerable extent of garden ground; though it is at this time greatly run to decay. It was originally given to the bishops of Ely by William de Luda, bishop of that see in the reign of Edward I. by the name of the manor of Ouldborne, with the appurtenances; on the special condition that his next successor should bestow 1000 marks to provide maintenance for three chaplains, to serve in the chapel there. But this edifice is not the original building. Thomas Arundel, bishop of Ely, in the reign of Edward III. and Richard II. rebuilt it, with a large gateway and front towards the street.

At this time there was a very large piece of ground, the quantity of forty acres, or thereabouts, of orchard and pasture, inclosed with a wall, belonging to it, which falling to the crown at the death of bishop Cox, queen Elizabeth gave that inclosed land to lord chancellor Hatton and his heirs for ever. The chancellor built a large house upon the premises; which being removed, the ground was afterwards laid out into streets, and covered with very good and genteel buildings; among which that called Hatton-garden is reputed one of the handsomest in or about London. In this street is a mathematical school founded for charity children.

Leaving St. Andrew's church, and passing by the north end of Shoe-lane and the Fleet-market, we ascend Snow-hill, where, turning to the right, on the north side, is situate the parochial church of #### St. SEPULCHRE.

This church, which is so dedicated in commemoration of Our Saviour's sepulchre or grave at Jerusalem, is now a spacious building, but not so large as of old time, part of the site of it being let out upon a building lease, and for a garden plot. It is supposed to have been founded about the year 1100, at which time a particular devotion was paid to the Holy Sepulchre. And it was so decayed in the reign of Edward IV. as to require rebuilding. Roger, bishop of Salisbury, in the reign of Henry I. gave the patronage of this church to the prior and convent of St. Bartholomew tholomew in West Smithfield, who established a perpetual vicarage in this church, and held it till their dissolution, when it fell to the crown. King James I. in the seventh year of his reign granted the rectory and its appurtenances, and advowson of this vicarage, to Francis Philips, &c. after which the parishioners purchased the rectory and its appurtenances, and held them in fee-farm of the crown. And the advowson of the vicarage was purchased by the president and fellows of St. John Baptist College, Oxon, who continue patrons thereof.

The present structure was much damaged by the fire of London in 1666. The outward walls and the tower were capable of reparations; and the middle isle of the church was at the same time made with an arched roof, which was not so originally.

This church, in its present situation, measures 126 feet in length, exclusive of the broad passage at the west end; the breadth, exclusive of the north chapel, is 58 feet. The height of the roof in the middle isle is 35 feet; and the height of the steeple, to the top of the pinnacles, is 146 feet. The body of the church is enlightened with a row of very large Gothic windows, with buttresses between, over which runs a slight cornice; and on the top a plain and substantial battlement work, in the style of the public buildings in the reign of Edward IV. And the steeple is a plain square tower, crowned with four pinnacles.

The church-yard, which lies southward, and reaches quite up to the pavement of the street, was formerly inclosed with a high brick wall, without allowing any footway for passengers on the outside; but this wall was removed in the year 1760, and the church-yard laid entirely open.

There is another church-yard or burial ground belonging to this parish in Chick-lane, given by Sir William Selby for the use of the poor for ever. And in the same lane is a work-house for the poor of the parish.

In the year 1636 the impropriation of this church, held in fee-farm, was worth 440l. and the vicarage, endowed with a third part of the tythes, &c. was worth 179l. 14s. 6d. At present the vicar receives 200l. per annum, in lieu of tythes, as settled by act of parliament.

The donations to the poor of this parish for ever amount to 250l. besides which Mr. Cooper gave fifteen sacks of charcoal; and Sir Richard Reeves left to this parish 100l. per annum for ever.

The stock of money given to the poor by eight charitable persons amounts to 500l. and eight others gave 128l. 15s. per annum to provide coals and fuel for the poor.

They have also two almshouses for their poor; one founded on Snow-hill, a little eastward of Cock-lane, by Edmund Hammond, esq; in 1651, for six unmarried men, who endowed them with 7l. 10s. per annum each, to be paid by the company of Haberdashers. The other is on the south side of Goose-alley, near the middle, for eight poor people, who receive from 5s. to 15s. quarterly from the Armourers company.

There are seven gift sermons on set days, a parsonage-house, and some glebe and perquisites, which considerably increase the value of the living.

The sexton of this parish is the person, mentioned before, that gives an admonition to the condemned criminals in Newgate the night before their execution; which he repeats next morning, as they are carried by St. Sepulchre's church-yard; and the great bell tolls, by way of a passing bell, from six to ten o'clock in the morning on the day of execution.

The government of this parish is in a vestry, that consists of all who have passed the office of constable; and being divided into four precincts Within the liberty and one Without, that part Within the liberty has four churchwardens, five overseers, and four sidesmen; that Without the liberty has no more than one churchwarden, four overseers, and two sidesmen.

Opposite St. Sepulchre's church is Angel-court, in which stands

The Hand-in-Hand Fire-Office.

This office was erected in the year 1696 for insuring only houses. Every insurer signs a deed of settlement, by which he is not only insured, but insures all that have signed that deed, from losses in their houses by fire. So that every person thus insured, is admitted into joint partnership, and becomes an equal sharer in the profits and loss, in proportion to their respective insurances.

The conditions of insurance are 2s. per cent. premium, and 10s. deposit on brick houses, and double those sums on timber houses. No more than 2000l. to be insured in one policy.

The business of this office is managed by twenty-four directors, who are chosen by the persons insured, in rotation, and serve the office three years without any salary or reward. And this office keeps in its service thirty fire-men, who are protected from a press, and are annually clothed, and wear a silver badge, with two hands joined, and over them a crown.

Opposite the south front of St. Sepulchre's church-yard is an opening that leads into the Old Bailey; on the east side of which stands

JUSTICE-HALL, commonly called the SESSIONS-HOUSE.

This is a plain brick edifice that has but little to recommend it. A flight of plain steps lead up into the court-room, which has a gallery at each end for the accommodation of spectators. The prisoners are brought to this court from Newgate, by a passage backwards which leads to that prison; and there are two places where they are kept till called to their trials; one for the men, and the other for the women. There are also rooms for the grand and petty jury, and other accommodations.

A court is held here eight times a year by the king's commission of oyer and terminer, for the trial of prisoners for crimes committed within the city of London, and county of Middlesex. The judges are, the Lord-mayor, the aldermen past the chair, and the recorder, who, on such occasions, sions; are attended by both the sheriffs, and by one or more of the national judges. The offences in the city are tried by a jury of citizens, and those committed in the county by one formed of the house-keepers in the county.

The crimes tried in this court are high and petty treason, murder, felony, forgery, petty larceny, burglary, cheating, libelling, the using of false weights and measures, &c. the penalties incurred by which are, the loss of life, corporal punishment, transportation, amerciaments, &c.

Farther to the south, on the same side, is situate

SURGEONS HALL.

This building, which is extremely elegant, was erected by the surgeons, after their separation from the barbers. It has a basement story, with square windows. The principal floor is raised considerably above the level of the street, and there is an ascent to it by a double flight of steps; under which is a door, level with the ground, for the convenience of bringing in dead bodies, executed at Tyburn, for dissection. The face of this part is rustic work. At the height of the steps is a range of Ionic pilasters, within the height of which there are two series of windows, a row of large ones, with square ones above. The entablature of the Ionic pilasters supports a plain attic course, crowned with vases.

The surgeons, under their ancient incorporation, authorized ten of their body examiners of the surgeons of London during life. And it was ordained, that no person should practise surgery in and within seven miles of London, before they had been examined and licenced by the said company; and all thus licenced might practise surgery in any part of England. Which authorities and privileges, and several others, were confirmed to the company of surgeons by the act of parliament in 1745, which made them a separate body, and did incorporate them by the name of "the master, governors, and commonalty, of the art and science of surgery of London." And by the said act they were empowered to choose a principal, master or governor, two other governors or wardens, ten examiners of surgeons, and to have a court of twenty-one assistants.

Opposite the north end of the Old Bailey is Gilt-spur-street, which leads to Pye-corner. And further to the west is Cow-lane, a broad and good street for carts, &c. out of which comes Hosier-lane, that runs into Smithfield, alias West-Smithfield.

This place is so called from there being another of the same name in the eastern environs of London. It was anciently a much larger open field, and perhaps so called from one Smith, the owner thereof, or because it was level and smooth, which by corruption might be called Smith, instead of Smooth field.

This place was used in very early time for jousts and tournaments: as appears in the 48th of Edward III. when dame Alice Perrars or Pierce, the king's concubine, as lady of the Sun, rode from the Tower of London, through Cheap, accompanied by many lords and ladies; every lady leading a lord by his horse's bridle, till they came into West-Smithfield; and then began a great joust, which lasted for seven days.

Also in the 9th of Richard II. was the like great riding from the Tower to Westminster, and every lord led a lady's horse's bridle; and in the morning began the jousts in Smithfield, which lasted three days. Henry of Darby, the duke of Lancaster's son, the lord Beaumont, Sir Simon Burley, and Sir Paris Courtney, all behaved well.

In the year 1393, the 27th of Richard II. certain lords of Scotland came into England to get worship by force of arms. The earl of Mar challenged the earl of Nottingham to joust with him; and so they rode certain courses, but not the full challenge: for the earl of Mar was cast, both horse and man, and two of his ribs broken with the fall; so that he was conveyed out of Smithfield, and so towards Scotland, but died by the way at York.

Loose serving-men would commonly meet here, and make uproars and quarrels; insomuch that it was many years called Ruffians-hall, being the usual rendezvous of ruffians and quarrellers, during the time that swords and bucklers were used; when every serving-man carried a buckler at his back, which hung by the hilt or pommel of his sword hanging before him.

Between Hosier-lane and Cow-lane, in Smithfield, anciently was a large pool of water, called Smithfield-pond, or horse pool; from the watering of horses there; and to the south west of which, in Cow-lane, where St. John's-court is situate, stood the gallows, or public place of execution, denominated the elms, from the great quantity of such trees growing in that neighbourhood. But, the gallows being removed to the west end of the suburbs, this part of Smithfield was soon erected into streets, lanes, &c. among the first of which buildings was that spacious and lofty wooden edifice, denominated High-hall, formerly standing in the said St. John's-court. This ancient structure of wood and stone was the city residence of the prior of Sempringham in Lincolnshire, as is evident by the writings thereunto belonging, in the custody of Sir Harry Featherstone, wherein the said house is denominated Sepringham head-house.

In latter times, when the spirit of reformation in religion began to appear in this metropolis, Smithfield became the Aceldema, or field of blood. In the center of the space now inclosed with rails many were burnt for their steady adhering to the principles of the gospel, and opposing the doctrines peculiar to the church of Rome.

At the same time, and all the time of which we have any mention of Smithfield, it was, and has been, and now is, a market-place for cattle, hay, straw, and other necessary provisions; and once in the year at Bartholomew tide, for a general fair, commonly called Bartholomew-fair.

This privilege was granted to the prior of St. Bartholomew by king Henry II. for a fair to be kept yearly at Bartholomew-tide three successive days, viz. the eve, the day, and the morrow; to which the clothiers of England and drapers of London repaired, and had their booths and standings within the church-yard of this priory, closed in with walls and gate, locked every night, and watched, for the safety of men's goods and wares. A court of pye-powder was daily, during the fair, holden for debts and contracts.

The fair kept here, instead of three days, was at length prolonged to a fortnight; and became of little other use than for idle youth and loose people to resort to, and to spend their money in vanity; and (which was worse) in debaucheries, drunkenness, whoredom, and in seeing and hearing things not fit for christian eyes and ears; many of the houses and booths here serving only to allure men and women to such purposes of impiety. Therefore the magistracy, often intending, at last fully resolved, in the year 1708, to reduce the fair to that space of time only, according to which it was first granted, that is, to three days; and accordingly an order was made: and at a court of common-council in June, the said year, the order was confirmed; whereby the fair was to be kept for three days only, for selling of merchandizes, according to the original grants from the crown; which regulation, though it has been sometimes broke, the chief magistrate of late years has strictly observed.

Though Smithfield is a very handsome square, surrounded by many good buildings; yet the great number of cattle, horses, sheep, &c. which are brought to this market every Monday and Friday, and the want of proper care and regulation, has made the area a scene of filth and nastiness. But it must be allowed, to be the greatest market in Europe for black cattle, horses and sheep.

On the east side of this square is situate the magnificent building of

St. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL.

This hospital was erected for sick and maimed people; where great care is taken of them, and all necessaries for food, lodging, attendance, physic and medicaments, proper for their cure, administered; for they have good able physicians and surgeons provided, belonging to the hospital, who give their constant attendance, as occasion requires; and they have matrons and nurses to look to the patients, and to see that they have what is convenient, and what is prescribed for their health.

The ancient hospital, which escaped the fire of London, becoming ruinous, it was found absolutely necessary in the year 1729 to rebuild it. A plan for that purpose was formed, and a grand edifice erected, by subscription, which was designed to be only one out of four noble detached piles of building, to be afterwards raised, about a court or area 250 feet in length, and 60 in breadth.

The original design has been some time completed, and this hospital altogether forms a very elegant building, or rather buildings; for the sides which compose the quadrangle do not join at the angles, as is usual, but by four walls, each having a large gateway which admits you into the area. Here is a stair-case painted and given by the late Mr. Hogarth, containing two pictures, representing the good Samaritan and the pool of Bethesda, which, for truth of colouring and expression may vie with any thing of its kind in Europe. And the frontispiece of this hospital, towards Smithfield, is adorned with pilasters, entablature, and pediments, of the Ionic order, with the figure of king Henry VIII. standing in full proportion in a niche; and the figures of two cripples on the pediment.

To this hospital belongs an apothecary who provides and prepares what the physicians direct; and the diseased are duly visited by them in their wards, where they are lodged, every morning and evening, as there is need, each having a bed to himself; and, by the care of the matrons, the wards are always kept neat and clean.

From the time this hospital was first incorporated it began to flourish under the government of the Lord-mayor, four aldermen, and eight commoners; who had under them an hospitaller, renter-clerks, butler, porter, matrons, twelve sisters, and eight beadles; besides three surgeons in wages, and a minister.

Although the old hospital escaped the dreadful fire in 1666, yet, a great part of its revenues being in houses in London, suffered much thereby. Notwithstanding which, such hath been the care of the governors, the diligence and industry of the physicians and surgeons, and the supplies of several good benefactors, that there have been yearly received many maimed and sick seamen and soldiers, with other diseased persons, from divers parts of the kingdom, and many cured, and relieved with money and other necessaries, at their departure, besides their diet and lodging during their cure.

One of the piles of this building contains a large hall, for the resort of the governors at general courts; a compting-house for the meeting of the committees of governors, for the dispatch of the business of the hospital: several rooms for examining, admitting, prescribing for, and discharging the patients; and other necessary offices. The other piles contain wards for the reception of the patients and their nurses only.

Within the precinct of this hospital, at the north-west angle, stands the parochial church of

St. BARTHOLOMEW the Less.

This church was founded in 1102 by the original founder of the hospital for a chapel to it; but, at the dissolution of the priory of St. Bartholomew the Great, it was converted into a parish church for the inhabitants of the precinct of the said hospital.

This church is an old fabrick of 99 feet in length, 42 in breadth, 34 in height, and 74 in the height of the steeple. It is a vicarage in the patronage of the Lord mayor, aldermen, and citizens of London: and as this building escaped the great fire in 1666, it is very ancient. The value of this living is about 120*l.* per annum, arising from the Chamber of London, which pays the vicar 13*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* and from casualties, and the allowance paid by the hospital.

The

The vestry is general; and the parish officers are only two churchwardens.

At the north east corner of Duck-lane stands the remains of the ancient priory of St. Bartholomew, which is now a parochial church, and a rectory, known by the name of

ST. BARTHOLOMEW the Great.

This was originally a parish church, and stood next adjoining to the priory church: but when the priory church was pulled down to the choir, that part, by the king's order, was annexed for the enlargement of the said old parish church thereunto adjoining; in which manner it was used till queen Mary gave the remnant of the priory church to the Black-friars, who used it as their conventual church till the first year of queen Elizabeth, when the friars were turned out, and all the said church, with the whole parish church, was wholly, as it stood in the last year of Edward VI. given by parliament to remain for ever a parish church to the inhabitants within the close called great St. Bartholomew's; and so it remains and is the same structure as then existed; except the steeple, which was then timber, and was pulled down and rebuilt in 1628, of brick and stone.

This church is a spacious old edifice, of the Gothic and Tuscan orders, 132 feet long, 57 broad, 47 high, and 75 the height of the steeple. The patronage is in the earl of Holland; and is valued at no more than 60l. per annum. The vestry consists of the minister, churchwardens, such as have served churchwarden, and those who have fined for all offices and are chosen by the vestrymen. Here are two churchwardens, two collectors for the poor, and two sidersmen.

Within this liberty is the street called Cloth-fair, noted for woollen-drapers and mercers. And any person, though not a freeman of London, may keep a shop and exercise any trade or calling within this parish.

On the east side of Smithfield runs Long-lane which communicates with all the eastern parts through Cripplegate; but is very badly built, and indifferently inhabited by inferior sorts of tradesmen and publicans.

On the north side of Smithfield is the great opening called Smithfield-bars, because the city bars, that sever the city liberty from the county on that side, are set up there. And on the north west corner are the sheep-pens; from whence are the several streets and lanes that communicate with Holbourn, Snow-hill, and the Old-baily.

CHAPTER XVIII.

OF LANGBOURN WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from a rivulet or long bourn of sweet water, which anciently broke out of a spring near to the place where Magpye-alley adjoining to St. Catharine Coleman's church now stands, which ran down the street westward, and through Lombard-street as far as the west end of St. Mary Woolnoth's church, where turning south, and dividing itself into several shares, rills or streams, it gave name to Sharebourn-lane, called also Southbourne-lane, from its running south to the river Thames; and by its spreading near the spring head, the contiguous street became so swampy, moorish or fenny, especially about the church, which stood in the broad way between Mincing-lane and Rood-lane, that it was thence called Fenchurch-street. The ward also partook of the same name, and was enrolled in the city records by the appellation of Langbourne and Fenny about.

It is bounded on the east by Aldgate ward, and on the north by Aldgate and Lime-street wards; on the south by Tower-street, Billingsgate, Bridge, and Candlewick wards; and on the west by Wallbrook ward.

The east and west limits of this ward are taken at 100 feet from the west corner of the north side of Lombard-street to 35 feet of the west side of Gracechurch-street; and from that street to Smith's buildings on the north side of the east end. And at 125 feet from the west corner of the south side of Lombard-street, across Gracechurch-street, and up the south side of Fenchurch-street, as far as the north west end of Mark-lane.

This ward is divided into twelve precincts; and is governed by an alderman, ten common-council-men, one of whom is the alderman's deputy, seventeen inquest-men, nine scavengers, eleven constables and a beadle.

The two principal streets in this ward are Lombard-street and Fenchurch-street; besides which are the following lanes and alleys: St. Swithin's-lane, Abchurch-lane, St. Nicholas-lane, St. Clement's-lane; all which are on the south side of Lombard-street: and on the north side are Pope's-head-alley, Exchange-alley, Birchin-lane, and George-yard. On the south side of Fenchurch-street are Philpot-lane, Rood-lane, Mincing-lane, and Mark-lane; and on the north side, Lime-street, Cullum-street, and Smith's-buildings.

We shall begin the survey of this ward in Lombard-street, so called from the Lombards, or Italian bankers, who settled there. This street is throughout graced with good and lofty buildings, among which are many that surpass those in other other streets; and is generally inhabited by goldsmiths, bankers, and other eminent tradesmen. At the east end whereof, on the north side, near Graeshurch-street, is situate the parochial church of

ALLHALLOWS, Lombard-street.

This church, which is a rectory, is of very ancient foundation, the advowson whereof appears to have been anciently in lay hands; for Brihtmen, a citizen of London, with the approbation of Stigand the archbishop, and Godric the dean, gave the same, with an adjoining messuage, to the church of Canterbury about the year 1053. By virtue of which donation the right of patronage still remains in the dean and chapter of that metropolitan church.

The present building is neat, plain, and well-proportioned, and was erected on the ruins of that consumed by the dreadful fire in 1666. The body is enlightened by a single series of large windows, and the tower is terminated by a plain battlement.

The vestry is general; and the rector, besides glebe, donations, and casualties, receives 110*l.* per annum in lieu of tithes.

Leaving this church, and proceeding to the west, we pass through Ball-alley into George-yard, chiefly inhabited by warehousemen and office-keepers. And this leads us to the parochial church of #### St. EDMUND the King.

This church is so called from its dedication to St. Edmund king of the East Angles, who was barbarously murdered by the pagan Danes in the year 870, for his stedfast adherence to the christian religion. It was originally called St. Edmund Grafs-church, because of its vicinity to the Grafs-market, at that time held there.

The first edifice in this place, and of this name, was built under the Saxon heptarchy; but the last old church was destroyed in the fire of 1666, and the present structure finished in 1690. The length of it from north to south is 69 feet, and the breadth from east to west 39 feet. The altar is placed at the north end. It has a square tower, upon which a short spire rises, with its base fixed on a broad lanthorn.

This rectory, the patronage of which is in the archbishop of Canterbury, is united with that of the next parish, called St. Nicholas Acons, whose church, before the fire of London, stood on the west side of Nicholas-lane; and was a rectory in the gift of the abbot and convent of Malmesbury in the year 1084, dedicated to a Syrian saint, bishop of Myra.

These united livings were settled by parliament at 180*l.* per annum in lieu of tithes. The site of St. Nicholas church remains as a burial place for the parishioners; and adjoining, on the west side thereof, stands a well-built parsonage-house leased by the rector to the Society for Equitable Assurances on Lives and Survivorships.

The vestries of these parishes are general; and the parish officers in St. Edmund's are, two churchwardens, two collectors and two side-men; and those of St. Nicholas, two churchwardens and one collector.

The next opening on the north side of Lombard street, proceeding to the west, is Birchin-lane, principally inhabited by reputable tradesmen, office-keepers and bankers. On the east side of this lane stands a building called

The LONDON ASSURANCE OFFICE.

This office was erected for assuring houses and other buildings, household furniture, goods, wares, and merchandize, from loss or damage by fire: except glass and china ware, not in trade, and all manner of writings, books of accounts, notes, bills, bonds, tallies, ready money, jewels, plate, pictures, gunpowder, hay, straw, and corn unthrashed; and for assurance of lives.

This society was incorporated by letters patent, granted by king George I. for assuring ships and merchandize at sea; and for lending money upon bottomry; in consideration of which grant the corporation were to advance his majesty 300,000*l.* without interest, for the term of thirty years: towards the raising of which, and paying the just demands that might be made upon their respective policies, the company were empowered to raise a sum, not exceeding 1500,000*l.* to be called the stock of the corporation. And by a second charter granted to this corporation in the year 1721, they were empowered not only to insure ships, but houses, goods, and even lives.

This society is under the direction of a governor, sub-governor, deputy-governor and twenty-four directors.

For the timely assistance of such as are assured by this corporation, they have several engines and watermen, with proper instruments to extinguish fires, and porters for removing goods, all clothed in green, each having a badge, with the figure of Britannia holding a harp, and supported by the London arms, to distinguish them from servants belonging to other offices, and the badges are all numbered. The same figure is affixed on buildings, &c. assured by this corporation.

More to the west on the south side of Lombard-street, and at the corner of Sherborn or Sherbourn-lane stands the parish church of

St. MARY WOOLNETH.

This church is so called from its dedication to the above virgin, and its primitive situation near the wool staple, wool signifying neak, nigh or near. It is of some antiquity, as appears by John de Norton who was rector thereof in the year 1356. And from various circumstances it is reasonably supposed that here was originally a heathen Roman temple, perhaps the temple of Concord. For in digging the foundation of the present edifice in the year 1716 (which is one of the fifty new churches appointed by parliament to be erected within the bills of mortality) there were found a considerable number of skulls and bones of boars and goats; several pieces of metal, some tessellated work, part of an aqueduct, and a great variety of Roman earthen vessels. They also also found a well, full of dirt, which was no sooner removed, than a fine spring arose, in which is placed a pump, with an iron basin, and produces remarkable good water.

The advowson of this church was in the priores and convent of St. Helen's in Bishopsgate-street, till, at the dissolution, it fell to the crown; when king Henry VIII. granted it to Sir Martin Bowes, in whose family it has ever since continued.

The old church was not entirely destroyed by the fire of London: the steeple escaped the flames, and all the walls, except the north side, were repaired. But in length of time falling to decay, it was thought necessary to pull it down, and it was rebuilt in the year 1719, in a very handsome manner with stone.

The ornaments and beauties of this fine structure are so covered and shut from the sight, by the neighbouring houses, that the very tower can scarce be seen, except from the roofs of houses, and the opposite garret windows. On the east side are three very large and lofty niches, adorned with Ionic columns, and surrounded with bold rustic: over these is a large cornice, upon which is placed a balustrade. The entrance is at the west end, by a lofty rustic arch, over which rises an oblong tower, ornamented with six composite columns in the front, and two on the sides: upon this is raised a lesser tower of the same form, crowned with a balustrade; from the center of which rises a flag staff, with a fane. The windows are on the south side, where the edifice is entirely surrounded with houses.

This living was considerably improved by having the parish of St. Mary Woolchurch annexed to it; for the benefice was raised from 80l. to 160l. per annum, in lieu of tythes, besides 12l. per annum glebe and casualties.

The vestry is general in both parishes; and each has two churchwardens, two collectors for the poor and two sidersmen.

Adjoining to this church, and opposite the south end of Pope's-head-alley is situate

THE GENERAL POST-OFFICE.

Of what antiquity the post is in this kingdom cannot easily be determined. Anciently the management of the foreign mails was under the direction of a stranger, who by the permission of the government was chosen by the foreigners dwelling in the city, who even pretended to have a right by prescription of chusing their own post-master. However, in the year 1568 a difference arising between the Spaniards and Flemings in London, each chose their separate post-master; and this contest occasioned a representation from the citizens to the privy-council, to beseech her majesty queen Elizabeth, to fill that important post with one of her English subjects.

By the first accounts we find of the posts established for the convenience of this kingdom it appears to have been managed by several private officers who had their respective districts. But great inconveniences arising from their different methods of proceeding, they were suppressed, and a certain number of public offices erected in their stead; but these also not answering the end proposed, a general post office was erected by act of parliament on the 12th of king Charles II. in the year 1660, to be kept within the city of London, under the direction of a post-master appointed by the king.

By this act the general post-master was empowered to appoint post houses in the several parts of the country hitherto unprovided, both in post and bye-road: the postage of letters to and from all places therein mentioned was not only ascertained, but likewise the rates of post horses to be paid by all such as should ride post.

At length, upon the union of the kingdom of England and Scotland, another act of parliament passed in the year 1710, whereby the general post office was established not only for the united kingdom of Great Britain, but likewise for that of Ireland, and our plantations in north America and the West Indies.

The office of post-master is at present under the direction of two commissioners who have 2000l. per annum, and are assisted by a secretary at 200l. per annum, who has four clerks. Here are also a receiver general, a comptroller of the inland office, and his deputy; a solicitor, a resident-surveyor, two inspectors of the missent letters; six clerks of the roads, and an assistant to each. There is likewise a court-post, who has 40s. per diem, and a deliverer of letters to the house of commons, at 6s. 8d. per diem; a clerk of the bye nights, and his assistants; ten sorters, and seven supernumerary sorters; a window man and alphabet keeper; sixty seven letter carriers, and several other officers and servants. In the foreign office there is also a comptroller, an alphabet keeper, a secretary and six clerks.

The court in which this office stands is small, neat, and the building itself is large, handsome and commodious.

Proceeding to the east from the post office we come to Abchurch-lane, Nicholas-lane, Clement's-lane, Nag's-head-court, Plough-yard, and White-hart-court; all of which are well built, and inhabited by people in the mercantile way, and that have the business at the 'Change. White-hart-court is remarkable for considerable dealers, who are most of them quakers; and here they have their principal meeting house.

Fenchurch-street is large and open, well built, and inhabited by merchants and others. In the middle of the street, before the fire of London, stood the small church of St. Gabriel Fenchurch, corruptly Fenchurch, not rebuilt, but the parish united to St. Margaret Pattens.

Here is an entry called Fenchurch-alley, at the upper end of which is the church-yard. And at the south west corner of this street is the church of St. Bennet Grace-church, but not in this ward.

On the north side of Fenchurch-street is Lime-street, about the middle of which, on the west side, stands

P E W T E R E R S H A L L .

The fraternity of pewterers was incorporated by letters patent of the thirteenth of Edward IV. in the year 1474. by the title of "The master, wardens, and commonalty of the art or mystery of Pewterers of the city of London." And in the year 1534 the wardens of this company or their deputies, were empowered by act of parliament to have the inspection of pewter in all parts of the kingdom, in order to prevent the sale of the base pewter, and the importation of pewter vessels from abroad. And as a farther encouragement to this company, all Englishmen are by the said act strictly enjoined not to repair to any foreign country to teach the art or mystery of Pewterers, on pain of disfranchisement. And for the more effectual preventing the art from being carried abroad, no pewterer shall take as an apprentice the son of an alien.

This corporation is governed by a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants; and is the sixteenth in the city list of companies.

At the south west corner of Lime-street stands the parish church of #### St. D I O N I S Backchurch.

This church is a rectory, dedicated to St. Dennis, or Dionysius, the Athenian anacopagite, or judge, and now the patron of France. It receives the additional epithet of Backchurch from its situation backwards, or behind a row of houses, to distinguish it from St. Gabriel's church, which formerly stood in the middle of Fenchurch-street.

The

The patronage of this church was anciently in the gift of the abbot and convent of Canterbury, but is now in the dean and chapter of that church. The old edifice was burnt down in 1666, and the present fabrick of stone was erected in its stead. Since which time the rector, by act of parliament, has received 120*l.* per annum in lieu of tythes.

The vestry is general; and the parish-officers are, two churchwardens, two sidersmen, and two collectors for the poor.

On the same side of Fenchurch-street, and near the north extremity of this ward, is a very fine brick building, adorned with pilasters, architraves, &c. and is the hall wherein the business is transacted belonging to

THE HUDSON'S-BAY COMPANY.

This company was incorporated by king Charles II. in the year 1670, by the name and title of "The governor and company of the adventures of England trading into Hudson's Bay." And the said charter granted them, and their successors forever, all the streights, bays, seas, rivers, lakes, creeks, islands, shores, lands, territories, and places whatsoever, within Hudson's-streights and Hudson's-bay.

This corporation carry on a considerable trade to the above places by a joint stock, and have settled several small factories, to which the natives repair with their furs, skins, and other commodities of the country, which they exchange for those of England. The company is under the direction of a governor, deputy-governor, and seven assistants.

On the south side of Fenchurch-street is Mark-lane, on the west side whereof, near the north end, stands the parochial church of

ALLHALLOWS STAINING.

This church is a very ancient foundation, dedicated to All-saints, and is said to have obtained the name of Staining, from the corruption of the word stone, because built at first of stone, when the other churches dedicated to all the saints were of wood. It was anciently a rectory in the patronage of the de Walthams and others, till it was annexed to the abbey of Graces, near the Tower of London. With which abbey this church fell to the crown, and was sold to George Bingley and others, who, on October 7, 4 Jac. I. had a grant of this rectory and parish church to be held of the crown in soccage: from which time it became a lay-impropriation, and in the patronage of the Grocers company, in whom it still continues. And though it is no more than a donative or curacy, under this impropriation, it is a rectory in its nature, the tythes (which are 100*l.* per annum) being paid, according to act of parliament, to the incumbent.

This church escaped the fire in 1666; but it was so old, that the body of it fell down suddenly a few years after, and was rebuilt by the parishioners. The body is well illuminated with Gothic windows, and the square tower is crowned with a small turret.

The vestry is select; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, two sidersmen, and two collectors for the poor.

CHAPTER XIX.

OF LIME-STREET WARD.

THIS ward is very small, and takes its name from the above street, which in ancient times was the place where lime was either made or sold in public market.

The body of this ward is from the north end of Lime-street, to the west side of Leadenhall-street, on the south side: and from the south-west corner of St. Mary-ax-street to another corner facing Leadenhall. From the north corner of Lime-street to the middle thereof is in Aldgate ward; and the south end, on both sides is in Langbourn-ward.

This ward is bounded on the west by Bishopsgate ward; on the east and north by Aldgate ward; and on the south by Langbourn ward. It is divided into four precincts; and is under the government of an alderman, four common-council-men, one of whom is the alderman's deputy, four constables, thirteen inquest-men, four scavengers and a beadle.

It is very observable, that though this ward runs through several parishes, yet there is no church, nor whole street throughout it. And the only things worthy remark are two; the first of which is

LEADENHALL MARKET.

This is the largest and most general market for all kinds of provision within the city of London, or perhaps in Europe. Besides the principal entrance out of Leadenhall-street, there are several others, three out of Lime-street, and the rest out of Gracechurch-street. The market consists of three courts or yards; the first of which is that at the north-east corner of Gracechurch-street and opens into Leadenhall-street.

This court or yard contains in length from north to south one hundred and sixty-four feet, and in breadth from east to west eighty feet. Within this court or yard, and round about the same, are about an hundred standing stalls for butchers, for the selling of beef, and therefore this court is called the Beef-market; many of which which stalls are eight, ten, or twelve feet long, and four, five, or six feet broad, with racks, hooks, blocks, and all other conveniences for the sale of their meat; all which stalls are either under warehouses above head, or sheltered from the weather by roofs over them. This yard is on Tuesdays a market for leather, to which the tanners do resort. On Thursdays the waggons from Colchester and other parts come with baize, &c. and also the felmongers with their wool; and on Fridays it is a market for raw hides, besides Saturdays for beef, as also other provisions.

The second market-yard is called the Green-yard, as being once a green plot of ground; afterwards it was the city's store-yard for materials for building and the like, but now a market only for veal, mutton, lamb, &c. This yard is an hundred and seventy feet in length from east to west, and ninety feet broad from north to south. It hath in it an hundred and forty stalls for the butchers, all covered over, and of the bigness of those in the Beef-market. In the middle of this Green-yard market, north to south, is a row of shops, with kitchens or rooms over them for Fishmongers; and also on the south side and west end are houses and shops for fishmongers. Towards the east end of this yard is erected a fair market-house, standing upon columns, with vaults underneath and rooms above, with a bell-tower, and a clock, and under it are butchers stalls. The tenements round about this yard are for the most part inhabited by cooks, victuallers, and such like; and in the passages leading out of the streets into this market are fishmongers, poulterers, cheesemongers, and such like traders for provision.

The third market belonging to Leadenhall is called the Herb-market, for that herbs, roots, fruit, &c. are only there sold. This market is about one hundred and forty-feet square. The west, east, and north sides have walks round them, covered over, for shelter, and standing upon columns; in which walks there are twenty-eight stalls for gardeners, with cellars under them.

Being rebuilt in the year 1730, it is now called New Market, or Nashe's Rents, and hath shops in it chiefly for butchers, and a new passage into Lime-street. There is also in this yard one range of Stalls, covered over, for such as sell tripe, neats feet, sheeps trotters, &c. And, on the south side, the tenements are taken up by victuallers, poulterers, cheesemongers, butchers, and such like. Beyond this are likewise some shops, built in the year 1730, in that part called the Old Bacon-market, which are chiefly occupied by poulterers, and such as deal in bacon.

Lime street is a place well inhabited by merchants and others of repute. About the middle of the street is a place called Queen's-square, or Queen's square-passag, as leading into Leadenhall-market, a well-built place, with a free stone pavement, On this spot formerly stood a large house, the habitation of a merchant, and anciently supposed to belong to the kings and queens.

St. Mary-ax goes out of Leadenhall-street, and runs northwards to Camomile-street by London-wall. It is a street graced with good buildings, and much inhabited by eminent merchants.

Leadenhall-street is large, populous and well inhabited; but the houses escaping the great fire, in 1666, are not so elegant and uniform as those of a more modern building. At the south side of this street, at about 100 feet west of Lime-street corner, is situate

The EAST-INDIA HOUSE.

This building was anciently the site of a city mansion belonging to the earl of Craven, and his ancestors. The front next the street is very magnificent, being a strong stone building, with pilasters and entablature of the Doric order; the rest of it is very spacious, having large rooms for the directors, and offices for the clerks. It hath a large hall and court yard, for the reception of people who have business here, to attend on the company on their court days, which are every Wednesday and Friday. To this building belongs likewise a garden, with warehouses on the back part towards Lime-street, into which there is a back gate for the entrance of carts to bring in their goods. These warehouses were rebuilt in the year 1725, and have been greatly enlarged.

The first East India company was established by charter in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and since confirmed several times, under the title of "The governor and merchants trading into the East-Indies."

In 1698 another company was established by act of parliament, and called, "The English company of merchants trading to the East Indies," who, upon their settlement, advanced two millions of money to the government, for which they received eight per cent. interest.

On the twenty-second of July, in the year 1702, for the mutual advantage and satisfaction of both companies, an expedient was found out for the uniting of them, and a charter was granted for that purpose. And by order of a court of Lord-mayor and aldermen, held the twenty-fourth of April, in 4 Edward VI. the chamberlain of London was yearly to pay unto the scavenger of Lime-street ward 20s. by even portions, out of the profits arising from the butchers stalls in Leadenhall market, to keep the said ward clean.

Besides the warehouses belonging to this building, the company have likewise others in Seething-lane, Fenchurch-street, Leadenhall-street, the Steel-yard, Billiter-lane, the Royal Exchange, under the last of which they have cellars entirely for pepper, and some now building near White-chapel.

CHAPTER XX.

OF PORTSOKEN WARD.

THE word Portsoken signifieth the franchise or liberty at the gate. It was sometime a guild, and had its beginning in the reign of king Edgar, between seven and eight hundred years ago, when thirteen knights, well-beloved of the king and realm, for services by them done, requested to have a certain portion of land on the east part of the city, left desolate and forsaken by the inhabitants, by reason of too much servitude. They besought the king to have this land, with the liberty of a guild, for ever. The king granted their request on the following conditions, to wit, that each of them should victoriously accomplish three combats, one above the ground, one under ground, and the third in the water: and after this, at a certain day, in East Smithfield, they should run with spears against all comers; all which was gloriously performed; and the same day the king named it Knighten Guild, and so bounded it from Aldgate, to the place where the bars now are, toward the east, on both sides of the street, and extended it towards the north, and the gate, now since called Bishopsgate, unto the house then of William Presbyter, after of Jeffry Tanner, and then of the heirs of Colver; after that of John Eafeby; but since of the lord Bouchier, &c. And again towards the south, unto the river Thames, and so far into the water, as a horseman entering the same, might ride at low water, and throw his spear: so that all East Smithfield, with the right part of the street that goeth to Dodding Pond into the Thames, and also the hospital of St. Catharine, with the mills that were founded in king Stephen's days, and the outward stone wall, and the new ditch of the Tower, are of the said fee and liberty: for the said wall and ditch were made in the time of king Richard I. when he was in the Holy Land, by William Longchamp, bishop of Ely.

In the year 1115, certain burgesses of London, of the progeny of those English knights, coming together into the chapter-house of the church of the Holy Trinity, gave to the same, and canons serving God therein, all the lands and soke, called in English, Knighten Guild, which lieth to the wall of the city without the same gate, and stretcheth to the river Thames; they gave it (taking upon them the brotherhood and participation of the benefits of that house) by the hands of prior Norman.

This ward is situate entirely without Aldgate, and contains all Whitechapel as far as the bars, Petticoat-lane, Houndsditch, and the Minories.

It is bounded on the east by the parishes of Spitalfields, Stepney, and St. George's in the East; on the south by Tower-hill; on the west by Aldgate ward; and on the north by Bishopsgate ward.

It is divided into five precincts, and is governed by an alderman and five common-council-men, including the alderman's deputy; twenty-two inquest-men, five scavengers, five constables, and a beadle.

In surveying this ward we shall begin at Whitechapel high-street, which for its dimensions is to be numbered among the best in London. There is, on the south side, the greatest market for carcases of beef, mutton, veal and lamb, in the world. And in the part beyond the bars is a great market for hay and straw three times a week. The remainder of this street is principally taken up with large inns, for the entertainment of travellers, and the reception of coaches, waggons, &c. this being the great thoroughfare to the Essex road, from whence the country people supply this market.

Houndsditch runs out of the high-street northward unto Bishopsgate church; and takes its name from its ancient state, a ditch, into which dead dogs, carrion, and all manner of filth used to be thrown. On the east side of this street, fronting the Minories, is situate the parish church of

ST. BOTOLPH, Aldgate.

This church is of very ancient foundation; the advowson of which was originally in the proprietors of the ward of Portsoken, who, in the year 1115, gave it, together with the whole ward, to the prior and canons of Holy Trinity. Which grant was not only soon after confirmed by Henry I. but likewise by the pope and bishop of London. But no sooner was it appropriated to the trinity convent, than the canons, instead of appointing a curate, resolved to serve the cure alternately themselves; which they regularly performed till the dissolution of their monastery, when the same coming to the crown, queen Elizabeth, in the year 1577, granted this church and curacy to Robert Halywell, for a certain term of years; and in the year 1588, to George Puttenham, for another term of years; since which time the impropriation has been held in fee of the crown.

The old church escaped the fire in 1666, and stood till the year 1741, when it was taken down, and the present edifice finished in 1744. It is built with brick, and is a plain massy, and yet elegant structure. It consists of a body of a regular shape, and a lofty and well proportioned steeple, formed of a tower, and spire. But its greatest ornament is the bold rustic at the corners.

This church is a donative or curacy; the produce of which is accounted to be worth 700l. per annum in tythes only.

The vestry is neither select nor general, all being admitted who have either served or fined for offices. And the parish officers are two churchwardens, and five overseers of the poor, for that part of the parish within the freedom; and two churchwardens and four overseers for that part out of the freedom.

Here are two charity schools; one in the freedom, founded by Sir John Cals, alderman for fifty boys and forty girls. The other in East Smithfield for forty boys and thirty girls; founded by Sir Samuel Stirling, knight and alderman of the city of London; who, by his last will and testament, bearing date the seventh day of August, A. D. 1673, gave certain copyhold lands and tenements, lying in East Smithfield, in the parish of St. Mary Whitechapel, belonging to the manor of Stepney, in the county of Middlesex, the rents amounting to the value of 22l. yearly, as a foundation of a charity-school, for the better education of the poor youths of the parish of St. Botolph's without Aldgate; which lands and tenements he surrendered for the use of his will to Mr. Corfellis, brewer; Mr. John Parsons, brewer; and Thomas Heath, Scrivener; trustees of the said charity. The school master to be a bachelor of arts of the university of Cambridge, and to teach school in a brick house, which he, the said Sir Samuel Sterling, built at his own charge at the east end of the town house, or quest-house, upon Little Tower-hill, in the manor of East Smithfield. The school-master to be chosen by the inquest of the ward of Portsoken, and the leet-jury of the manor of East Smithfield.

Leaving Houndsditch we pass eastward through Gravel-lane into Petticoat-lane, formerly called Hog-lane. The alleys and courts that branch out of these lanes, and Houndsditch, are in general very narrow, meanly built, and occupied by Jews and inferior artificers.

Petticoat lane runs from Whitechapel bars northward as far as the ground called St. Mary Spital. On both sides this lane in ancient times, were hedge rows and elm trees, with pleasant fields to walk in; and at that time the habitation of great men. Among whom, so lately as in the reign of king James I. we find Gondomar, the Spanish ambassador. In this lane is a French chapel; and at the Boar's-head is kept a baptist meeting.

Opposite the front of the parish church of St. Botolph is a spacious, broad and long street, called the Minories, which is inhabited by considerable tradesmen in most branches, but particularly gunsmiths. The west side of this street is almost entirely rebuilt, and several new streets opened cross Vine-street, which lead into Crutched-friars, and on the east side is an arch or gate-way into a district called Little Minories. In this district is situate the parish church of

TRINITY in the Minories.

This church stands on the spot where was anciently an abbey of nuns of the order of St. Clare, called the Minoreffes, founded by Edmund earl of Lancaster, brother to king Edward I. in the year 1293; but being suppressed in the year 1539, a number of houses were erected in its stead, and a small church was built for the inhabitants, and dedicated to the Trinity, whence it received its present appellation; and the additional epithet of Minories was added from the above monastery.

The present church is a small brick edifice, with a low tower crowned with a turret.

The patronage of this church has been all along in the crown; but the income of the curate is said to be so small, as to amount to no more than 25l. per annum, besides surplus fees.

The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, and one overseer of the poor.

From the little Minories is a narrow foot-way into Heydon-yard, on the east side of which is a narrow entry into Mansel-street, Goodman's-fields, so called from one Goodman, the land holder of that ground, were, about eighty years ago laid into four principal streets, viz. Mansel-street on the west, Ailoff-street on the north, Lemon-street on the east, and Prescot-street on the south, with a square piece of land in the middle, used as a tennis ground. The buildings in these fields are in general very good, commodious, and high brick houses.

Near the south west angle of Ailoff-street is a Presbyterian meeting-house. And in Prescot-street is a plain neat building, instituted in the year 1758 for the reception of penitent prostitutes, and founded by the name of

The MAGDALEN-HOUSE.

The objects of this foundation are women, who, having been seduced and plunged into ruin by temptations, to which their youth, and personal advantages had exposed them, repent of their lewd way of life. The support of it is by voluntary subscriptions; and it is governed by a president, four vice-presidents, a treasurer, and committee of twenty one; five of whom constitute a quorum. The number of governors are not limited; but the subscriber of five guineas is governor only for a year, whereas they who subscribe twenty guineas are governors for life. Ladies that subscribe are permitted to vote at all elections, &c. by proxy. There is a chaplain who is to reside in the house, to read prayers, to preach on Sunday mornings, to attend the sick, and instruct the family in the principles and duties of the Protestant religion as by law established. There is likewise another preacher who officiates on Sunday evenings; on which occasion there is always a collection for the penitents.

To this charity belong two physicians, two surgeons, and three apothecaries, who are required to behave with the utmost humanity and prudence. One of each is to attend the committee, and make weekly reports. They are all to attend in their own persons, and no pupil, apprentice, or servant, shall at any time be admitted into the wards; and even when the physicians, surgeons, and apothecaries visit the wards, they shall be attended by the matron.

St. Mary Abchurch, Abchurch Lane.

St. Clements, Eastcheap.

The matron is to direct the œconomy of the house, and constantly to reside in it. She is to see that all the women are neat and decent in their cloaths and persons, and properly employed; that they discharge their duty, and constantly attend divine service: she is to receive from the steward the materials for their work, and deliver it back to him. She is to take care of the household linen, and what belongs to the cloathing; to require from the steward such provisions as are necessary for the house, and to see that they are not given away or wasted. She is to keep the keys of the outward doors, which are to be delivered into her hands after the doors are locked, at seven in the winter, and nine in the summer; and she is to take care that the rules of the house be strictly observed, with regard to the time of rest, diet, hours of devotion, and every thing that relates to good order.

The secretary is to keep the books, take minutes at all meetings, to collect the annual subscriptions, and to give notice to such subscribers who are more than one year in arrears, &c.

The steward is to reside constantly in the house, and to follow no other employment than what relates to this charity. He is to receive the respective provisions and materials for the employment of the women, ordered by the committee, and inspect the weight, measures, and quality thereof, and to make regular entries of them; to keep an exact account of all the work done by every respective woman, as the matron shall deliver it to him.

The porter is not to receive any letter, message, or other thing into the house, or send out any thing, without the knowledge or inspection of the matron: he is to reside in the house, and strictly to observe the instructions that shall be given him, in regard to visitors, letters, &c.

The messenger is also to dwell in the house, and to be employed in errand and out-door business: but he is not to bring any letter, verbal message, or other thing into the house, or to carry out any message or other thing, without the knowledge or inspection of the matron.

Neither the steward, porter nor messenger shall have any communication with the wards.

No officer, nor servant of the house shall, receive any money, fee, gratuity, or reward, besides their wages.

Rules and regulations relating to the penitents.

1. That the method of admission be by petition to the committee, the printed form of which, with proper blanks to be filled up, may be had gratis by application at the house. That every petitioner be examined as to her health, by the physician, surgeon, and matron. When any petition is approved, it shall be wrote upon Found proper, and signed by the chairman. Every person, upon admission, shall subscribe to the rules of the house, and also enter into an agreement to pay the sum of ten pounds per annum for her board, lodgings, and necessaries, which is to be void, provided such person continues in the house three years, or less time, at the option of the committee. No person admitted shall be allowed to go out of the house without special leave in writing, signed by the treasurer or chairman, and two of the committee.

2. One or more wards are to be allowed for persons newly admitted, where they are to remain some time for a trial of their behaviour. There shall be a superiority of wards, according to the education or behaviour of the persons admitted; and the inferior wards shall consist of meaner persons, and of those degraded for misbehaviour. In each ward they shall be classed, and one appointed to preside and be accountable for the conduct and behaviour of the rest; and they shall, by rotation, do the necessary offices in their respective wards, excepting the person appointed to preside. They are also to perform the necessary offices of the house, as they shall be directed by the matron; and an allowance shall be made to such as perform these offices, out of the general produce of the work done in the house, according to the proportion of the value of their duty and labour.

3. Each person is to lie in a separate bed, and have a chest for her cloaths and linen, under lock and key to be kept by herself; and, where the room will admit of it, a small closet or apartment is to be provided for the retirement of the most serious and best behaved, in the intervals of their employment, and these also considered as the reward of good conduct.

4. Their true names must be registered; but, if desirous of concealing themselves, they may have liberty to assume a feigned name. As no reproaches must be made for past irregularities, under the severest injunctions; neither shall there be any inquiries made into the name of families; but all possible discouragement given to every kind of discovery that the parties themselves do not chuse to make.

5. Upon their admission, if their apparel is in any tolerable condition, it is to be cleaned, ticketed, and laid by, in order to be returned them whenever they leave the house: but if such apparel be too fine for their station, it shall be sold, and the produce brought to their account. They are to wear an uniform of light grey, and in their whole dress to be plain and neat.

Each ward is to dine at a separate table. The matron is to dine at the head of the table of the superior ward; and the head of each ward is to dine at the upper end of each table, and to say grace.

7. Each person is to be employed in some work or business according to her ability, and have such part of the benefit arising from her labour and ingenuity as the committee shall judge she deserves; which sum may be increased by the bounty of the house, as favourable opportunities may offer for establishing them in the world. The articles proposed for their employment are, making their own cloaths, both linnen and woollen; knitting, spinning, making bone lace, black lace, artificial flowers, childrens toys, winding silk, drawing patterns, making women and childrens shoes, mantuas, stays, coats, &c. but no part of their labour is to be sold in the house, house, but at some other place appointed by the committee. In their work, as in every other circumstance, the utmost care and delicacy, humanity and tenderness will be observed, that this establishment may not be thought a house of correction; or even of hard labour, but a safe retreat from their distressful circumstances.

8. From Lady-day to Michaelmas they are to rise at six and be in bed at ten; and from Michaelmas to Lady-day are to rise at seven and be in bed at nine; and after that time no fire or candle shall be allowed, except in the sick ward.

9. They are to breakfast at nine o'clock, and be allowed half an hour; and are to dine at one o'clock, and be allowed an hour; they may leave off work at six in the winter, and seven in summer.

10. No governor, or any other person, shall be permitted to visit the wards, or any of the women, without leave in writing first obtained from the treasurer or chairman, and two of the committee, except in cases provided for; and in all cases the matron to attend them.

11. Abusive or reproachful language, insolence or disobedience to the officers, indecent or profane expressions, and such kind of turbulent conduct, shall subject them to confinement in a room six hours for the first offence. For the second offence they shall be admonished publicly by the chaplain and the matron; and the rest of their own ward may be also appealed to for their disapprobation of such conduct. The third offence shall subject them to be confined for twelve hours, and to have but one spare meal during the whole day, and if found to be incorrigible, then to forfeit a certain proportion, or the whole, of what hath been acquired by their labour, at the discretion of the committee, and be subject to the consequences of their disagreement; and to be dismissed the house, and never re-admitted.

12. After the continuance of any woman in the house three years, upon the modest and virtuous demeanor and industrious conduct of such woman, or upon application of her parents or friends, or any housekeeper of sufficient credit, if such friends declare they will forgive the past offences of such woman, and will provide for her; or if such housekeeper will receive such woman as a servant; in either of these cases the governors may discharge such woman with her consent.

13. Upon the discharge of such woman, her cloaths, or, if sold, the produce of them, shall be returned to her, together with whatever may be due upon her account, and a certificate given her, under the hands of the treasurer, or the president, and two or more of the committee, of her conduct and behaviour during the time of her being in the house.

14. Every woman who shall be placed in a service from this house, and shall continue one whole year in such service, to the entire approbation of such master or mistress, upon its being made appear to the satisfaction of the committee, they may give the woman a gratuity not exceeding two guineas, as a reward for her good behaviour.

15. The committee will, upon the good behaviour of the women, interest themselves to obtain a reconciliation with their parents and friends, when their contract will be cancelled.

16. Besides the vouchers abovementioned, and the advantages arising from their labour, a bounty may be given, at the discretion of the committee, to such as shall be properly discharged. This gift shall be presented not only to those who marry in a manner satisfactory to the committee, but also to such as shall set up trades in whatever way they shall have gained a proficiency: so that nothing shall be omitted which can promote the great ends of preserving life, of rendering that life useful, and of recovering those who are now lost to the community.

The west end of Prescot-street opens towards the south with a passage into Rosemary-lane, in which is a Baptist meeting-house; and at the south-west corner of Lemon-street, in Rosemary branch-alley, is another of the same denomination.

On the north side of Rosemary-lane, and at the west end, stands a good set of alms-houses lately built at the expence of the Merchant-taylors company, for fourteen poor old women, who receive 16*l.* per week, by the founder's will, and 8*l.* 15*s.* annually from the company. On the south side of this lane lies the ground called East Smithfield, now divided into a great number of alleys, lanes, courts, &c. but in the reign of king Henry III. was an open field, on which was held a fair, by royal grant, for fifteen days, viz. from the eve of Pentecost to the octaves of Trinity. And the said king sent his briefs to the several sheriffs of Lincoln, Gloucester, Kent, Worcester, York, Norfolk and Suffolk, and to the mayor and sheriffs of London, to proclaim the same. "And therefore we command you, that you cause to be proclaimed the before said fair throughout the whole bailiffwick, as is aforesaid; causing all merchants of your bailiffwick to know, that they may securely come to the fair. Witness the king at Westminster, the eighth day of February." 13 Henry III.

Between East Smithfield and Tower-hill once stood a religious foundation, called by the several names of the New Abbey, the Abbey of Graces, and Eastminster, founded by king Henry III. On the site of this abbey, dissolved by king Henry VIII. is founded and built the king's

VICTUALLING OFFICE.

This building, which stands on the upper part of Little Tower-hill, near the end of King-street, contains houses for the lodging of certain officers, separate apartments for offices, storerooms, slaughter-houses for oxen and hogs, a brewhouse, and a house for salting and barrelling provisions.

The business of this office is under the direction of seven commissioners who have each 400*l.* per annum, and a separate department; under whom is a secretary, accomptants, clerks, surveyors, and other officers and servants. In this office all purveyors, and others intrusted with the public stores of provisions, or contract for them, are to pass their accounts. Farther matters respecting Tower-hill, will be described in their proper place.

CHAP.

CHAPTER XXI.

OF QUEENHITHE WARD.

THIS ward receives its name from the hithe or harbour for large boats, barges, or lighters, and even for ships, which in ancient times anchored at that place, as they do now at and near Billingsgate. It bears the additional epithet of queen, from the queens of England usually possessing the tolls and customs of vessels that unloaded goods there, which were very considerable; and all vessels laden with corn and fish were obliged to unload at this hithe, and no where else. It is now a great meal-market, well furnished with conveniences to deposit goods brought hither by water to be sold; and with a commodious market-house.

This ward is bounded on the east by Dowgate-ward, on the north by Bread-street and Cordwainers wards, on the south by the Thames, and on the west by Castlebaynard ward. It is divided into nine precincts; and is governed by an alderman, six common-council-men including the alderman's deputy and nine constables.

The extent of this ward beginneth on the south side of Knightrider-street, and runneth west to a lane called Lambert-hill; out of Knightrider-street are divers lanes running south to Thames-street. The first is Trinity-lane, which runneth down by the west end of Trinity-church. There is Spuren-lane, or Spooners-lane, now called Huggen-lane: then Bread-street-hill: then St. Mary Mounthaut; out of which lane, on the east side thereof, is one other lane, turning east through St. Nicholas Olave's church-yard to Breadstreet-hill. This lane is called Finimore-lane or Five-foot-lane, because it is but five foot in breadth at the west end. In the middle of this lane runneth down one other lane, broader, south to Thames-street, called Desborne-lane. On the north side, coming from Knightrider-street, it takes in all the east side of Lambert-hill, and so much of the west side as from the north end of Blacksmith's-hall to Thames-street, and so much of Thames-street as three doors west from the Old-Swan brewhouse, in the east unto Huntingdon-house, over against St. Peter's church in the west, near unto Paul's-wharf, and on the lane side from the Blue-boar to the west end of St. Peter's-church, and up St. Peter's-hill two houses north above the said church.

We shall begin the survey of this ward at Old-Fish-street, (otherwise called Labour-in-vain-hill, from the difficulty of carriages ascending it) at the north west angle of which is situate the parish church of ST. NICHOLAS Cole-Abbey.

This church is so denominated from its dedication to the above-mentioned saint; but the reason of the additional epithet is not known, some conjecturing it to be a corruption of Golden-Abbey, and others that it is derived from Cold-abbey, or Coldbey, from its cold or bleak situation. It is known that there was a church in the same place before the year 1383: but the last structure being consumed in the great conflagration in 1666, the present church was built in its place, and the parish of St. Nicholas Olave united to it.

This edifice consists of a plain body well enlightened by a single range of windows decently ornamented. It is sixty-three feet long, and forty-three feet broad; thirty-six feet high to the roof, and one hundred and thirty-five to the top of the spire. The tower is plain, but strengthened with rustic at the corners; and the spire, which is of the massy kind, has a gallery and many openings.

The advowson of this rectory was antiently in the dean and chapter of St. Martin's-le-Grand; but upon the grant of that collegiate church to the abbot and canons of Westminster, the patronage devolved to that convent, in whom it continued till the dissolution of their monastery; when coming to the crown it remained therein, till queen Elizabeth, in the year 1560, granted the patronage thereof to Thomas Reeve and George Evelyn, and their heirs in socage, who, conveying it to others, it came at last to the family of the Hackers; one whereof was colonel Francis Hacker, commander of the guard that conducted king Charles I. to and from his trial, and at last to the scaffold; for which, after the restoration, he was executed as a traitor, when the advowson reverted to the crown, in whom it still continues. The rector, besides his other profits, receives 130l. a year in lieu of tythes. The church of St. Nicholas Olave stood where the church yard is now, on the west side of Bread-street-hill; the advowson of which is in the crown and the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, who present alternately. The vestries of these parishes are general; and each has two churchwardens and two collectors or overseers of the poor.

Thames-street runs through the heart of this ward, and contains, on the south side, several lanes that lead down to Wood-wharf, Broken-wharf, Brooker's-wharf, Brook's-wharf, Queenhithe, and other places on the Thames side; on which account this division is greatly thronged with carts employed in carrying goods and merchandize.

In this street, opposite Broken-wharf, is situate the parish church of

ST. MARY SOMERSET.

This church takes the additional epithet of Somerset from its vicinity to Sumnor's bet, or bithe, a small port or haven resembling that of Queenhithe. A church was situated in this place before the year 1335; but the old edifice sharing the fate of most of the other public buildings, in the fire of London, the present structure was erected in its stead.

The body of this edifice is enlightened by a range of lofty arched windows, and the wall is terminated by a balustrade. A well proportioned square tower rises to a considerable height, and is crowned with a handsome vase at each corner, supported on a very ornamental pedestal, with a handsome turret between in the form of an obelisk, each supported on the same kind of pedestal as the vases, and crowned with a ball.

This church is in the gift of a lay patron, and being united to St. Mary Mounthaw, which is in the gift of the bishop of Hereford, they present alternately to this living, which is rated by act of parliament at 110l. per annum, in lieu of tythes, and 30l. in glebe.

The vestry of St. Mary Somerset is select, consisting of about twenty; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, four overseers, two collectors, and two sidersmen.

The vestry of St. Mary Mounthaw is general, and there are only two churchwardens. It was called Mounthaw, or Mountauts, or Montalto, from the founder, belonging to a family in Norfolk of that name. The site of the church, which is on the east side of Fishstreet-hill, is at this time used only as a burial place for the inhabitants.

On the north side of Thames-street, at the south-west angle of Little Trinity-lane, is situate the parish church of St. MICHAEL, Queenhithe.

About the year 1181 this church was denominated St. Michael de Cornhithe, which may lead us to the origin of the name by which we at present call that wharf, and this church from its situation near it; as the quantities of corn brought thither down the Thames might occasion the original name, and Queenhithe be only a corrupt way of speaking it.

The old church being consumed by the dreadful fire in 1666, the present structure was erected in its stead. It consists of a well proportioned body, enlightened by two series of windows, the first a range of tall arched ones, and over these a range of large port-hole windows, above which are cherubims heads, and underneath festoons, that adorn the lower part, and fall between the tops of the under series. The tower is plain but well proportioned, and is terminated by a spire crowned with a vane in the form of a little ship.

This church has all along been in the gift of the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, and is subject to the archdeacon. On its being rebuilt the parish of the Trinity was united to it, by which the rector's fees were considerably augmented, he receiving, besides other advantages, 160l. per annum, in lieu of tythes.

Trinity church was situate at the north-east corner of Trinity-lane, where at present stands the Sweedish, otherwise called the Lutheran church. It was in the gift of the dean and chapter of Canterbury, so that the living of the united parishes is alternately in the gift of those two patrons.

On the west side of Trinity-lane, at the corner of Huggen-alley, stands

PAINTER STAINERS HALL.

This hall is adorned with a handsome screen, arches, pillars, and pilasters of the Corinthian order, painted in imitation of porphyry, with gilt capitals. The pannels are of wainscot, and the ceilings are embellished with great variety of history and other paintings, exquisitely performed; amongst which are the portraits of king Charles II. and his queen Catherine, by Mr. Houseman.

In this court room are some fine pictures, most of which are portraits of the members of the company; and in the front of the room is a fine bust of Mr. Thomas Evans, who left five houses in Basinghall-street to the company.

Mr. Camden, the famous antiquarian, gave the Painter Stainers company a silver cup and cover, which they use every St. Luke's day at their election; the old master drinking to the one then elected, out of it. On this cup is the following inscription: Gal. Camdenus Clarenceux filius Semporis pictoris Londinensis dono dedit.

This company was incorporated by letters patent granted by queen Elizabeth in the year 1582, by the name of "The master, wardens and company of the freedom of the art and mystery of painting, called painter-stainers, within the city of London;" and is governed by a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants, who have a considerable livery, and is numbered the twenty-eighth in the city list of companies.

Lambert-hill is well built, and inhabited by private families. On the hill stands a handsome building called

BLACKSMITHS HALL.

The company of Blacksmiths is very ancient by prescription, but was not incorporated till the reign of queen Elizabeth, in the year 1571, by the title of "The keepers or wardens and society of the art and mystery de les Blacksmiths." It is a livery company, the 40th in the city list, and is governed by a master, three wardens and a court of assistants.

CHAPTER XXII.

OF TOWER-STREET WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from the principal street therein, which leadeth out of the city in a direct line to the grand entrance into the Tower of London, and is the first ward in the fourth east part of the city.

It is bounded on the east by Tower-hill and part of Aldgate ward, on the north by Langbourn ward, on the west by Billingsgate ward, and on the south by the river Thames. It extends from the Tower of London in the east, to the middle way between Great Dice-key and Smart's key in the west; and from the west corner of Tower-dock in the south, to within seventy-feet of the north end of Rood-lane in the north, in which are contained a great number of streets, lanes, &c. as, part of Thames-street, Seething-lane, Mark-lane, Mincing-lane, Hart-street, Idle-lane, St. Dunstan's-hill, Harp-lane, Beer-lane, &c.

This ward is divided into twelve precincts; and is governed by one alderman, twelve common-council-men, (one of whom is the alderman's deputy) twelve constables, thirteen inquest-men, twelve scavengers and a beadle.

We shall begin the survey of this ward at Thames-street, which is a place of considerable trade, and occupied by great dealers as well wholesale as retail. Though this street is very broad, yet the inhabitants are greatly annoyed with carts, employed by the merchants to carry their goods to and from the keys. That part of Thames-street which is in this ward goeth not so far as Billingsgate, and contains the following keys or wharfs, viz. the Tower-dock, Brewers-key, Galley-key, Custom-house key, Potters-key, Wiggins-key, Ralphs-key, Temple-key, Little Dice key, Great Dice-key, Smarts-key; all which are used for the lading and unlading merchandize, &c.

The first avenue at the west end of Thames-street, on the north side, is Idle-lane, between which, and Dunstan's-hill, stands the beautiful church of St. DUNSTAN in the East.

This church is dedicated to St. Dunstan archbishop of Canterbury, an implacable enemy and cruel persecutor of the secular clergy, in favour of the regulars; and the additional epithet, the East is given it, to distinguish it from St. Dunstan's in Fleet-street. It suffered greatly by the fire of London in 1666, but was thoroughly repaired in eighteen months after, though the steeple was delayed ten years longer.

It is built in the modern Gothic stile, eighty-seven feet in length, sixty-three in breadth, and thirty-three in height to the roof. It is well lightened, and agreeably disposed within. The steeple is 125 feet high, and well constructed in the Gothic manner. The tower is light, supported by outworks at the angles, and divided into three stages, terminating at the corners by four handsome pinnacles; in the midst of which rises the spire, on the narrow crowns of four Gothic arches, a bold attempt in architecture, and is one proof, among many, of the great geometrical skill of the architect, Sir Christopher Wren, who built this light and elegant tower.

The patronage of this rectory was anciently in the prior and canons of Canterbury, who in the year 1365 granted the same to Simon their archbishop, and his successors, in whom it still remains, and is one of the thirteen peculiars in this city belonging to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury.

The value of this living is settled by act of parliament, at 240l. per annum, in lieu of tythes. The vestry is select, and the parish officers are, two churchwardens and two overseers.

On the north side of this church is the

COAL-METERS OFFICE.

In this office are entered all ships that arrive in the port of London with coals; and to which belong fifteen master-meters, who appoint a sufficient number of persons to measure the coals brought by the said ships, to prevent impositions, which would otherwise happen both to the king and subject, in respect to the duty and measure.

These master-meters have each four deputies or under coal-meters, who must be approved of by the Lord-mayor and aldermen, as upon them the care of weighing and measuring coals, principally depends; their business being to attend each ship, to top the vass, and to return an account of the coals measured to the coal-office, in order to ascertain and collect the duties. For which trouble they receive one penny per chaldron for all coals measured, and two pence per ton for all coals weighed. Both the principal and under-meters take an oath, at their admission into office, to give a just measure to rich and poor, without partiality or favour; to buy no coals except for his own use, nor to sell any coals while in that office, nor to take any more for their trouble than was anciently allowed.

Farther to the east is Harp-lane, a great thoroughfare for carts from the keys: on the east side of which stands

BAKERS

BAKERS HALL.

This is a plain edifice, and was originally the dwelling-house of John Chicheley, chamberlain of London.

The fraternity of Bakers appears to be of great antiquity; for in the year 1155, it was charged in the great roll of the exchequer, with a debt of one mark of gold, for their guild; by which it seems as if the ancient guilds had held their privileges in fee farm of the crown. This company, however, was not incorporated till about the year 1307, which charter was renewed by Henry VII. and confirmed by divers of his successors. But when, or by whom their arms were at first granted does not appear; though it must have been before the year 1590, because in that year their crest and supporters were granted by Clarencieux king at arms.

This company is incorporated by the name of "The master and wardens of the mystery or art of Bakers of the city of London;" and is governed by a master, four wardens, and a court of assistants. It is a livery company, and is numbered the nineteenth in the city list.

Near the south-east angle of Thames-street, fronting the wharfs and river, is situate

The CUSTOM HOUSE.

This is a commodious building, erected for the receipt of his majesty's customs on goods imported and exported. In ancient times the business of the Custom-house was transacted in a more irregular manner at Billingsgate: but in the year 1559, an act being passed that goods should be no where landed, but in such places as were appointed by the commissioners of the revenue, this was the spot fixed upon for the entries in the port of London, and here a custom-house was ordered to be erected. It was, however, destroyed by the fire of London in 1666, and was rebuilt with additions two years after by king Charles II. in a much more magnificent and commodious manner, at the expence of 10,000*l.* but that being also destroyed in the same manner in 1718, the present structure was erected in its stead.

This edifice is built with brick and stone, and is calculated to stand for ages. It has underneath, and on each side, large warehouses for the reception of goods on the public account, and that side of the Thames, for a great extent is filled with wharfs, keys, and cranes for landing them. It is one hundred and eighty-nine feet in length; the center is twenty-seven feet deep, and the wings considerably more. The center stands back from the river; the wings approach much nearer to it, and the building is judiciously and handsomely decorated with the orders of architecture: under the wings is a colonade of the Tuscan order, and the upper story is ornamented with Ionic columns and pediments. It consists of two floors, in the uppermost of which is a magnificent room fifteen feet high, that runs almost the whole length of the building: this room is called the Long Room, and here sit the commissioners of the customs, with their officers and clerks

The inner part is well disposed, and sufficiently enlightened; and the entrances are so well contrived, as to answer all the purposes of convenience for the transaction of such extensive business.

The government of the Custom-house is under the care of nine commissioners, who are intrusted with the whole management of all his majesty's customs in all the ports of England, the petty farms excepted, and also the oversight of all the officers belonging to them. Each of these commissioners has a salary of 1000*l.* per annum, and both they, and several of the principal officers under them, hold their places by patent from the king. The other officers are appointed by warrant from the lords of the treasury.

It is observable that in the year 1590 the customs and subsidies in the port of London inwards, were let to farm to Mr. Thomas Smith, for 20,000*l.* per annum, when it was discovered that they amounted annually to 30,309*l.* so that queen Elizabeth lost every year 10,309*l.* but by the vast increase of commerce since that time, they at present bring in above one hundred times as much, the customs now annually amounting to above two millions; and yet this immense business is transacted with as much order and regularity, as the common affairs of a merchant's compting-house.

Opposite Custom-house key is Water-lane, which leads up a winding hill to Tower-street. About the middle of this lane, on the west side, is a handsome and large building, called the

TRINITY-HOUSE OF DEPTFORD STROND.

This society was founded in the year 1515, by Sir Thomas Spert, knt. commander of the ship Henry Grace de Dieu, and comptroller of the navy to Henry VIII. for the regulation of seamen and convenience of ships and mariners on our coast; and incorporated by the abovementioned prince, who confirmed to them not only the ancient rights and privileges of the company of mariners of England, but their several possessions at Deptford; which together with the grants of queen Elizabeth and king Charles II. were also confirmed by letters patent of the first of James II. in 1685, by the name of "The master, wardens and assistants of the guild or fraternity of the most glorious and undivided Trinity, and of St. Clement in the parish of Deptford Strond in the county of Kent."

This corporation is governed by a master, four wardens, eight assistants, and eighteen elder brethren. The inferior members are called younger brethren; into which number any master or mate skilled in navigation may be admitted; which excuses him from serving parish and ward offices, and entitles them to be pilots.

The master, wardens, assistants, and elder brethren are by charter invested with the following powers.

1. That of examining the mathematical children of Christ's-hospital.
2. The examination of the masters of his majesty's ships; the appointing pilots to conduct ships in and and out of the river Thames; and the amercing all such as shall presume to act as master of a ship of war or pilor, without their approbation, in a pecuniary mulct of twenty shillings.

3. The settling the several rates of pilotage and erecting light-houses, and other sea marks upon the several coasts of the kingdom, for the security of navigation; to which light-houses all ships pay one half penny a ton.

4. The granting licences to poor seamen, not free of the city, to row on the river Thames for their support, in the intervals of sea-service, or when past going to sea.

5. The preventing of aliens from serving on board English ships, without their licence, upon the penalty of five pounds for each offence.

6. The punishing of seamen for desertion, or mutiny in the merchants service.

7. The hearing and determining the complaints of officers and seamen in the merchants service; but subject to an appeal to the lords of the admiralty, or the judge of the court of admiralty.

To this company belongs the ballast office, for clearing and deepning the river Thames by taking from thence a sufficient quantity of ballast, for the supply of all ships that sail out of that river; in which service sixty barges, with two men in each, are constantly employed, and all ships that take in ballast pay them one shilling a ton, for which it is brought to the ships sides.

In consideration of the great increase of the poor of this fraternity, they are by their charter empowered to purchase in mortmain lands, tenements, &c. to the amount of 500l. per annum and also to receive charitable benefactions of well disposed persons, to the like amount of 500l. per annum clear of reprises.

There are annually relieved by this company about 3000 poor seamen, their widows and orphans, at the expence of about 6000l. They generally meet to chuse their master at their house at Deptford, though they are not obliged to do it there. Their meetings are generally on Wednesdays and Saturdays, but their courts are not constantly fixed to a set time.

Their house in Water-lane has been twice burnt down, once at the fire of London, and the last time in the year 1718. Among the curiosities preserved in the hall of this building is a flag taken from the Spaniards, by the brave Sir Francis Drake, whose picture is also there. A large and exact model of a ship entirely rigged, and two large globes; and in the parlour are five large drawings, curiously performed by the pen, of several engagements at sea, in the reign of king Charles II.

On the north side of Tower-street is Mincing-lane, which is handsomely built, and well inhabited. Near the north east end of which is situate.

CLOTHWORKERS HALL.

This is a neat brick building, with fluted columns of the same, crowned with Corinthian capitals of stone. The hall is a lofty room adorned with wainscot to the ceiling, where is curious fret work. The screen at the south end is of oak, adorned with four pilasters, their entablature and compass pediment of the Corinthian order, enriched with their arms and palm branches. The west end is adorned with the figures of king James and king Charles I. richly carved, as big as life, in their robes, with Regalia, all gilt with gold, and highly finished, where is a spacious window of stained glass, and the king's-arms; also those of Sir John Robinson, knt. and bart. his majesty's lieutenant of the Tower of London, Lord-mayor of the city in the year 1663, and president of the artillery company.

This company was incorporated by king Edward VI. in the year 1482, by the name of "The fraternity of the assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, of the shearmen of London." But being incorporated by queen Elizabeth, her majesty changed their first appellation to that of "The master, wardens, and commonalty of freemen, of the art and mystery of Cloth-workers of the city of London." It is now a livery company and the last of the twelve companies of London; and is governed by a master, four wardens, and a court of assistants. They have large annual estates, both in their own right and in trust for charities; out of which they pay to the poor upwards of 1400l. per annum.

Mark-lane, which opens into Fenchurch-street, is well built, and principally inhabited by merchants and others of opulence. It was anciently called Mart-lane, from a mart or free market kept there. On the east side of this lane, near Tower-street, stands

The CORN EXCHANGE

This building which is very handsome, is adapted for transacting business in the corn and meal way. Next the street is an ascent of three steps to a range of eight lofty Doric columns, those at the corners being coupled: between them are iron rails and three iron gates. These columns, and two others on the inside, support a plain building two stories high, which contains two coffee-houses, to which they ascend by two flights of handsome stone steps, on each side underneath the edifice. On entering the iron gates you pass forwards into a small square, paved all over with broad stones. This is surrounded by a colonade, composed of six columns on each side, and four at the ends, reckoning the corners twice. Above the entablature is an handsome balustrade, surrounding the whole square with an elegant vase placed over each column. The space around, within the colonade, is very broad, with sash windows on the top to convey the greater light to the corn factors, who sit round the court below. Each has a kind of desk before him, on which lie several parcels of corn; and from these small samples are every market day sold many thousand quarters.

Seething lane goes out of Tower-street, near the north east angle into Hart-street and Crutched-friars. At the south east corner of this lane stands the parish church of

This church is so denominated from its being 7 A dedicated dedicated to all the saints, vulgarly called All-hallows, and its anciently belonging to the abbels and convent of Barking in Essex. It escaped the fire in 1666, and carries about it the marks of that period when architecture was not well understood in England. That this church is of great antiquity will appear from a chapel which king Richard I. founded therein upwards of five hundred years ago; and in which some writers affirm his heart was buried under the high altar. This chapel was confirmed and augmented by king Edward I. Edward IV. gave licence to his cousin John, earl of Worcester, to found there a brotherhood for a master and brethren. And he gave to the Custos of that fraternity, which was Sir John Scot, knt. Thomas Colt, John Tate, and John Croke, the priory of Totingbroke, and the advowson of the parish church of Stret-ham in the county of Surry, with all the members and appurtenances, and a part of the priory of Okeborne in Wiltshire, both priors aliens, and appointed it to be called the king's chapel or chantry, In capella beata Maria de Barking.

King Richard III. new built this chapel, and founded therein a college of priests, consisting of a dean and six canons: all which that king placed there. The deanry he gave to Edmund Chaderton, a great favourite of his. The canonries he disposed, at the time that Chaderton was made dean, to these persons following, viz. Mr. Thomas Cowton, a canon there; Richard Baldry another; Mr. Jane another; James Molineux another; Richard Selfie another; Maculin Cofin another. Hammond de Lega was buried in that chapel. Robert Tate, mayor of London 1488, and others, were there buried.

This college was suppressed and pulled down in the year 1548, the second of king Edward VI. The ground was employed as a garden-plot during the reigns of king Edward, queen Mary and part of queen Elizabeth, till at length a large strong frame of timber and brick was set thereon, and employed as a storehouse of merchants goods brought from the sea by Sir William Winter, &c.

This church is of considerable extent, and the steeple is a plain tower with its turret. It is a vicarage in the patronage of the archbishop of Canterbury; and the vicar besides other advantages, receives about 126l. per annum in tythes.

The vestry is select; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, four collectors for the poor, two sidesmen and four auditors of accounts.

From thence we pass on to Tower hill, which is a very spacious area to the north, east and west, of the Tower-ditch, and divided into Great and Little Tower-hill. The former is all that space between the Thames on the south west, and the houses called Postern-row on the east. At the north west part of this angle which is well built and inhabited, is the back entrance into the Navy-office; and at the north east angle is the Sick and wounded office. Under Postern-row is a spring of excellent water; and in the middle of Great Tower-hill, facing the Sixpenny-office, or Catharine-court, is the place where scaffolds have been usually erected for the beheading of criminals condemned by the state.

Little Tower-hill is all that vacant space of ground which runs from Postern-row along the Tower-ditch to Irongate; and, except the Vic-tualling-office, it is very badly furnished with houses for reputable inhabitants, most of the buildings on the east side being greatly decayed. At the south end of this hill is a landing-place called Irongate, so named from an iron gate, which formerly shut up the east entrance into the Tower.

One half of the Tower, the ditch on the west side, and bulwarks adjoining, stand within that part where the wall of the city of old time went straight from the Postern-gate south to the river of Thames, before the Tower was built. This wall extends from the postern across Tower-ditch, and, encompassing the Tower-chapel, goes along under the old houses, where its remains are to be seen, that go to the parade from Traitor's-bridge.

We have now no other remarkable in this ward, except the Tower itself; a particular description of which the reader will find in page 89, &c.

CHAPTER XXIII.

OF VINTRY WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from a part thereof called the Vintrie by the ancients, occupied by Vintners or Wine-merchants from Bourdeaux, settled on the bank of the river Thames; at which place they landed their wines, and were obliged to sell them in forty days, till the twenty-eighth of Edward I.

It begins in the east at the west end of Dowgate ward, as the water-course of Wallbrook parteth them, to wit, at Grantham's-lane on the Thames side, and at Elbow-lane on the land side: it runneth along in Thames-street west, some three houses beyond the Old Swan, a brewhoule on the Thames side, and on the land side some three houses west beyond St. James's at Garlick-hitch. It stretcheth from the Vintry north, to the wall of the west gate of the Tower-royal. It is bounded on the north by Cordwainers ward, on the south by the Thames; on the east by Dowgate ward, and on the west by Queenhithe ward.

This

This ward is divided into nine precincts, and is governed by an alderman, nine common-councilmen including the alderman's deputy, nine constables, thirteen inquest-men, three scavengers and a beadle.

We shall begin the survey of this ward with that part of Thames-street which runs east and west through the heart of it, and reaches from the west end of Dowgate ward to Townsend-lane, where Queenhithe ward begins.

In this part of Thames-street, on the south side, are Black Swan-alley and Shepherd's-alley, which are narrow, long, and indifferently well built for business at the waterside. Emperor's head-court narrow and ordinary. Brickhill-lane, well built and open. Three-crane-lane, crooked, long and narrow, chiefly occupied by coffermongers. Church-lane is also long and narrow.

New Queen street, otherwise called the Three-crane in the Vintry, is a good open street, especially that part next Cheap-side, which is best built and inhabited; but it hath no more in this ward than a little beyond St. Thomas Apostles, the rest of this street being in Cordwainers ward and Cheap-ward. At the south end of this street, next the Thames, is a pair of stairs, or landing-place, called the Three-crane, which is the usual place for the Lord-mayor to take water at to go to Westminster, to be sworn into his office. And these stairs are much frequented by coffermongers, who have large warehouses near them to deposit their fruit, &c.

The north side of Thames-street hath these places: Little Elbow-lane, which falls into Great Elbow-lane, and so into College-hill; both which lanes are indifferent.

College-hill comes out of St. Thomas Apostles and falls into Thames-street; a place well built and inhabited by merchants and others. On the west side is Maiden-lane, which crosseth New Queen-street, and falls into Garlick-hill. Out of this lane is a passage into Thames-street, and another into Maidenhead-court, which is but ordinary. On the east side of College-hill is situate the parish church of #### St. MICHAEL ROYAL.

This church, which is a rectory, is thus denominated from its being anciently situate near the Tower Royal. It was a parish church before the year 1285, when it was under the patronage of the prior and canons of Canterbury, in whom it continued till it was converted into a college; and even then the said monks so far continued patrons thereof, as to present a person nominated by the master and wardens of the mercers company.

This church was new builded, and made a college of St. Spirit and St. Mary, founded by Richard Whittington, mercer, four times mayor, for a master, four fellows, masters of arts, clerks, conducts, chorists, &c. and alms-house, called God's-house or hospital, for thirteen poor men: one of them to be tutor, and to have 16d. the week; the other twelve each of them to have 14d. the week, for ever, with other necessary provision.

The ordinances or orders to be observed in this college are as follow:

"To be twelve pover folks alonely of men or women togidre: after the sad discretion and good conscience of the overseers underwrit, and conservators of the same house, to be provided and admitted.

"The which every day, when due and convenient time is, shall pray for evermore for al the now being alive, and also for the by-past, to God: whose names of great specialty been expressed in these statutes under-writ.

"To be one principal, which shall pas all other power and reverence, and be called tutor. The office and charge of him shall be goods of the alms-house, which shall come to his hands, well and truly to minister; the goods dissevered to gather again togidre, to the use of the alms-house; and the husbandry of the same house, in as much as he may goodly oversee, dispose, and ordain; enforcing himself to edifie and nourish charity and peace among his felawes.

"The pover folks unto the said tutor evermore shall obey.

"The thirteen pover folke to be hable in conversation, and honest in living.

"The same house to be called for ever God's house, or Almes-house, or the hospital of Richard Whittington.

"The L. Maior to be overseer of the said Almes-houses; and the keepers of the commonalty of the craft of Mercers to be called evermore Conservators of the foresaid house.

"The tutor to have a place by himself, that is to say, a cell, or little house, with a chimney and a prevy, and other necessaries, in the which he shall lygge and rest; and that he may aloon and by himself, without let of any other person, intend to the contemplation of God, if he woll.

"That the said tutor and pover folke, whan they be in the foresaid houses and cells, and also in the cloisters, and other places of the foresaid almes houses, have hemselve quietlie and pesably, without noise or disturbance of his felawes; and that they occupy himself in prayer or reading, or in labour of her hondes, or in some other occupation, &c."

It endeth thus:

"In witness we have put to our seals. Gyven at London, the xxj day of Decemb. in the yere our lord a thousand CCCC xxiii. and the yere of king Henry VI. after the conquest the thrydde.

"Go litel boke, go litel tregedie,—

"Thee lowly submytting to al correction

"Of theym being masters now of the Mercery,

"Olney, Felding, Boleyne, and of Burton:

"Herteley theym beseyking with humble salutation

"Thee to accept, and thus to take in gre,

"For evre to be a servant withyn yere commination."

But further, for the direction of their daily devotion, votion, of their eating, and their habit, these were the appointments and ordinances :

“ Every tutor and pouer folk every day first whan they rise fro their bedds, kneeling upon their knees, sey a Pater Noster and an Ave Maria, with special and herty recommendation making of the foresaid Richard Whyttington and Alice to God, and our blessed lady maidyn Mary : and other times of the day, whan he may best and most commodly have leisure thereto, for the staat of al soules abovesaid, say three or two sauters of our lady at the least ; that is to say, threis seaven Ave Marias, with xv Pater Nosters, and three Credes : but if he be letted with feble-ness, or any other reasonable cawse, one in the day at least, in case it may be ; that is to say, after the messe, or when Complyn is don, they come togidder within the college about the tomb of the aforesaid Richard Whyttington and Alice, and they that can sey shall sey, for the soules of the seid Richard and Alice, and for the soules of all christen people, this psalm, de profundis, with the versicles and orisons that longeth thereto. And they that can shal sey three Pater Nosters, three Ave Marias, and one crede. And, after this ddon, the tutour, or oon of the eldest men of theym, shal sey openly in English, “ God have mercy on our founders soules, and “ al christens ; ” and they that stond about shal aunswer and sey, Amen.

“ That they be bound to dwell and abide continually in the seid almes house, and bounds thereof ; and that every day, both at meet and soupier, they eet and be fed within the said almes-house ; and while they be at meet or soupier, they absteyn thanne from veyn and ydel words ; and if they wol any thyng talk, that it be honest and profitable.

“ That the overcloathing of the tutour and pouer folk be derk and brown of colour, and not staring ne blaising, and of easy prised, according to their degre.”

The executors of the will of Richard Whyttington constituted five chaplains in his college founded in this church ; which were confirmed by the king in the third of Henry VI.

This Richard Whyttington was (in this church) three times buried ; first by his executors, under a fair monument ; then in the reign of Edward VI. the parson of that church, thinking some great riches, (as he said) to be buried with him, caused his monument to be broken, his body to be spoiled of his leaden sheer, and again the second time to be buried ; and in the reign of queen Mary, the parishioners were forced to take him up to lap him in lead, as afore, to bury him a third time, and to place his monument, or the like, over him again ; which remained, and so he rested, till the great fire of London violated his resting place again.

This church being consumed with the other public buildings by the fire of London, the present structure was erected in its stead, and the parish of St. Martin Vintry united to it. It is a plain, decent and substantial stone building, enlightened by a single series of large arched windows, placed so high that the doors open under the level of their bottoms. The tower consists of three stages, and at the top is surrounded with carved open work instead of a balustrade : from hence rises a light and elegant turret adorned with Ionic columns, and ending in a fine diminution, which supports the fane.

It is one of the thirteen peculiars belonging to the archbishop of Canterbury ; and the rector, besides his other profits, receives 140l. a year, in lieu of tythes. The vestry is general ; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, one collector, and one overseer.

The church of St. Martin Vintry formerly stood near the south-east corner of Queen-street ; the site of which is used as a burial place for the inhabitants. The parish, however, still maintain a vestry, which is general, maintain their own poor, and have two churchwardens, one collector for the poor, and one overseer.

The Tower Royal, formerly situate at the upper end of the street now so called, was a great place, pertaining to the kings of this realm ; but by whom the same was built, or of what antiquity continued, is uncertain, any more than that in the reign of king Edward I. the second, fourth, and seventh years, it was the tenement of Simon Beawnes ; also that, in the thirty-sixth of Edward III. the same was called the Royal, in the parish of Michael de Pater-noster ; and that, in the forty-third of his reign, he gave it by the name of his Inne called the Royal, in his city of London, in value twenty pounds by the year, unto his college of St. Stephen at Westminster. Notwithstanding, in the reign of Richard II. it was called the Queen's Wardrobe, as appeareth by the following circumstance :

“ King Richard having in Smithfield overcome and dispersed the rebels, he, his lords, “ and all his company entered the city of London with great joy, and went to the lady princess his mother, who was then lodged in the “ Tower Royal, called the Queen's Wardrobe, “ where she had remained three days and two “ nights, right sore abashed. But when she saw “ the king her son, she was greatly rejoiced, and “ said, Ah, my son, what great sorrow have I “ suffered for you this day ! The king answered “ and said, Certainly, Madam, I know it well, “ but now rejoice and thank God, for I have “ this day recovered mine heritage, and the “ realm of England, which I had near hand “ lost.”

This tower seemeth to have been (at that time) of good defence ; for when the rebels had beset the Tower of London, and got possession thereof, taking from thence whom they listed, the princess being forced to fly, came to this Tower-royal, where she was lodged and remained safe, as ye have heard ; and it may be also supposed, that the king himself was at that time lodged there.

William of Ipres, a Fleming, called out of Flanders, with a number of Flemings, to the aid of of king Stephen, against Maud the empress, in the year 1138, grew so far in favour with the said king for his service, that he built a house near the Tower-royal, in which tower it seemeth the king was then lodged, as in the heart of the city, for his greater safety. This proves the great antiquity of the Tower-royal.

St. Thomas Apostles of which there are two, viz. Great St. Thomas Apostles, which is in this ward; and Little St. Thomas Apostles, which is in Cordwainer's ward. This great St. Thomas Apostles is a handsome street, and well inhabited: on the north side of which, before the fire of London, was situate the church of St. Thomas Apostles; but that not being rebuilt, the parish is united to St. Mary Aldermary. In this street are the following places: Black-lion-inn, but indifferent; Baldwin's yard, a handsome open court, with tolerable good buildings; Blunderbuss-alley, on the east side of St. Thomas's church-yard, very small. Dodson's court, a pretty large open place, with a freestone passage into Budge-row, well built and inhabited; nearly opposite which, in Cloak-lane, is a neat and convenient building called

CUTLERS HALL.

This company was incorporated by king Henry V. in the year 1417, by the style of "The master, wardens, and commonalty of the mystery of cutlers of London." And they were afterwards united to the Belt and Sheath-makers. It is a livery company, and is governed by a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants; and is numbered the eighteenth in the city list.

Anchor-lane in Thames-street, is long and narrow; adjoining to which stands

VINTNERS HALL.

This is a handsome building, situate on the spot where once stood the house of Sir John Stody, who gave it the company; and was at that time called the Manor of the Vintry. The present building encloses a square court, with a large handsome iron gate in the front next the street, hung upon columns wreathed with grapes and leaves, and a Bacchus upon three tons, on each pillar. And behind the hall is a garden, with a passage to the Thames.

This is one of the twelve principal companies, and were anciently denominated merchant wine tunners of Gascoyne, and were of two sorts, the Veneatrii, who imported the wine, and the Tabernarii who sold it by retail, and kept either taverns or wine cellars. The vintners, however, were not incorporated till 15 Henry VI. who granted them a charter to make them a body politic, by the style of "The master, wardens, and freeman and commonalty of the mystery of Vintners of the city of London;" but without a power to make bye-laws.

This company is governed by a master, three wardens, and a court of assistants. And the freemen belonging to it have the privilege of retailing wine without a licence from the Wine-office. They have considerable possessions, out of which they pay to charitable uses about 600l. per annum.

Worcester-place runs parallel with Anchor-lane, but is not remarkable on any other account than its being built upon the site of the mansion belonging to the earls of Worcester.

Proceeding from the west, by the north side of Thames-street, we come to Garlick-hill. At the south east angle of which stands the parish church of #### St. J A M E S Garlick-hill, or Garlickhithe.

This church is thus denominated from its dedication to St. James one of the apostles, and its vicinity to a garlic market, anciently held in this neighbourhood.

The old church being destroyed by the fire of London, the foundation of the present edifice was laid in the year 1676, and the church was finished in 1682. It is built of stone, 75 feet long, 45 feet broad, 40 feet high to the roof, and the steeple 98 feet. The tower is divided into three stages. In the lowest is a very elegant door, with coupled columns of the Corinthian order. In the second is a large window, with the form of a circular one not opened over it. In the third story is a window larger than the former; and the cornice above this supports a range of open work in the place of battlements, on a balustrade. From hence rises the turret, which is composed of four stages, and decorated with columns, scrolls, and other ornaments.

The patronage of this rectory appears to have been in the abbot and convent of Westminster, till the suppression of their monastery; when coming to the crown, queen Mary, in the year 1553, granted the same to the bishop of London and his successors, in whom it still continues. The rector receives, by act of parliament, 100l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens and four overseers of the poor.

CHAPTER XXIV.

OF WALLBROOK WARD.

THIS ward takes its name from a street which runs up from Cannon-street, near London-stone, to the south west corner of the Mansion-house; and is called Wallbrook, from a brook which formerly ran down on the west side thereof.

It is bounded on the east by Langbourn ward, on the south by Dowgate ward, on the west by Cordwainers ward, and on the north by Cheap ward. It is divided into seven precincts, and is governed by an alderman, eight common-councilmen, including the alderman's deputy, seven constables, thirteen inquest-men, six scavengers, and a headle.

The streets and lanes in this ward are, Wallbrook, as far as Bucklersbury on both sides. Bucklersbury, the east end on both sides, about 80 feet. Budge-row, the east end on both sides for about 70 feet. Dowgate, the north end on the west side as far as Cloak-lane, and on the east side as far as against Tallowchandlers-hall, Cannon street, on both sides as far as Green Lettice-lane on the south side, and to Abchurch-lane on the north side. St. Swithin's-lane on both sides the way almost as far as Bearbinder-lane. The whole of Bearbinder-lane, except about 35 feet at the east end. Lombard-street, about 175 feet on both sides of the west end next the Mansion-house. Sherborne-lane, the south end on both sides for about 120 feet. Bush-lane from Cannon-street southwards on both sides as far as Cross-lane, which hath the north side in this ward. Suffolk-lane, the west side at the north end for about 85 feet downwards. Green-Lettice-lane, only the west side. Abchurch-lane, the west side as far as the church.

The first principal building in this ward is the Lord-mayor's mansion house; a particular description of which has been already given in page 305, &c.

This great building is situate on the spot where once stood Stocks-market; the origin of which market will best appear from the following account. About the year of Christ 1282, Henry Wallis, mayor, caused divers houses in this city to be built towards the maintenance of London-bridge; namely, one void place near unto the parish church called Woolchurch, on the north side thereof, where some time (the way being very large and broad) had stood a pair of stocks for punishment of offenders. This building took name of those stocks, and was appointed by him to be a market-place for fish and flesh in the midst of the city. And it was ordained, A. D. 1322, that none should sell fish or flesh out of this and the other markets, upon pain to forfeit such fish and flesh for the first offence, and to lose their freedom for the second offence.

This Stocks-market was some time belonging to the keepers of the bridge of London, and they let the shops for term of their lives to the butchers and fishmongers at certain rents, which were appropriated for the use of the said bridge. But afterwards, John de Gisors, mayor, 1312, it was concluded, that no keeper of the bridge should let the said shops for life, without the concurrence of the mayor and commonalty.

On the east side of Wallbrook, about twenty feet from the south end of the mansion-house, stands the parish church of

We read of a church near this spot dedicated to the same patron so early as the year 1135; but it then stood on the other side of the street. However, about the year 1428, Robert Chichely, mayor of London, purchased the ground of the present church and cemetery of the Grocers company, and the first stone of the new structure was laid in 1429; but the work advanced so slowly, that it was not finished till the year 1439.

The old structure was destroyed by the fire of London in 1666, and the present noble edifice was erected in its place by the great Sir Christopher Wren. The steeple rises square to a considerable height, and is then surrounded with a balustrade, within which rises a very light and elegant tower in two stages; the first adorned with Corinthian, and the second with Composite columns, and covered with a dome, whence rises the spire.

The principal beauties of this justly admired edifice are on the inside; where the dome, which is spacious and noble, is finely proportioned to the church, and divided into small compartments, decorated with great elegance, and crowned with a lanthorn, while the roof, which is also divided into compartments, is supported by very noble Corinthian columns, raised on their pedestals. It has three isles, and a cross isle; is 70 feet in length, and thirty-six in breadth; the height of the middle roof is thirty four feet, and of the cupola and lanthorn 58 feet. On the sides under the lower roofs are only circular windows, but those which enlighten the upper roof are small arched ones; and at the east end are three very noble arched windows.

In the opinion of some persons this is Sir Christopher Wren's master piece. It is even thought that Italy itself cannot produce any modern structure equal to it in taste, proportion, elegance and beauty. It has a very striking effect at entering, every part at once attracting the eye, except the the bases of the columns, which are injudiciously eclipsed by the carving on the top of the pews, which was not the design of the architect.

This church is a rectory, dedicated to St. Stephen the martyr, in the gift of the Grocers company; and being united with St. Bennet Sherehog, is worth one hundred pounds per annum in lieu of tythes. There is a good parsonage house adjoining to the south side, worth forty pounds per annum. The vestry is select; and the parish officers are only two churchwardens.

St. Bennet Sherehog, the church of which was burnt down in 1666, was a rectory, and originally dedicated to St. Osyth, or corruptly St. Syth; from whence we derive the name of Syth-lane; and the church stood near St. Syth's-lane, at the east end of Needler's-lane, Cheap-side. Edward Hall, who wrote the chronicle from Richard II. to the end of Henry VIII. was buried in this church; the site of which is now used as a burial place for the inhabitants, who have a general vestry, and two churchwardens. The addition of Sherehog was given to this church from the name of its builder or great benefactor, Benedict Shorne, citizen and stock-fishmonger, in the reign of Edward II. which in time was corruptly pronounced Shrog, and more corruptly Sherehog, or Shornehog.

At the south west angle of St. Swithin's-lane in Cannon-street, is situate the parish church of #### St. S W I T H I N.

This church is thus denominated from its dedication to St. Swithin, chancellor to king Egbert and bishop of Winchester, who died in 806. We read of a church in the same place dedicated to the above saint before the year 1331, but how long it was standing before that time is uncertain: however, the old structure was destroyed by the fire of London, and the present edifice arose in its stead.

It is a plain, solid, and strong building of stone, 61 feet long, and 42 broad; the roof is 40 feet, and the steeple 150 feet high. The body is well enlightened; and the windows are arched and well proportioned.

The advowson of this church appears anciently to have been in the prior and convent of Tortington, in the diocese of Chichester, in whom it continued till the dissolution of their monastery; when coming to the crown, Henry VIII. in the year 1540, granted the same, together with a stately mansion on the north side thereof, to John earl of Oxford, who soon after disposing of the same, it passed through several hands, and was at length purchased by the company of Salters, in whom the advowson still remains.

To this parish is united that of St. Mary Botolph; whose church before the fire of London, stood on the east side, and about the middle of Turnwheel-lane, between London-stone and Wallbrook corner near Dowgate-hill, and took its additional name from its vicinity to a Boat-Haw, or boat-builder's yard, in that neighbourhood.

That this church was of great antiquity is manifest, from Wibert, the prior, and convent of Christ's-church in Canterbury having in the year 1167 granted certain lands and houses on the north side thereof to one Ernſ and his heirs; who, in consideration thereof, was annually to pay the sum of ten shillings in money; a towel of the value of eight-pence, two pitchers, at six pieces of money; and a salt-cellar at four; which were to be delivered to the prior's steward for the use of his house. It was a rectory, and a peculiar to the archbishop of Canterbury, but is now united to St. Swithin's. In this church were buried divers noblemen, and personages of great distinction, among whom was Sir Henry Fitz-Alwin, first Lord-mayor of London.

The living of these united parishes is settled by act of parliament at 140l. per annum in lieu of tythes. The vestry for both is general; and the parish officers are two churchwardens.

Close under the south wall of St. Swithin's church stands a great stone called

L O N D O N S T O N E.

This is a very great piece of antiquity, which has been carefully preserved from age to age, and is mentioned by the same name so early as in the time of Ethelstan, king of the west Saxons. It formerly stood a little nearer the channel facing the same place; and being fixed very deep in the ground, was so strongly fastened by bars of iron, as to be in no danger from the carriages.

It seems very surprising that so great a piece of antiquity has been constantly preserved with such care, and yet so little has been said of it, that the original cause of its erection, and the use for which it was intended, is quite uncertain. Most authorities give it a Roman erection, and place it in the center of that city burnt by Boadicea, and to serve for the place from whence the Romans measured their miles, which they reckoned from all great towns and places; by stones pitched; and perhaps this might be the stone for London, from which precise place to measure their miles from this city towards the other parts of the land. And this street in former times being the chief street of London, as Cheap-side now is, this London-stone seems to have been the place (and likely enough upon this stone) whence proclamations and public notices of things were given to the citizens. There is a passage in our chronicles that favours this conceit. In Henry VI's time, Anno 1450, when Jack Cade, the Kentish rebel, who feigned himself the lord Mortimer, came through Southwark into London, he marched to this stone, where was a great confluence of people; and the Lord-mayor among the rest: Here he struck his sword upon it, and said, "Now is 'Mortimer lord of this city:'" and there making a formal, but lying declaration to the mayor, departed back again to Southwark.

Others have said the same to be set for the tendering and making of payment by debtors to their creditors, at their appointed days and times, till of latter time payments were more usually made at the font in St. Paul's church, and at the Royal Exchange.

At

At the north-west corner of St. Swithin's church stands.

SALTERS HALL.

This is a plain brick building, the principal entrance to which is out of Swithin's-lane; and is commodiously adapted for transacting the business of the company. The hall room is let out for a dissenting meeting of the presbyterian denomination.

That the company of Salters is of considerable antiquity will appear from the grant of a livery by Richard II. in the year 1394; but we cannot learn that they were incorporated till the 1st. of Elizabeth A. D. 1558, when, by letters patent, they were stiled "The master, wardens, and commonalty of the art or mystery of Salters of London."

This company, which is the ninth among the twelve principal companies, is governed by a master, two wardens, and a court of assistants. They have a very considerable estate, out of which they pay to charitable uses about five hundred pounds per annum.

CHAPTER XXV.

Of the ward of BRIDGE WITHOUT, the BOROUGH of SOUTHWARK, and the several parishes and remarkable buildings contained therein; with a list of the Lord-mayors of London, from Fitz-Alwyn to the present time.

Bridge-ward without, contains the whole Borough of Southwark, extending southward from London-bridge to Newington; to the southwest almost to Lambeth; and to the east to Rotherhithe. The principal streets are, the Borough, or High-street, Blackman-street, Long-lane, Kent-street, Tooley-street, or St. Olave's-street, and Bermondsey, corruptly, Barnaby-street.

This ward is at present only nominally governed by an alderman and three deputies, and has twenty wardmote inquest-men, sixteen constables, a steward and a bailiff.

The Borough of Southwark contains divers streets, ways and lanes; many of which are well built and inhabited by tradesmen and manufacturers of reputation and property. It consists of the parishes of St. Olave, St. Saviour, St. George, and St. Thomas; which, together with the adjacent parishes, compose that part of the district within the bill of mortality, situate south of the river Thames, in the hundreds of Kingston and Brixton, and county of Surrey; which is in length six miles, twenty-three poles, and two feet, viz. from Vauxhall-bridge to Stangate, one mile; to within three doors of the sign of the Earl of Warwick in Upper-ground-street, one mile; to four doors east of the Maze gateway in Tooley-street, one mile; to within nine doors of Blackman's-alley on Rotherhithe-wall, one mile; to within three doors of the Bull's-head in Brimstone-street, one mile; and from thence to the east end of Holding-street, one mile, twenty-three poles, and two feet.

The first mention we find of Southwark in history is in the year 1052, when earl Godwin arrived there with a powerful fleet, and having cast anchor till the return of tide, passed London-bridge without opposition, in order to engage the royal navy, which consisted of fifty ships of war, and then lay opposite to Westminster; but matters being accommodated between the king and earl Godwin, the latter returned, and repassed the bridge, which was then of wood.

Notwithstanding the river Thames separates this ward from the city of London, yet it does not deprive the inhabitants therein of their freedom, rights and privileges of that city. For, the Borough of Southwark falling totally into king Henry the VIII's hands by the dissolution of the religious houses, the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, purchased the said lordship and manor of Southwark from the crown, for the sum of 647l. 2s. 1d. By which purchase they obtained a grant of all wastes and estrays, treasure trove, traitors goods, &c.

In the year 1327, the citizens finding themselves greatly infested by felons, thieves, and disturbers of the peace, who escaped to and took shelter in Southwark, petitioned king Edward III. and his parliament, for a grant of jurisdiction over the said village of Southwark: and their petition appeared so just, that his majesty, with consent of his parliament, granted to the said citizens, for himself and his heirs the said village of Southwark, with the appurtenances, to have and to hold, to them, and their heirs and successors citizens of the said city, of the crown for ever, paying at the exchequer the farms due and accustomed.

In consequence of the beforementioned grant and purchase confirmed to the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London, a court was held about a month after before Sir Rowland Hill, knt. then Lord-mayor of London, and the aldermen of the same city, in Guildhall; and the said town or borough of Southwark was admitted into the Freedom of the city of London, and named the ward of Bridge without; and the said court of Lord-mayor and aldermen did then and there nominate and appoint Sir John Ayliffe, citizen and barber surgeon, the first alderman of the said ward of Bridge without, namely, of the borough of Southwark, to be numbered as one of the the aldermen of the said city; and to have the rule and government of the inhabitants of the said borough, admitted by that court into the freedom of the city of London.

Thus the borough of Southwark was made part of the city of London, though lying in the county of Surry, with a jurisdiction as ancient as the first of king Edward III. confirmed, strengthened, enlarged, and fully established by the late grant of king Edward VI. Nevertheless, we find that the magistracy of the city of London have adopted this ward only as a fine cure for the senior alderman for the time being; and neglected the more essential interest of the inhabitants of said ward; and the justices of the county of Surry have not failed to take the advantage of their indifference and neglect of their jurisdiction within the borough of Southwark, and now have so far encroached upon the chartered rights and privileges of the city of London, confirmed by parliament, as to contend with the citizens for their jurisdiction within the said borough; even so far as to take upon them, without interruption, to exercise the power of a justice of the peace within the said borough, and to appoint constables, to licence victuallers, and to exercise other powers, as justices of the peace for the county of Surry in the borough of Southwark, to the great inconvenience and hardship of the inhabitants, who are entitled to the freedom and privileges of the city of London; as may be more fully seen in the following abstract of the memorial of H. Williams, one of the constables of the said borough.

An abstract of a memorial presented to the right honourable the Lord-mayor, and as a petition to the court of common-council, to desire the aid of that court in support of the ancient rights of the Borough of Southwark.

Southwark, 14 Feb. 1761.

To the right honourable the Lord-mayor.

Your lordship being now entered on the high and important office, so honourably conferred on you by almost the unanimous suffrages of one of the fullest assemblies ever held on that occasion, it need not be said that it becomes your duty, as it is doubtless your intention to be the guardian and protector of all those ancient rights and privileges carefully handed down by their ancestors to the citizens of London.

It is with concern observed, that there should be so soon an occasion to trouble your lordship with recent instances, in which it is apprehended, these ancient rights have been invaded in the proclamation of his present majesty.

First, in that ancient franchise granted to the city of London in the borough of Southwark, which without enumerating former grants, was, by the great charter of confirmation, so lately as the 15th year of king Charles II. fully confirmed to the mayor, commonalty, and citizens of London.

By this grant, which has received a parliamentary sanction, the said corporation are invested with all manner of royal rights and prerogatives, in and over the town and borough of Southwark, in as full a manner, as if the same were in the king's hands. In particular, to have all manner of liberties, customs, treasures, waifs, estrays, escheats, fines and forfeitures, view of frankpledge, &c. Also to have all goods, chattels of traitors, felons, fugitives, &c. together with all manner of suits, personal actions, &c. and the execution of all writs, commands, attachments, warrants, &c. by their sheriffs and other officers. The serjeants at mace for the city to arrest for debt in the borough, in the same manner as they do in London.

The city magistrates to have the assay and assize of wine, bread, beer, victuals, and every thing set to sale, together with the punishment and correction of all persons dealing therein. Also to take and arrest all thieves, felons, and other criminals, found in the borough, and to commit them to Newgate, until delivered by due course of law.

The mayor, recorder, and aldermen, who are justices in London, are also constituted the justices for the borough, where they are to exercise the same jurisdiction as they do in London. And all and singular the inhabitants of the said borough to be under the magistracy and government of the mayor and officers of London, in the same manner as the inhabitants of the said city be. And lastly, the sheriff of Surry, and all others the king's officers and ministers, are expressly prohibited from any ways intermeddling in the said borough.

It is not intended to shew the impropriety, as well as inconvenience, that the constables and other inhabitants of this city franchise are under, by their being subject to two separate unconnected jurisdictions, each of which may assume to command their attendance at different places at the same time; nor yet to expatiate on the hardships of their being summoned to attend out of their borough, the commands of such, as they have at several quarter sessions held by your predecessors, been informed had no sort of authority over them.

The particular indignity offered to the city of London, now to be pointed out, is that whereas, when the present constables were sworn in, under the authority of the city of London, they had an assurance given them, that country-officers had no jurisdiction over them; nevertheless they were all summoned, under large penalties, the first of this month, to attend the county sheriff to proclaim the king through the borough-wick.

As there is a bailiff appointed by the city, under the Lord-mayors, for the government of the borough (which officer, who is now living, it is known, proclaimed his late majesty, it is submitted to your lordship's judgment) whether such officer was not the proper person to perform this duty, as well as he presides at the elections for members of parliament, or executes the other duties appertaining to that important office? For

by

by what legal power can an officer execute any part of his office in a place the law expressly declares he shall no ways intermeddle; or how can he assume an authority to summon, under great penalties, constables, or any inhabitants of such a place, not only to attend in, but to follow him, to their great trouble and expence, to a considerable distance from their habitations, if he is expressly prohibited from exercising any kind of jurisdiction over them?

It has been said, that supposing the city of London hath not hitherto exercised an exclusive jurisdiction in the borough, they cannot, for that reason, maintain such a power; even although it should appear that, by the original grants, they are invested therewith. This objection, it is presumed, is answered by that part of the city charter, which declares they shall lose no privilege for non use or even abuse. Lord Coke in his 4th institute, says, "There is a most beneficial statute made for the preservation of the liberties and franchises of the city of London, that they shall enjoy their whole liberties, with this clause, Licet non fuerent, vel abusi fuerent, and notwithstanding any statute to the contrary." On this principle Black-friars precinct was lately restored to the city freedom, which had, time immemorial, claimed and maintained that exemption.

Therefore, as there are many citizens that are inhabitants in the borough, who particularly think themselves injured by being subject to two separate jurisdictions, may it not be said, it becomes the city's duty, in support of the citizens rights, to fulfil the intentions of their charters, which so expressly prohibits the county sheriff from any ways intermeddling in this city franchise: more especially if it be a fact, that this officer has, on a legal trial, been proved to have no right to exercise any jurisdiction therein.

The following are part of the encroachments on the city jurisdiction, and the privileges of the inhabitants of the borough of Southwark, referred to in their petition.

1st. The licencing public houses by the county magistrates.

2d. Their acting as magistrates of the borough, and holding sessions in the town-hall.

3d. Their interfering in the government of the borough fair, granted by royal charter to the city of London.

4th. Their exercising jurisdiction over the borough constables, and taking upon them to swear them into that office a second time, and also swearing in constables by their own authority, upon deaths or removals.

5th. The sheriff of Surry exercising jurisdiction in the said borough, and summoning the constables and other inhabitants to attend (contrary to the royal charters) the respective sessions held by the county magistrates, at different parts of the county.

6th. The sheriff and marshal court officers arresting for debt in the borough.

7th. The compelling the inhabitants of the borough to contribute towards the county rate, to pay the county coroner, who is prohibited any jurisdiction in the borough, and to repair bridges, gaols, &c. all of which are upheld and repaired by the city of London.

8th. The quartering soldiers in the borough, which, as a franchise and one of the city wards, it is presumed ought to be exempted from that burden.

9th. The king's ministers and officers of the county of Surry, taking upon them the power of ordering and governing the borough militia, which, it is also presumed, ought to be solely subject to the Lord-mayor, as chief magistrate of this ancient city franchise.

We shall begin the survey of this ward or borough at the south end of London-bridge, and proceed eastward down Tooley, or St. Olave's-street; on the north side of which, and near the bridge, stands the parish church of

St. O L A V E.

Though the time when a church was first erected in this place cannot be discovered, yet it appears to be of considerable antiquity, since it is mentioned so early as the year 1281. However, part of the old church falling down in 1736, and the rest being in a ruinous condition, the parishioners applied to parliament for a power to rebuild it, which being granted, they were thereby enabled to raise the sum of 5000l. by a rate of 6d. in the pound, to be levied out of the rents of all lands and tenements within the parish; accordingly the church was taken down in the summer of the year 1737, and the present structure finished in 1739.

It consists of a plain body strengthened with rustic quoins at the corners; the door is well proportioned without ornament, and the windows are placed in three series; the lowest is upright, but considerably broad; those above them circular, and others on the roof are large and semi-circular. The tower consists of three stages, the uppermost of which is considerably diminished: in this is the clock, and in the stages below are large windows. The top of the tower is surrounded by a plain substantial balustrade, and the whole has an air of plainness and simplicity.

This church is a rectory in the gift of the crown; and the incumbent's profits are said to amount to about 400l. per annum.

The vestry is general; and here are five churchwardens, and eight overseers of the poor and collectors, who are called the parish officers; and nine constables, nine scavengers, and two surveyors of the highway, who are called ward officers.

The remarkable places in this parish are, the Borough compter, the Bridge-house, and the Anabaptist dipping-place; and another meeting house of the like denomination. A charity school for forty boys; another for sixty girls; and a free school founded by queen Elizabeth, who incorporated sixteen parishioners to be governors thereof. The lands and revenues with which this school is endowed, were purchased by the parish, and lie chiefly in Horsleydown, for the benefit of the parish. The first master has a salary of 60l. per annum, the second 40l. the writing-writing-master ditto, and the English master only 20l. per annum.

Opposite St. Olave's church formerly stood a spacious stone building, the city mansion of the prior of Lewes in Suffex; and contiguous to the Bridge-yard was situate a large house of stone and wood, the city residence of the abbot of St. Augustin's in Canterbury; which coming afterwards to Sir Anthony Sentlegar, the site thereof was converted into a quay, which, by an easy transition, is now called Sellenger's wharf.

On the east side of the Bridge-yard was situate the mansion of the abbot of Battle in Suffex, the name whereof is partly preserved in that of Battle-bridge; opposite to which, on the south, lay its fine and spacious garden, wherein was a maze, or labyrinth, the name whereof is still preserved in the streets, &c. built thereon.

Bridge-yard-house is a receptacle for timber, stone, and other materials for repairing London-bridge, and seems to have been established at the time that bridge was first built of timber, and endowed with considerable estates for that purpose. It stands upon a large spot of ground, and contains many extensive buildings for that use. In former times here were several granaries for wheat and divers sorts of grain for the service of the city; and ten ovens, and a large brewhouse, to supply the poor citizens with bread and beer in times of scarcity. Proceeding eastward we come to the parish of Horsley-down; a plot of ground so called, corruptly from Horse-down, it having been originally a grazing ground for horses. It is now, however, well covered with brick and wood buildings, erected into a parish, the church of which, as well as the parish is called

St. JOHN the EVANGELIST.

This church, like several others in the suburbs, owed its rise to the great increase of buildings and inhabitants, and is one of the fifty new churches ordered to be built by act of parliament. It was finished in 1732, and the district of Horsley-down being separated from St. Olave's, was by act of parliament constituted its parish. The sum of 3500l. was also granted by parliament to be laid out in lands, tenements, &c. in fee simple; and as a farther provision, the churchwardens were to pay the rector the additional sum of 60l. to be raised from the fees arising from burials.

The body of the church is enlightened by two ranges of windows, with a venetian in the center. The tower rises square, with a balustrade on the top; from whence rises a spire which is very properly diminished, and well wrought. It is situate near the lower end of Fair-street, and the parish being taken out of St. Olave's it is likewise in the gift of the crown.

The vestry is neither select nor general, all being admitted that rent 10l. per annum, or upwards. They have three churchwards, four overseers of the poor, four constables, four scavengers, two surveyors of the highways, one beadle, and eight watchmen.

About the middle of Tooley street, on the south side, is Barnaby or Bermondsey-street. This is a spacious street, and inhabited by reputable tradesmen, especially in the hat manufactory. At the south east extremity of this street stands the parish church of

St. MARY MAGDALEN, Bermondsey.

This church stands on the site of part of the religious foundation for monks that was suppressed by king Henry VIII. It was dedicated to Mary the sister of Lazarus, called Magdalen, from Magdala, the place of her birth or residence, and it was founded under the Saxon government, as appears in the survey made by William the Conqueror. It received the addition of Bermondsey from its situation in or near the royal manor called Bermond's-eye, corruptly Bermondsey; on which there stood a royal mansion in the reign of Henry VIII. the remains of which are still to be seen in the gateway that leads into a court at the south end of the church-yard. This was a priory or abbey, dedicated to St. Saviour, when refounded by Alwin Child, citizen of London, for Chiniac monks, in the year 1081. In 1094, William Rufus endowed it with the manor of Bermond's-eye, which was confirmed by Henry I. in 1127, who at the same time gave unto this priory the manor of Rotherhithe and Dulwich: and William Maminot gave them a moiety of the manor of Greenwich. In 1159 king Henry II. confirmed to them the donation of the church of Camberwell, and others. And king Henry III. granted these monks a market every Monday at their market of Charlton, in the county of Kent; and a fair on Trinity Sunday yearly. The manor of Bermond's-eye was an ancient demesne of the crown, and all the lands and tenements belonging to it, among which were Camberwell, Rotherhithe, the hide of Southwark, Dulwich, Waddon, and Reyham, with their appurtenances, and were impleadable in the court of this manor only, and not at the common law: though this house was no more than a call to the priory of Charity in France; and therefore accounted a priory alien till the year 1380, when Richard II. in consideration of two hundred marks paid into his exchequer, made it a denizen; when it was also made an abbey, and Attleborough became first abbot. This abbey was granted by king Henry VIII. to Sir Thomas Pope, who pulled down the church and built a large house upon its site, which afterwards became the possession and residence of the earls of Suffex, who were obliged to build a place for public worship, which was done in or near the place where the church now stands.

The present edifice was built in 1680, at the charge of the parish; and is a plain structure, 76 feet long, 61 feet broad, 30 feet high to the roof, and 87 feet to the top of the steeple. The walls are brick, covered with stucco, and the door-cases and arched windows are cased with stone. The advowson of this church is in lay hands; and the rectory is valued at 200l. per annum in lieu of tythes.

Here is an organ and eight bells; five gift sermons; twelve poor men and twelve poor women are clothed on the fifth of November, by the legacy of Mr. John Wright, or Wrig. There

There is a charity-school for fifty boys, and another for twenty girls, supported by voluntary subscriptions and collections at charity sermons; and on the south side of the Grange road is a free-school for fifty boys founded by Josias Bacon, esq;

This parish is governed by a general vestry; and has four churchwardens, four overseers and collectors for the poor, two constables, four headboroughs, two surveyors of the highways, four scavengers, and two ale-conners. It is divided into two precincts, viz. the Land-side and the Water-side.

In the Land-side are part of Barnaby-street, Sun-alley, Hedge-alley, part of Crucifix-lane, part of Five Foot-lane, Clare's-yard, May's-yard, Trotter-alley, Snow's-fields, Swan-alley, Black-boy-alley, Parker's-alley, White lion-yard, part of Long lane, south-west to Lord-mayor's stone, part of Kent-street, Grange-yard and road, and Court-yard.

In the Water-side are, part of Five Foot-lane, Dock-head, Mill-street, Hickman's-court and Folly, London-street, Water-lane, Jacob's street, Rotherhithe-wall, Neckinger-corner, Salisbury-lane and street, East-lane, part of West lane, Marigold-street, Cherry garden-street, Cross street, Bowling-green, Salisbury-down, and Blue-anchor-road.

Returning to London-bridge we proceed again from thence directly southward up the High-street or Borough, which consists of a flesh-market on the west side, and of hop-merchants and reputable tradesmen and inn-keepers on the east. On the former side are several passages that lead to a close, in which is situate the parish church of

St. SAVIOUR.

On the spot where this church is situate, anciently stood a priory of nuns, which was founded by one Mary, a virgin, the owner of a ferry over the river Thames, before the building of London-bridge. Some time after the priory was converted into a college of priests; but that establishment, as well as the former, proving of no long duration, it was in the year 1106 founded by two Norman knights, and the bishop of Winchester, for canons regular, and from its dedication to the Virgin Mary, and its situation, was called St. Mary Overie, that is, St. Mary over the river.

This edifice was destroyed by fire about the year 1207; but it being soon after rebuilt, Peter de Rupibus, bishop of Winchester, added to it a spacious chapel, which he dedicated to St. Mary Magdalen; and this being afterwards appointed for the use of the inhabitants, it at last became their parish church.

This monastery, together with its fine church (as it at present appears) which was rebuilt in the reigns of Richard II. and Henry IV. was, at the general suppression of religious houses, surrendered to Henry VIII. in the year 1539, when the revenues thereof amounted to 624l. 6s. 6d. per annum. Whereupon the inhabitants of the parishes of St. Mary Magdalen and St. Margaret, by the assistance of Stephen, bishop of Winchester, purchased of king Henry the stately conventual church; which parishes, in the year following, were united by act of parliament by the new appellation of St. Saviour's, and the churchwardens constitute a body politic and corporate. And the churches of St. Mary Magdalen and St. Margaret, being laid aside, this has ever since been used as the united parish church.

In the year 1611, king James I. for a valuable consideration, granted by letters patent to the churchwardens and parishioners, in free soccage, the rectory and parish church of St. Saviour, together with all the glebe lands, tythes, tenths, oblations, profits, &c. with all those that belonged to the rectories of St. Mary Magdalen and St. Margaret. In consideration of which the said churchwardens and parishioners are obliged to provide a fit house, for a grammar-school, and to keep a good master to teach the children of the parish, paying to the said master 20l. and to an usher 10l. per annum, and also, to provide two able chaplains to preach in the church, and to pay them 30l. per annum each. These conditions were performed till the year 1672, when the said sums were found insufficient to maintain the several officers aforesaid; wherefore their respective stipends were by act of parliament advanced, those of the chaplains to 100l. per annum each; and those of the school-masters to 30l. each. For the paying of which sums, and the repairs of the church, the churchwardens, &c. were empowered to raise upon the inhabitants, in lieu of tythes, the sum of 350l. per annum clear of reprises.

Both the construction and extent of this Gothic structure resemble a cathedral more than a parish church. The length is 260 feet, and that of the cross isle 109; the breadth of the body is 54 feet, and the height of the tower, including the pinnacles, is 150 feet. The construction of the windows, entrances, and every other part, is purely in the Gothic stile, except a modern door, which is neither Gothic nor agreeable to the rules of any other architecture. The tower, which is square, and well proportioned, is supported by massy pillars over the meeting of the middle and cross isles; it is crowned with battlements, and has a pinnacle at each corner.

In a chapel at the east end of the church is the monument of bishop Andrews, who was interred there; and in another part of the church is that of the bishop of Winchester; but the most remarkable monument is that of the family of the Austins, erected in the last century, and repaired, new painted, and gilt by the relations in 1706.

this first figure is a rock, upon which is written, Petra erat XTS. that is, the rock was Christ. Down this rock runs a stream of water; and out of it glides a serpent, his skin being stripped off by the rock, which is seen hanging on that part of his back that is not yet got through. At the foot of the rock there grows standing corn, on which is a label with these words, Si non moriatur, non reviviscit, that is, If it dieth not, it liveth not again. Underneath the corn is this motto. Nos sevit fovit, lavit, coget, renovabit, i. e. He hath sown, cherished, washed us, and shall gather us together, and renew us.

On

On the top of the rock stands an angel, holding a sickle in his left hand, and with his right pointing to the sun, which shines, and on its lower rays is a label, upon which is written Sol justiciæ, i. e. The sun of righteousness.

On the sides of the monument are scythes, flails, shepherds crooks, rakes, plows, harrows, and other instruments of husbandry hanging out of a death's head; and above them, Vos estis agricultura, i. e. You are God's husbandry.

On the outside of these a harvest man with wings is seated on each side, one with a fork behind him, and the other with a rake. They have straw hats, and lean their heads upon their hands, their elbows resting upon their knees, as if fatigued with labour, and under them are these words, Messores congregabunt, i. e. The reapers shall gather. Under all is a winnowing fan, upon which is stretched a sheet of parchment bearing a long inscription in Latin.

Though the name of this church has been changed from St. Mary Overies to that of St. Saviour, yet the former still prevails. It is a rectory in the gift of the parish, and the profits arising to the two chaplains are at this time laid to amount to above 300l. per annum.

This parish is divided into two liberties, viz. the Borough and the Clink. The officers for the Borough liberty are, six constables and five scavengers. Those for the Clink liberty are, six churchwardens, chose out of the vestry, which is select, eight overseers and collectors for the poor, three constables, three headboroughs, four scavengers and twenty-three inquest men.

The remarkable places and things are, the Town-hall on St. Margaret's-hill; the Clink prison; the dock; a good market; and the lord Montague's-house in Montague-close, where was also the lord Mounteagle's house, now, or late, part of the estate of—Overman. esq; In this close it is said Gunpowder-plot was discovered by the miscarriage of a letter, to one of which lords it was delivered by a mistake instead of delivering it to the other; for which happy discovery Montague close enjoyed several privileges, particularly one, viz. that whoever dwelled there was exempted from having any actions of debt, trespass, &c. served on them. But this privilege, as also those of other places, has been suppressed by act of parliament.

On the west of St. Saviour's church, fronting the river Thames, was situate Winchester-house, which was at first erected by William Gifford, bishop of that see, about the year 1107, for his city mansion and that of his successors; but this house having been long disused by the said bishops, it is now converted into warehouses and apartments for the poor.

Adjoining to Winchester-house, on the south, was situate that belonging to the bishop of Rochester, but when, or by whom erected, is unknown.

A little westward from these houses is the Bank-side, so denominated from its situation on the southern bank of the river Thames; which place was anciently very notorious for its being the seat of the stews or licensed bawdyhouses, wherein whores were publicly tolerated to act according to their vicious and depraved inclinations.

The first mention we find of these houses is in the reign of Henry II. A. D. 1162, when they were eighteen in number, under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Winchester; wherefore they were commonly called Winchester Geese; for whose regulation certain constitutions were published by the said bishop, which were confirmed by parliament; among which were the following, viz.

That no steward shall molest, or obstruct any single woman from having access to, and liberty to withdraw from his house at pleasure.

That no stew-keeper permit any woman to board in his house.

To take no more for a woman's apartment, than fourteen pence per week.

Not to keep open his doors on holidays.

Not to detain any single woman, that is willing to reform.

Not to receive any woman that is devoted to religion, nor any man's wife.

No woman to take money for lying with a man, unless it be for a whole night.

No man to be artfully deluded into a stew.

That the several stews be searched weekly, by the bailiff, constables, &c.

That no steward entertain any woman that has the perilous infirmity of burning, (the venereal distemper) nor to sell bread, flesh, ale, nor any other sort of provisions.

These and divers other orders were to be observed by the said stewholders, upon very severe penalties. And for securing all persons that were accused of crimes committed in this district, a prison was erected, denominated the Clink, which is still in being, and the place where the bishop of Winchester, by his steward and bailiff, holds pleas for debt, damages, &c.

These stews, or bawdy-houses, in the year 1381, were plundered by Wat Tyler; at which time it appears they were kept by Flemish bawds. see page 83. And in the year 1506, they were, by order of Henry VII. shut up; but, being reopened soon after, their number was reduced from eighteen to twelve. And in the year 1546 they were, by proclamation of Henry VIII. entirely suppressed.

Opposite the south side of St. Saviour's church, in the church-yard, is a free grammar school, founded at the charge of the parish, by patent granted by queen Elizabeth, constituting six governors, chosen out of the vestry. To this school belong two masters, the first of whom has 30l. and the second 20l. per annum.

In the same place, adjoining to this, is a free English school, founded by Dorothy Applebee, about the year 1681, for thirty poor boys of this parish, to be taught reading, writing, and arithmetic; for the maintenance of which she appropriated 20l. per annum out of an estate in Fishmonger-alley, by St. Margaret's-hill; to be under the inspection of the governors of the grammar school.

In Three-ton-alley is a free-school for fifty girls, that are taught and clothed by subscription.

In angel-court is a free-school for eighty boys of this parish, who are educated and cloathed; to which belongs a freehold estate, beside a voluntary subscription.

In Deadman's-place is an hospital or college for the poor of the parish, founded by Thomas Cure, esq; in the reign of queen Elizabeth. It consists of sixteen rooms for as many poor men and women, each of whom hath twenty-pence per week, besides 3l. 6s. 8d. given by his son, and Mrs. Applebee gave 3l. per annum for coals. This hospital is governed by one of the wardens, called the College Warden; and a chapel belongs to it, in which prayers are read twice a week by one of the old men belonging to the said hospital or college. There are also two more in the same college, founded by Henry Sprat. In the church-yard are two rooms for two poor people, founded by Mr. Henry Jackson in the year 1682, each of whom hath twenty-pence per week. Likewise two houses founded by Henry Young, esq; who endowed them with 5l. 4s. per annum, paid weekly.

This parish extends from Chequer-alley on the east side of the High-street or Borough, including the south side of that alley to Ax-and-bottle-yard, and takes in all the yards and alleys in that space of ground. It extends on the west side of the Borough or High-street from the Maidenhead-alley, southward to Bell-yard, and westward from Piper's-alley to the Falcon along the Thames side; from thence southward to Slut's-well, including the east side of Gravel-lane, along by the Black-ditch to Bell-yard, including all the streets, alleys, &c. in that compass.

At some distance from this, towards the west, is situate the parish of ### CHRIST CHURCH.

This church was founded by Mr. John Marshall, of the Borough, gent. in 1627, who endowed it with 60l. per annum, towards the maintenance of a minister. In 1670 it was made parochial, and a distinct parish from St. Saviour's, and a rectory by act of parliament.

The present church was built in or about the year 1737, at the expence of the parish, and is a regular well-constructed building, with a square tower. The patronage is at present in thirteen trustees, and the value is computed at 140l. per annum besides perquisites.

The vestry is free; and the parish offices are, seven auditors of accounts, two churchwardens, and two overseers and collectors. Besides which there are four constables, three headboroughs, and two scavengers.

There is in this parish a charity-school for thirty boys and twenty girls, maintained by subscription; a work-house for the poor; and a neat building situate about two hundred yards to the east of the church, founded by Charles Hopton, esq; about the year 1730, for twenty-six poor men, who have been housekeepers, and come to decay; each of whom has an upper and lower room, with ten pounds per annum paid monthly, and a chaldron of coals; and committed to the trust and management of the minister of the parish, two churchwardens, and ten other gentlemen.

This parish begins at the Falcon in Upper-ground-street, and extends westward to the Barge-house on the south side, and ten houses farther on the north side of that street, and takes in the buildings fronting the Thames from Hook's-hole, thirty-three houses westward: and Marigold-lane, Queen's-arms-court, Bull-alley, Hook's-hole, Guy of Warwick-alley, and Overbodies-bridge; and from the Barge-house, southward, in the Broad-wall, it extends to St. George's-fields, and from thence eastward through Melancholy-walk to Slut's-well, and from thence northward on the west side of Gravel-lane; all which part of St. Saviour's parish was called Paris-garden-liberty.

Returning again to the Borough we find, on the east side thereof, near the middle,

St. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL.

This is a very noble and extensive charity, founded for the reception of the necessitous sick and wounded.

With respect to the origin of this hospital, it is to be observed, that the priory of St. Mary Overies being destroyed by fire in the year 1207, the canons erected at a small distance an occasional edifice to answer the same purpose, till their monastery could be rebuilt; which being accomplished, Peter de Rupibus, bishop of Winchester, for the greater convenience of air and water, pulled it down in 1215, and erected it in a place where the prior of Bermondsey had two years before built an almonry, or alms-house for the reception of indigent children, and necessitous profelytes; and having dedicated the new structure to St. Thomas the Apostle, he endowed it with land to the value of 343l. per annum; from which time it was held of the abbot of Bermondsey, and an hospital has continued in the same place ever since.

In 1428 one of the abbots granted the foundation lands to Nicholas Buckland, the master of the hospital, and in that condition they remained, till at the dissolution of religious houses in the reign of Henry VIII. this fell with the rest.

In the year 1551 the Lord-mayor and citizens having purchased of king Edward VI. the manor of Southwark, with its appurtenances, for for the sum of 647l. 2s. 1d. a part whereof being this hospital, the city immediately repaired and enlarged it at the expence of about 1100l. and in November following receiving into it two hundred and sixty poor sick and helpless objects, the hospital still retained its ancient name, St. Thomas's; and in 1558 the king incorporated a society of persons for its government, in common with the two other great charities, Bridewell and Christ's-hospital.

Though this hospital escaped the fire of London in 1666, yet it destroyed a great part of its possessions; and two others which happened a few years after in Southwark, contributed to the distress. By these accidents the hospital of St. Thomas was almost reduced to ruin. The building was old, and wanted great repairs, and the funds funds that should have supported it were exhausted. But in the year 1699 the governors set on foot a voluntary subscription, which they opened by large donations from themselves and their friends, and the public followed the example. The building was begun upon a larger and more commodious plan, and erected at different times by the assistance of various benefactors, till it became entirely completed, and consists in the whole of three quadrangles or square courts.

Next the street is a handsome pair of large iron gates, with a door of the same work on each side for the convenience of foot passengers. These are fastened on the sides to a stone pier, on each of which is a statue representing one of the patients. These gates open into a very neat square court, encompassed on three sides with a colonade, surrounded with benches next the wall, for people to sit down. On the south under an empty niche is the following inscription :

This building on the south side of this court, containing three wards, was erected at the charge of Thomas Frederick, of London, esq; a worthy governor, and liberal benefactor to this hospital, Anno 1708.

Under the same kind of niche, on the opposite side, is this inscription :

This building on the north side of this court, containing three wards, was erected at the charge of Thomas Guy, esq; citizen and stationer of London, a worthy governor, and bountiful benefactor to this hospital, Anno 1707.

The center of the principal front, which is on the west side, facing the street, is of stone. On the top is a clock under a small circular pediment, and beneath that a niche with a statue of Edward VI. holding a sceptre in his right hand, and the charter in his left. A little lower, in niches on each side is a man with a crutch, and a sick woman ; and under them, in other niches, a man with a wooden leg, and a woman with her arm in a sling : over the niches are festoons, and between the last mentioned figures the king's arms in relief. Under which is the following inscription :

King Edward the sixth, of pious memory, in the year of our Lord 1552, founded and endowed this hospital of St. Thomas the apostle, together with the hospitals of Christ and Bridewell in London.

Underneath is a spacious passage down several steps into the second court, which is by far the most elegant. It has colonades like the former, except at the front of the chapel which is on the north side ; and is adorned with lofty pilasters of the Corinthian order, placed on high pedestals which rise from the ground, and on the top is a pediment, as there is also on the center of the west and east sides. And the fronts of the wards, above the piazzas are ornamented with handsome Ionic pilasters.

In the midst of this court is a good brass statue of king Edward VI. by Mr. Scheemakers, and behind him is placed upon a kind of small pedestal his crown laid upon a cushion. This statue is surrounded with iron rails, and stands upon a lofty stone pedestal, upon which is the following inscription in capitals :

This statue
Of king Edward the sixth,
A most excellent prince,
Of exemplary piety and wisdom
above his years;
The glory and ornament of his age;
and munificent founder of this hospital;
Was erected at the expence of Charles Joyce, Esquire, in the year MDCCXXXVII.

On the opposite face of the pedestal is the same inscription in Latin.

In the middle of the east side of this court is a spacious passage into the next, the structure above being supported by rows of columns. The buildings in the third court are older than the others, and are entirely surrounded with a colonade, above which they are adorned with a kind of long slender Ionic pilasters, with very small capitals. In the center is a stone statue of Robert Clayton, esq; dressed in his robes as Lord-mayor, surrounded with iron rails, upon the west side of the pedestal is his arms in relief, and on the south side the following inscription :

To Sir Robert Clayton, knt. born in Northamptonshire, citizen and Lord-mayor of London, president of this hospital, and vice-president of the new work-house, and a bountiful benefactor to it ; a just magistrate, and brave defender of the liberty and religion of his country. Who (besides many other instances of his charity to the poor) built the girls ward in Christ's hospital, gave first towards the rebuilding of this house 600l. and left by his last will 2300l. to the poor of it. This statue was erected in his life-time by the governors, An. Dom. MDCCI. as a monument of their esteem of so much worth ; and to preserve his memory after death, was by them beautified An. Dom. MDCCXIV.

By this noble charity many hundred thousand of the poor have since its foundation received relief ; and been cured of the various disorders to which human nature is subject ; and though the estates at first belonging to this foundation were ruined, yet by the liberal munificence of the citizens since that time, the annual disbursements have of late amounted to near 8000l. The house contains nineteen wards, and 474 beds, which are constantly occupied ; beside these they have a considerable number of out patients.

The number of governors in this and the other city hospitals, are unlimited, and therefore uncertain. They chuse their own officers and servants, both men and women : these are, a president, a treasurer, an hospitaller or chaplain, four physicians, three surgeons, an apothecary, a clerk, a steward, a matron, a brewer and butcher, a cook, a cook, assistant and servant, an assistant clerk in the compting-house, two porters, four beadles, nineteen sisters, nineteen nurses, nineteen watchwomen, a chapel clerk and sexton, and one watchman. On the north side of St. Thomas's behind this hospital, stands the parish church of

St. THOMAS.

This church was originally erected for the use of the hospital; but the number of houses and inhabitants having greatly increased in the precinct of that hospital, it was judged necessary to make the church parochial for the use of the inhabitants, and to erect a chapel in the hospital for the use of the patients. This church is therefore neither a rectory, vicarage, nor donative, but a sort of impropriation in the gift of the hospital, the governors chusing one out of two returned by the parishioners.

The church is a plain brick building enlightened by one series of large windows, and the corners strengthened and adorned with rustic, as is the corners of the tower. The principal door has a cornice supported by scrolls and a circular pediment, and the tower, instead of a balustrade, is crowned with a blocking course of the attic kind.

The government of this church is in a select vestry, which consists of sixteen persons, and the minister; and in two churchwardens, two overseers, two constables, and two scavengers. The minister receives 60*l.* per annum from the governors of the hospital in lieu of tythes.

Here are alms-houses for the poor, and a school, supported by private contributions, for the educating, cloathing, and putting apprentice thirty boys. And on the first of May the parishioners have a feast of love, at which the stewards collect money to put out the children of poor housekeepers to service, or to be apprentices.

Not far from St. Thomas's church stands

GUY'S HOSPITAL.

This hospital was founded by Mr. Thomas Guy, a citizen and bookseller of London, who, from a small beginning, amassed an immense fortune, by his industry and frugality; and more particularly by purchasing seamens tickets in the reign of queen Ann; and by his success in buying and selling South Sea stock in the year 1720. He was never married nor had any near relations; and therefore, towards the close of his life, considering how he should dispose of his wealth, he at length resolved to be the founder of the most extensive charity ever established by one man. He was seventy-six years of age when he took this resolution, and having no time to lose, immediately purchased of the president and governors of St. Thomas's hospital, a lease of a piece of ground opposite to that hospital, for the term of 999 years, at a ground rent of 30*l.* a year.

And as this was covered with small houses that were old and ill tenanted, he immediately gave the inhabitants notice of his intention, and when they had removed their effects, pulled down the buildings in the year 1721, and proceeding with great expedition, he caused the foundation of the intended hospital to be laid the following spring; and this vast of fabric was roofed before the death of the founder, which happened on the twenty-seventh of December 1724.

The only motive that induced Mr. Guy to erect this hospital in so low and close a situation, was his design of putting it under the management and direction of the governors of that of St. Thomas. But by the advice of his friends he altered his resolution: it was then, however, too late to think of chusing another situation, for the building was raised to the second story, but he rendered the place as agreeable as possible by its elevation above the neighbouring streets.

The charge of erecting and furnishing this hospital amounted to the sum of 18,793*l.* 16*s.* great part of which he expended in his life-time; and the sum he left to endow it amounted to 219,499*l.* both together amounting to 238,292*l.* 16*s.* a much larger sum than was ever before left in this kingdom by one single person to charitable uses.

The entrance into this building is by an elegant and noble iron gate, hung on very handsome piers, which open into a square; in the middle of which is a brazen statue of the founder in his livery gown, and well executed. In the front of the pedestal is this inscription:

THOMAS GUY SOLE FOUNDER OF THIS HOSPITAL
IN HIS LIFE-TIME. A. D. MDCCXXI.

On the west side of the pedestal is represented in basso relievo the parable of the Good Samaritan; on the south side is Mr. Guy's arms; and on that side facing the east is Our Saviour healing the impotent man.

The superstructure of this hospital has three floors besides the garrets, and the same construction runs through the whole building, which is so extensive as to contain twelve wards, in which are 435 beds; and the whole is advantageously disposed for the mutual accommodation of the sick, and of those who attend them.

Soon after Mr. Guy's decease, his executors, pursuant to his last will, applied to parliament to get themselves and fifty other gentlemen nominated by the founder, to be incorporated governors of the intended hospital; upon which all these gentlemen were constituted a body politic and corporate, by the name of the president, and governors of this hospital; they were to have perpetual succession and a common seal, with the power of possessing the real and personal estates of the late Thomas Guy, esq; for the purposes of the will, and to purchase in perpetuity, or for any term of years, any other estate whatsoever, not exceeding 12,000*l.* per annum.

This corporation was no sooner established by parliament, than the president and governors set heartily about the work, by finishing and furnishing the hospital, chusing their officers and servants, and taking in patients, whose number at first amounted to 402. For the more effectual preventing inferior servants preying upon poor patients, or their friends, they resolved to give them handsome salaries; which they stipulated as follow.

These officers and servants are chosen by the sixty governors, who have carried on this noble charity in such a manner as to restore ease and health to many thousands of their fellow-subjects. Besides which, the expence of the out-patients who receive medicines gratis, generally amount to about 1600l. per annum.

It may not be improper, before we conclude this article, to mention some other particulars relating to Mr. Guy, in order to do justice to the character of that great benefactor to the public, by which it will be seen the little foundation there is for the general opinion of his being remarkable for nothing more than his parsimony and avarice.

He was a patron of liberty and of the rights of his fellow-subjects, which, to his great honour, he strenuously asserted in several parliaments, whereof he was a member for the borough of Tamworth in Staffordshire, the place of his birth. To this town he was a general benefactor; and early in his life he not only contributed towards the relief of private families in distress, but erected an alms-house, with a library, in that borough, for the reception of fourteen poor men and women, to whom he allowed a certain pension during his life, and at his death he bequeathed the annual sum of 125l. towards their future support, and for putting out children apprentices, &c.

In the year 1701 Mr. Guy built and furnished, at his own expence, three wards on the north side of the outer court of St. Thomas's hospital, and gave to those wards 100l. a year, for eleven years immediately preceding the foundation of his hospital. Some time before his death he removed the frontispiece of St. Thomas's hospital, which stood over the gateway in the borough, and erected it in the place where it now stands, fronting the street: he also enlarged the gateway; rebuilt the two large houses on its sides, and erected the fine iron gate between them, all at the expence of 3000l. At his death, he left to his poor aged relations the sum of 870l. a year during their life; and among his younger relations, who were very numerous, and his executors, he left the sum of 75,589l. He left the governors of Christ's hospital, a perpetual annuity of 400l. for taking in four children annually, at the nomination of the governors; and bequeathed 1000l. for discharging poor prisoners within the city of London, and the counties of Middlesex and Surry, who could be released for the sum of 5l. by which sum, and the good management of his executors, there were above six hundred poor persons set at liberty, from the several prisons within the bills of mortality.

At the south extremity of the Borough or High-street, formerly stood a church dedicated to St. Margaret; on whose site is now erected a court of justice, which court-house stands on a small colonade that leads to a tavern, over which is the court-room where the steward for the city of London holds a court of record every Monday, for all debts, damages, and trespasses within his limits. On the front of this edifice is the statue of king Charles II. under which is the following inscription:

*Combustum anno 1670, re-aedificatum anno 1685
& 1686. Jacobo Smyth, Mil. & Roberto

Besides this court, there are also three court-leets held in the borough: for it contains three liberties or manors, viz. the Great liberty, the Guildable, and the King's manor, in which are chosen constables, ale-conners, &c. There are also court-leets kept at Bermondsey, Rotherhithe, and Lambeth.

Directly southward from this court runs a spacious, wide, and well inhabited street of substantial tradesmen and dealers, and inn-keepers, which is called St. Margaret's-hill, and extends as far as the south-west corner of St. George's church.

On the east side of this street is situate

THE MARSHALSEA PRISON.

This is a place of confinement for persons who have committed crimes at sea, as pirates, &c. and for debtors. In this prison is the Marshalsea court, the judges of which are, the lord steward of his majesty's household for the time being; the steward of the court, who must be a barrister at law; and a deputy steward. In all civil actions tried in this court, both the plaintiff and defendant must belong to his majesty's household. The persons confined here for crimes at sea, take their trials at the Old Bailey.

In the same prison is the Palace court, the jurisdiction of which extends twelve miles round the palace of Westminster, the city of London only excepted; and the debtors within any part of Westminster, and twelve miles round, may be taken to this prison for a debt of 40s. Actions for debt are tried in this court every Friday, and there there are the same judges, counsellors and attornies here as in the Marshalsea court; there are, besides the judges already mentioned, a prothonotary, a secondary, a deputy prothonotary; four counsellors, and six attornies. But in this court neither the plaintiff nor defendant must belong to his majesty's household.

The buildings of this prison are mean and ruinous; but the court-room is tolerably spacious and convenient.

How long this prison has been kept in Southwark cannot be ascertained; but that it is of considerable standing will appear from the following occurrence:

In the year 1377 the duke of Lancaster, lord-high admiral of the kingdom, having assembled the royal navy at London, a sailor belonging to the same happened to be killed by a gentleman; which was so highly resented by the sailors in general, that they commenced a prosecution against him for murder; but observing the partiality of the court in his favour, and that a pardon had been obtained to secure him in case of danger, these proceedings exasperated the prosecutors to such a degree, that they ran in a body to the Marshalsea prison; and breaking open the same, seized the prisoner, and murdered him upon the spot; after which they dragged his body to the gallows, hung it thereon, and by sound of trumpet returned to their respective ships in triumph. And in the year 1381 Wat Tyler, with his rebellious crew, broke open this prison, with several others, and released the prisoners.

At the south east angle of this street, on the same side stands the parish church of

St. G E O R G E.

Though we cannot trace the origin of this church, yet, that it is of great antiquity is manifest from its being given by Thomas Arderne to the abbot and monks of Bermondsey, in the year 1122. However, the late fabrick, being greatly decayed by age, the parishioners applied to parliament to have the same rebuilt; and having obtained an act for that purpose, the same was taken down, and the first stone of the present structure laid in the beginning of the year 1734, and the work being carried on with great expedition, the same was finished in the year 1736.

This church which is a rectory, is thus denominated from its dedication to St. George, the Cappadocian martyr; and the advowson thereof is in the gift of the crown. The profits arising to the incumbent amount to about 220l. per annum.

To this church there is an ascent by a flight of steps, defended by plain iron rails. The door case, which is Ionic has a circular pediment, ornamented with the heads of cherubims in clouds; and on each side of this pediment, which reaches to the height of the roof the front is adorned with a balustrade and vases. From this part the tower rises plain, strengthened with rustic quoins, as is the body of the building, and on the corners of the tower are again placed vases. From hence are raised a series of Ionic columns supporting the base of the spire, which has ribs on the angles, and openings in all the faces. The top is crowned with a ball from which rises the fane.

The vestry is select, and the parish officers are, three churchwardens, six constables, four tithemen, three surveyors of the highway, and four scavengers.

The remarkable places in this parish are, the King's bench prison, the Marshalsea, the county jail, a bridewell, or house of correction, and the Lock-hospital. A charity-school for fifty boys, maintained by subscription; a baptist meeting in White's-street; and an independent meeting in Bridewell-alley.

At the south east corner of Kent-street is situate

The L O C K H O S P I T A L.

This was anciently a house for the reception and cure of lepers; but at present it belongs to St. Bartholomew's-hospital, and is appropriated to the cure of venereal patients.

It is a small neat edifice; at the south end of which is a chapel, built about 120 years ago.

The street from St. George's church, southward, is called Blackman-street; at the south west corner of which there is a road, that runs through St. George's-fields to Westminster-bridge. At the north east corner of this road stands

The K I N G's B E N C H P R I S O N.

This is a place of confinement for debtors; and for those sentenced by the court of King's-bench to suffer imprisonment for libels and other misdemeanors; but those who can purchase the liberties have the benefit of walking through a part of the Borough, and in St. George's-fields.

This prison is situated in a fine air; but all prospect of the fields, even from the uppermost windows, is excluded by the height of the walls with which it is surrounded. It has a neat chapel for the performance of divine worship, and only one bed in each room; but these rooms are extremely small; they are all exactly alike, and none above nine feet in length. It is a new brick building, without which the marshal, who has the keeping of this jail, has very handsome apartments. Prisoners in any other jail may remove hither by Habeas Corpus.

On the south west of this road, near the turnpike, is a modern charity called

The A S Y L U M.

This charitable foundation was established in order to preserve poor friendless and deserted girls, under twelve years of age, from the miseries and dangers to which they would be exposed, and from the guilt of prostitution.

The evils this charity is intended to prevent, are not chimerical but founded on facts. It too often happens, that by the death of the father, a mother intitled to no relief from any parish, is left with several helpless children to be supplied from her industry; her resource for subsistence is usually to some low occupation, scarcely sufficient to afford bread and cloathing, and rarely the means of instruction. What then must become of the daughters of such parents, poor and illiterate as they are, and thereby exposed to every temptation? Necessity may make them prostitutes, even before their passion can have any share in their guilt. Among these unhappy objects, very agreeable features are frequently seen disguised amidst dirt and rags, and this still exposes them to greater hazards; for these are the girls which the vile procuress seeks after; she trepanns them to her brothel, even while they are yet children, and she cleans and dresses them up for prostitution. But what is still more dreadful, maternal duty and affection have been so thoroughly obliterated, that even mothers themselves have been the seducers; they have ensnared their children to the house of the procuress, and shared with her the infamous gain of initiating their daughters in lewdness: or if this has not been the case, they have too often been prevailed on, for a trifling consideration, to conceal and forgive the crime of the infamous bawd.

These and other considerations induced a number of noblemen and gentlemen, who had approved of a proposal from John Fielding, esq; one of the justices for the liberty of Westminster, to hold their first meeting on the tenth of May 1758, for carrying into execution a plan of this Asylum. Several other meetings were soon after held, in which the rules and orders for the reception and management of the children were established, and the lease of a house, lately the Hercules inn near Westminster-bridge, agreed for. This house was soon fitted up, and furnished, and the first children admitted on the fifth of July following.

The rules and orders established are as follow:

1. The qualification of a perpetual guardian is a benefaction of thirty guineas or upwards, at one payment.

2. That of an annual guardian is a subscription of three guineas or upwards per annum.

3. Ladies subscribing the said sums, will be considered as guardians of this charity, and have a right of voting at all general elections, by proxy, such proxy being a guardian, or they may send a letter to the board, naming therein the person they vote for, which shall be considered as their vote. It is esteemed by the guardians a benefit to the charity, for the ladies occasionally to visit the house, and inspect the management of the children; the matron being ordered to attend such ladies, and to give them all necessary information: and, whatever observations they may then make, or whatever hints, at other times, may occur to them, for the good of the charity, if they will be pleased to transmit them by letter to the secretary, or to the committee, who meet every Wednesday in the forenoon at the Asylum, they will be immediately taken into consideration, and have all respectful regard shewn to them.

4. Those gentlemen and ladies, who have already subscribed lesser sums than thirty guineas, by making up their subscriptions to that sum, within a year, will be entered in the subscription book as perpetual guardians.

5. There is to be an annual general meeting of the guardians on the second Wednesday in March.

6. A general quarterly meeting is to be held on the second Wednesday in July, the second Wednesday in January, the second Wednesday in April, and the second Wednesday in October, for auditing the accounts, and making laws and rules for the government of the charity and for other business.

7. A committee is appointed, to consist of thirty guardians, who are to meet every Wednesday at eleven o'clock in the forenoon at the Asylum, to transact the business of the charity; and they are from time to time, to report their proceedings to the following general court, and any three of the said gentlemen constitute a quorum. In these committees are a president, vice president and a treasurer.

8. The officers and servants of the house are a physician, two surgeons, an apothecary and a chaplain.

A secretary, who keeps the accounts of the hospital, and does all such other business as is commonly done by secretaries, clerks, and registers, at other charities.

A matron, who superintends the affairs of the house, takes care of the provisions and furniture, delivers an account of the current expences weekly to the secretary, to be laid before the committee. She is to see that the children are properly employed, that they are attentive to their learning, and that they behave with decency; that the teachers do their duty, and that they treat the children with humanity. The servants under her, are teachers of reading, knitting, sewing, &c. a cook, a house-maid, and a servant man.

9. The objects to be admitted are orphans, the daughters of necessitous parents, residing in parishes where they have no relief, and deserted girls within the bills of mortality, from eight to twelve years of age; but infirm children are not admitted, as the objects of this charity are to be constantly employed in every branch of good housewifery.

10. Each object applying for admission, must produce such certificate of her age and necessity, as shall be satisfactory to the guardians then present and in all cases, wherein, during the infancy, of this Asylum more objects shall apply for admission than the Asylum can at once receive, the names of the objects not admitted are entered in a book kept for that purpose, and a notice is sent to the persons, signifying the certificate of each child, of the first opportunity of taking in such children that shall happen afterwards; in filling up all which, the children, before refused, have the preference as they stand upon the entry: each of the above certificates must be signed by two substantial housekeepers, of the parish where the object resides.

11. The children are regularly and alternately employed in reading, knitting, sewing, and in the business of the kitchen, to which latter employment four are appointed weekly, to be with the cook, to assist her, and to receive from her the necessary necessary instructions in plain cookery, curing provisions, and other employments of the kitchen. They likewise make the beds, clean the rooms, assist in washing and ironing the linen, and in other household business, according to their respective ages and abilities, at the discretion of the matron.

12. The chaplain preaches on Sundays, and performs the other parts of divine service, and catechises the children. On the other days of the week prayers are also read by the matron or teacher; and some portion of scripture is read by those of the children who are best able. They have also each of them a common prayer book, and the new testament; and other good books are likewise provided for them.

By this noble charity a great number of unhappy children have not only been preserved from the brink of destruction, but have likewise become an happiness to their parents, and useful members to society.

In the north-west division of St. George's-fields is a new road cutting which is to lead from Black-friars bridge to Newington; near the north end of which, on the west side is, at this time, erecting a very handsome and extensive building, as a Magdalen house, for the reception of penitent prostitutes, who, as soon as it is finished, will be removed hither from their present situation in Precot-street, Goodmans-fields.

Proceeding southward from Blackman-street, we come to a village called Newington-Butts, where, near the turnpike, is another new road which communicates between Westminster-bridge and the county of Kent, through Deptford and Blackheath. This village extends from Blackman-street to Kennington-common, and was so called from the exercise of shooting at butts, much practised on this spot of ground in ancient days; or from being the patrimony of the family of Butts in Norfolk.

A little to the southward of the turnpike, on the south-west corner of Newington, stand

FISHMONGERS ALMSHOUSES.

These almshouses, which are very handsome buildings, were founded and erected at different times. The most ancient is St. Peter's hospital, a Gothic structure, built with brick and stone, with a brick wall before it, within which are two rows of tall trees, and behind the buildings a garden.

The entrance is by a pair of iron gates opening to the center of the building, which is lofty, but irregular. On the inside are two courts behind each other, in which is a hall with painted windows and a chapel. Inscriptions on the sides of these courts shew that they were built at different times.

To the south of this hospital is another founded by Mr. James Hulbert, a liveryman of the fishmongers company, in the year 1719, whose statue is erected upon a pedestal; and in the wall which extends before both, are iron rails to afford a view of this statue, the more modern hospital, erected by that gentleman, and the pleasant walks before it.

The fishmongers company erected St. Peter's hospital by virtue of letters patent granted by king James I. in the year 1618, for the reception of several of their poor members who had pensions bequeathed them by the wills of several members of the company: thirteen of whom were beadsmen and women of the company's great benefactor Sir Thomas Knesworth, who in 1513 left them 8d. per week each. Sir Thomas Hunt also in 1615 left 20l. 10s. per annum towards the support of six ancient poor men and women. In 1620 Richard Edmunds bequeathed an annual sum of 6l. towards the maintenance of two poor persons, which number of twenty-one pensioners, with one added by the company, were put into this hospital; and soon after Sir John Leman, Sir John Gayer, Mr. Harper, Arthur Mause and Mrs. Ann Bromsgrove, by their respective wills demised several sums to the amount of 28l. per annum.

Each of the twenty-two alms-people have two rooms, and an allowance of 3s. per week, 15s. at Christmas, and a chaldron of coals and a gown yearly. And one of the pensioners, who reads prayers twice a day in the chapel, has an additional allowance of 40s. per annum.

The more modern structure, as before mentioned, was founded by Mr. James Hulbert, citizen and fishmonger, for the accommodation of twenty poor men and women; who, besides two neat rooms to lie in, have each an allowance of 3s. per week, one chaldron of coals, a gown every year, and 15s. at Christmas.

Not far from these alms-houses, on the west side of the village, is situate the parish church of

St. MARY, NEWINGTON.

This church, which is dedicated to the Virgin Mary, is a rectory of very ancient foundation. It is one of the peculiars belonging to the archbishop of Canterbury, and is valued at 140l. per annum, in the gift of the bishop of Winchester.

The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, four sidemen, and four overseers and collectors. The peace officers are, four constables, four headboroughs, two surveyors of the highway, and two scavengers.

Here are eight alms-houses for the poor of the parish, and for eight of the Drapers company, founded by Mr. Waller.

On the west of Southwark, and near the south end of Westminster-bridge, is the village of Lambeth. This place takes its name from Lame-hithe, i. e. dirty-harbour. It is famous in story for the death of Canute, the valiant Danish king of England; and for many ages the residence of the archbishops of Canterbury, as it had been long before the seats of the bishops of Rochester.

The palace belonging to the archbishop of Canterbury was originally built by archbishop Baldwin in 1188, whose first intention was to raise a superb structure at Hackington, near this place; but the monks, with whom he was at variance, riante, obtained the pope's mandate against it; when, taking down what he had erected, he removed the best of the materials to Lambeth, with which he built the palace, a college and church, having before purchased the ground of the bishop and convent of Rochester, by a fair exchange.

In the year 2250 Boniface, archbishop of Canterbury, having, by his arrogance, rendered himself hateful to the citizens of London, retired, for the security of his person, to this palace; and finding it in a ruinous condition, within the space of three years rebuilt the whole north side, the archiepiscopal apartments, the library and cloysters, the guard chamber, the chapel, and Lollards tower.

From that time this palace became the residence of the greatest persons of the church, and was soon enlarged by many additional buildings: cardinal Pool built the gate, which, for that time, is a noble structure. The Lollards tower, which is thus named from a room in it prepared for the imprisonment of the followers of Wickliff, the British reformer, who were called Lollards, was finished by Chickely, and remains a lasting memorial of his cruelty, and antichristian spirit. It is a small room, twelve feet broad and nine long, planked with elm, and there still remain eight rings and staples, to which christians were chained, for presuming to differ in opinion from that prelate. The spacious hall was erected by Juxton, and the brick edifice between the gate and the hall was begun by archbishop Sancroft, and finished by Tennison.

From the present structure being thus erected at different periods, it is not at all surprizing that it has but little appearance of uniformity; but the edifice, though old, is in most parts strong; the corners are faced with rustic, and the top surrounded with battlements; but the principal parts are well proportioned and well enlightened. Some of the inner rooms are too close and confined; but there are many others open and pleasant in themselves, with the advantage of being convenient, and of affording very agreeable prospects: for as this palace is situated on the bank of the Thames, it admits of a fine view up and down the river, and, from the higher apartments, a prospect of the county each way.

In this palace is a library, which is capacious, and well stored with books; among which there are upwards of six hundred volumes of manuscripts. And at the south-east corner there are preserved several relicks of popish superstition, and a complete dress, viz. a vestment, alb, stole, maniple, &c. for a priest to say mass.

Adjoining to the south-west angle of this palace stands the parochial church of

St. MARY, LAMBETH.

On the death of Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, A. D. 1184, a contest arose between the suffragan bishops of that province and the monks of Canterbury, concerning their several pretensions to the right of electing their archbishop; on which occasion, the monks appealing to Rome, great interest was made in behalf of each party, till at length a mandate was obtained of the pope, wherein the bishops and monks were enjoined to unite in the election: pursuant to which, the time of chusing was appointed; but the refractory monks not appearing, the suffragans chose Baldwin, bishop of Worcester, for their metropolitan; which the monks highly resenting, strenuously exerted themselves to invalidate the election. But the king, who was a great favourer of Baldwin, being made acquainted with the demands and promises of the monks, prevailed upon him to renounce his election, and the electors to declare the same void. The monks having obtained what they wanted, proceeded to a new election, and, according to their previous declaration, re-elected Baldwin.

However, the king, willing to repress the insolence of the monks, endeavoured, by the following stratagem, to wrest from them the power electing their archbishop:

He commanded Baldwin, the archbishop, to build a college at Hackington, near Canterbury; for which he (the king) was to erect one prebend, and each of the suffragans of the province another, whereof, as founders, they were to have the perpetual patronage; which was done with a view to deprive the monks of the right of election, and to vest the same in the canons of the intended college. And the more easily to prevail upon the pope to come into this scheme, they proposed to dedicate the said college to Thomas Becket, the most celebrated saint of that time, and who was held in such veneration by the pope; that it was not in the least doubted, but he would readily transfer the right of election from the monks of Canterbury to the canons of Hackington.

The foundation being dug, and materials provided for the intended work, the part thereof allotted to the archbishop to erect, was the church and a certain other part of the building. The monks, apprehensive of the king's and the archbishop's design against them, applied to Rome for redress. In the mean time the work was carried on with such expedition, that the church being almost finished, it was consecrated, and divers secular priests instituted and installed therein. But the monks having succeeded in their application to Rome, obtained a mandate from the pope to dissolve the new corporation, and raze the edifice; which neither the king nor archbishop daring to oppose, the arbitrary order was executed accordingly.

Pope Urban the great protector of the monks, dying soon after, he was succeeded by Gregory the eighth, a great favourer of Baldwin, who was thereby encouraged to renew his design, but in another place; for which end having obtained of the bishop and convent of Rochester, a certain spot of ground at Lamhæe, Lamhithe, or Lambeth, (where the archiepiscopal palace is situate) he began to erect a church, and mansions for the canons, about the year 1188, which he lived not to finish. Wherefore Hubert, one of his successors, soon after endeavoured to accomplish the same; but the monks of Canterbury, to defeat his design, as they had done that of his predecessor Baldwin, applied to Rome for that purpose; when, after great solicitations on both sides, a composition was brought about, on the following terms; viz. That upon condition it were pulled down, Hubert might erect another upon a new foundation, and endow the same with an annual revenue of one hundred pounds, and place therein twenty canons. Pursuant to this agreement, the church was pulled down, and the foundation of a new one laid, where the present church is situate by Hubert, for canons regular; about the year 1200.

This antique structure, dedicated to St. Mary, is a very plain building. The tower is square, and both that and the body of the church are crowned with battlements. In the south east window of the middle isle there is a picture of a pedlar and his dog painted on glass, in memory of a pedlar who gave to this parish a piece of ground at Lambeth-wall, measuring an acre and nineteen poles, and called to this day Pedlar's-acre.

The vestry of this parish is general. The parish officers are, three churchwardens, three side-men and five overseers and collectors for the poor. The peace officers are, six constables, nine head-boroughs, twenty inquest, or leet jurymen, four surveyors of the highway, and two scavengers.

In this parish is an ancient royalty, in the conqueror's survey denominated Chenintuna, but at present Kennington, where anciently stood a royal mansion wherein the kings of England used frequently to reside; and whither John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, in the year 1377, fled to Richard prince of Wales, to avoid the fury of the Londoners, who threatened his life for an insult offered their bishop. A little northward from the palace ran Canure's trench, a canal, which had its influx to the river Thames, at the lower end of Chelsea reach, and through which it is said he carried his navy to the west side of London-bridge, to attack the city by water on that side.

The remarkable places in this parish are, Lambeth-wells, Vauxhall gardens, a plate glass-house, a bottle glass-house, and the south end of Westminster-bridge. Also a school for twenty poor children of the marsh and wall liberties, endowed with thirty-five pounds per annum; and archbishops Tenison's school for thirty boys and fourteen girls, endowed with sixty pounds per annum for the master. Here are also almshouses and a workhouse for the poor.

The parish of Lambeth is very extensive, and is divided into four liberties, and these subdivided into eight precincts, vizt. 1. The Bishop's. 2. The Prince's. 3. Vauxhall. 4. Kennington. 5. Marsh. 6. Wall. 7. Stockwell. 8. The Dean's. And the extent of the parish is as follows:

From the landing place northward and eastward, along the waterside to the Old Barge-house; and thence on to the corner of St. George's fields, and so on the westerly side of the ditch southward to near the Dog and Duck; and then cross the fields south eastward (leaving the ditch on the left hand) to Kennington; and thence southward to Kennington-common, (where it meets with Newington parish) to the cross digged there in the ground; and then south-westward cross the fields to the back of Newbury-gardens, where they mark in an oaken tree, and from thence pass southward thirty rods; and thence eastward to Camberwell town through a lane near Dulwich; and so westward to Delver; also Wood's-farm; and thence near two miles southerly to Vicar's-oak, at which oak meet the parishes of Lambeth northward, Camberwell eastward, Stretham south-westward, and Battersea south west by west. And from this oak they go west by northward to Norwood's-gate, and thence south-westward to Stretham-common, (to avoid a wood) and thence north-westward to the Windmill-house, and thence through a wood, west and by southward, to Coles-farm, which leaving to the north-eastward, they pass about south-south west to the road leading from London to Croydon; and, crossing the road, they go west by north to Blake-hall, and thence on the same point to Broom-hill, and so eastward about forty rods in the road, and thence turning due west, they go to the road that leads to Kennington, and easterly along that road to Nine-elms, and thence south-westward about thirty rods towards Battersea, and thence backward into the road, and through Vauxhall to the Thames, and so along the water side to the plying place at Lambeth: being in the whole a circumference of about sixteen miles and an half.

About three quarters of a mile southward from Lambeth-palace are situate

VAUXHALL GARDENS.

These gardens are large, well planted with lofty trees that afford a delightful shade, with wood-bines and underwoods, which furnish a safe asylum for the birds.

From the great gate through which you enter into the gardens, is a noble gravel walk, 900 feet in length, planted on each side with very lofty trees, which is terminated by a landscape of the country, a beautiful lawn of meadow ground, and a grand Gothic obelisk.

To the right of this walk, as you enter is the grove; in the middle of it is a magnificent orchestra, the dome of which is surmounted with a plume of feathers, the crest of the prince of Wales. In fine weather the musical entertainments are performed here. It has a very fine organ, with seats and desks for the musicians, and a vacancy at the front for the vocal performers. The seats or boxes round the orchestra are disposed to the best advantage for hearing the music.

In most of the pavilions are pictures, painted from the designs of Mr. Hayman and Mr. Hogarth, on subjects admirably adapted to the place. In the ground pavilion are four pictures of Hayman's own hand, from the historical plays of Shakespear, that are universally admired.

At some distance are several noble vistas of very tall trees, where the spaces between each are filled up with neat hedges; and on the inside are planted flowers and sweet smelling shrubs.

The pavilions continue in a sweep, which leads to a beautiful piazza, and a colonade, 500 feet in length, in the form of a semi-circle. This semi-circle leads to a sweep of pavilions that terminate in the great walk.

At

At one end of the cross gravel walk is a beautiful landscape painting of ruins and running water. At each end of another walk is a beautiful painting; one is a building, with a scaffold and a ladder before it; the other is a view in a Chinese garden.

There are also several statues, in particular one in marble, by Mr. Roubiliac, of the late Mr. Handel playing on a lyre in the character of Orpheus; and another of Milton, erected on a rock, almost surrounded with bushes, in a sweet lawn adjoining to the garden, as if listening to music arising from the ground.

In cold or rainy weather the musical performance is in a rotunda, in which is an orchestra, with an organ. This rotunda is seventy feet in diameter.

In the center hangs a magnificent chandelier, eleven feet in diameter, containing seventy-two lamps in three rows.

In the roof, which is arched and elliptic, are two little cupolas, in a peculiar taste, each cupola is adorned with paintings; Apollo, Pan, and the muses are in one; and Neptune, with the sea nymphs in the other.

Adjoining to the walls are ten three quarter columns.

Between these columns are four paintings, by Hayman; the first represents the surrender of Montreal, in Canada to the British army commanded by general Amherst. On a commemorating stone, at one corner of the piece, is this inscription: "Power exerted, Conquest obtained, Mercy shewn! 1760."

The second represents Britannia holding in her hand a medallion of his present majesty, and sitting on the right hand of Neptune in his chariot drawn by sea horses, who seem to partake in the triumph for the defeat of the French fleet (represented on the back ground) by Sir Edward Hawke, November 10, 1759. The third represents lord Clive receiving the homage of the Nabob; and the fourth, Britannia distributing laurels to lord Granby, lord Albemarle, lord Townshend, and the colonels Monckton, Coote, &c.

The concert is opened with instrumental music, at six o'clock, which having continued about half an hour, the company are entertained with a song; and in this manner several other songs are performed, with sonatas or concertos between each, till the close of the entertainment, which is generally about ten o'clock.

A curious piece of machinery is exhibited about nine o'clock, (notice whereof is given by ringing a bell) in a hollow, on the inside of one of the hedges near the entrance into the vistas: by removing a curtain, is shewn a very fine landscape, illuminated by concealed lights, in which the principal objects that strike the eyes are the cascade or water-fall, and a miller's-house. The exact appearance of water is seen flowing down a declivity, and turning the wheel of the mill; it rises up in a foam at the bottom, and then glides away.

After day-light is closed, the garden near the orchestra is illuminated, almost in an instant, with about 1500 glass lamps; which, by their glittering among the trees, render it exceeding light and brilliant. And every thing is provided in the most elegant manner for the entertainment of those who chuse to sup in the garden.

Returning from Lambeth to Newington, we find, as before mentioned, the road which leads from Westminster-bridge to the two great villages of Deptford and Greenwich, situate on the east of this great metropolis, in the county of Kent.

Deptford, which consists of two large parishes well inhabited, was anciently called West Greenwich, is said to have received its present name from there have been a deep ford over the little river Ravensbourn, near its influx into the Thames, where it has now a bridge. It is a large and populous town, and is divided into Upper and Lower Deptford, which contain together two churches, several meeting houses, and about one thousand nine hundred houses. It is most remarkable for its noble dock, where the royal navy was formerly built and repaired, till it was found more convenient to build the larger ships at Woolwich, and other places, where there is a greater depth of water; but notwithstanding this the yard is enlarged to more than double its former dimensions, and a great number of hands are constantly employed. It has a wet deck of two acres for ships, and another of an acre and a half, with vast quantities of timber and other stores, and extensive buildings, as storehouses, and offices, for the use of the place, besides dwelling-houses for those officers who are obliged to live upon the spot, in order to superintend the works. Here the royal yachts are generally kept, and near the dock is the seat of Sir John Evelyn, called Say's-court, where Peter the Great, Czar of Muscovy, resided for some time, and in this yard completed his knowledge and skill in the practical part of naval architecture.

In this town are two hospitals, one of which was incorporated by king Henry VIII. in the form of a college, for the use of seamen, and is commonly called Trinity house of Deptford Strond; this contains twenty-one houses, and is situate near the church. The other called Trinity hospital, has thirty-eight houses fronting the street, and is a very handsome edifice, with large gardens belonging to it. Though this last is the finest structure, yet the other has the preference, on account of its antiquity; and as the brethren of the Trinity hold their corporation by that house, they are obliged at certain times, to meet there for business (as has been already mentioned) Both these houses are for decayed pilots or masters of ships, or their widows, the men being allowed 20s. and the women 16s. per month.

Greenwich is a very pleasant village, and has been the birth place of several of our monarchs, particularly queen Mary and queen Elizabeth; and here king Edward VI. died. The palace was first erected by Humphry duke of Gloucester, who named it Placentia. After which it was enlarged by Henry VII. and completed by Henry VIII. but being suffered to run to ruin, was pulled down by king Charles II. who began another magnificent edifice and lived to see the first wing finished. He also enlarged the park, walled it round, planted it, and caused a royal observatory to be erected on the top of the steep of the hill. This edifice his majesty erected for the use of the celebrated Mr. Flamsteed, and it still retains the name of that great astronomer, he likewise furnished it with mathematical instruments for astronomical observations, and a deep dry well for observing the stars in the day time.

That which is properly the palace here, is an edifice of no great extent, and it is now converted into apartments for the governor of the Royal hospital, and the ranger of the park. This park is well stocked with deer, and affords a noble and delightful view of the fine hospital, the river Thames, and the city of London.

Greenwich is said to contain 1350 houses. Its parish church, which was rebuilt by the commissioners for erecting the fifty new churches, is a very handsome structure, dedicated to St. Alphege, archbishop of Canterbury, who is said to have been slain by the Danes in the year 1012, on the spot where the church now stands. There is a college at the end of the town, fronting the Thames, for the maintenance of twenty decayed old housekeepers, twelve out of Greenwich, and eight who are to be alternately chosen from Snettisham and Castle-Rising in Norfolk. This is called the duke of Norfolk's college, though it was founded and endowed, in 1613, by Henry earl of Northampton, the duke of Norfolk's brother, and by him committed to the care of the Mercers company. To this college belongs a chapel, in which the earl's body is laid, which, as well as his monument, was removed hither some years ago, from the chapel of Dover castle. The pensioners, besides meat, drink, and lodging, are allowed 1s. 6d. a week, with a gown every year, linen once in two years, and hats once in four years.

In the year 1560 Mr. Lambard, author of the perambulation of Kent, also built and founded an hospital called queen Elizabeth's college, said to be the first erected by an English protestant. There are likewise two charity schools in this parish, one founded by Sir William Boreman, knight, for twenty boys, who are clothed, boarded, and educated; they wear green coats and caps: and the other by Mr. John Roan, who left his estate for teaching also twenty boys reading, writing, and arithmetic, and allowing two pounds per annum for each boy's cloaths. These wear grey coats.

The river Thames is here very broad, and the channel deep; and at some very high tides the water is salt, though it is usually sweet and fresh.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

This building stands on the spot, where once was situate the palace of several of our kings. The first wing of this noble and superb edifice, erected by king Charles II. was designed to be applied to the same use. Indeed from the magnificence of the structure, it can scarcely be taken for any thing less than the palace of a great monarch. However, king William III. being very desirous of promoting the trade, navigation, and naval strength of this kingdom, by inviting great numbers of his subjects to betake themselves to the sea, gave this noble palace, and several other edifices, with a considerable spot of ground, for the use of those English seamen and their children, who by age, wounds, or other accidents, should be disabled from farther service at sea, and for the widows and children of such as were slain in fighting at sea, against the enemies of their country. king William also by his letters patent, in 1694, appointed commissioners for the better carrying on his pious intentions, and therein desired the assistance of his good subjects, as the necessity of his affairs did not permit him to advance so considerable a sum towards this work, as he desired. In conformity to this request, many benefactions were made to both in that and the succeeding reigns, to this noble charity, which, according to the tables hung up at the entrance of the hall, amount to 58,209l. and afterwards the estate of the earl of Derwentwater, who bore a principal part in the rebellion in 1715, amounting to 6000l. per annum, was given by parliament to this hospital. The first range, had cost king Charles II. 36,000l. and another was ordered to be built on the same model: this has been compleated with equal magnificence, and the whole structure entirely finished.

The front to the Thames consists of these two ranges of stone buildings, with the governor's house, at the back part, in the center, behind which the park, well planted with trees, rises with a noble ascent. These buildings between which is a large area, perfectly correspond with each other, and each range is terminated with a very noble dome.

In each front to the Thames, two ranges of coupled Corinthian columns finely wrought, support their pediments, and the same order is continued in pilasters along the building. The projection of the entablatures gives an agreeable diversity of light and shade. In the center of each part, between these ranges of Corinthian columns, is the door, which is of the Doric order, and adorned above with a tablet and pediment. Within the height of these lofty columns are two series of windows, enlightening two floors. The undermost, which are the smallest, have rustic cases crowned with pediments; while the upper series, which are larger, and more lofty, are adorned with the orders, and with upright pointed pediments. Over these is an attic story; the entablature of the Corinthian columns and pilasters supports a regular attic course: the pilasters of this order rising over every column, and pilasters of the Corinthian below, between which the windows are regularly disposed, and the top is crowned with a handsome balustrade.

The buildings, which are continued from these, and face the area, correspond with them, though in a finer, and more elegant manner. In the center of both is a range of columns supporting a pediment, and at each corner a range of Corinthian pilasters. The front is rusticated, and there are two series of windows. The domes at the end, which are 120 feet high, are supported on coupled columns, as are the porticos below; and and under one of these is the chapel, which is adorned on the inside with the greatest elegance and beauty.

On the sides of the gate which opens to these buildings, from the park are placed a large celestial and terrestrial globe, in which the stars are gilt; and in the center of the area, is fixed on a pedestal, a statue of his majesty king George II.

The hall of this hospital is finely painted by Sir James Thornhill, particularly the ceiling and upper end; on the latter are represented in an alcove, the late princess Sophia, king George I. king George II. queen Caroline, the queen dowager of Prussia, Frederic prince of Wales, the duke of Cumberland, and the five princesses, the daughters of his late majesty. On the ceiling over the alcove are her majesty queen Anne and prince George of Denmark: and on the ceiling of the hall are king William and queen Mary, with several fine emblematical figures. All strangers who see this hall pay three-pence each, and this income is applied to the support of the mathematical school, for the sons of sailors.

For the better support of this hospital every seaman in the royal navy and in the service of the merchants pays 6d. a month. This is stopped out of the pay of all sailors, and delivered in at the Six-penny Receiver's office on Tower-hill. And therefore a seaman who can produce an authentic certificate of his being disabled, and rendered unfit for the sea service, by defending any ship belonging to his majesty's British subjects, or in taking any ship from the enemy, may be admitted into this hospital, and receive the same benefit from it, as if he had been in his majesty's immediate service.

There are at present near two thousand old or disabled seamen, and an hundred boys, the sons of seamen, instructed in navigation, and bred up for the service of the royal navy: but there are no out-pensioners, as at Chelsea. Each of the mariners has a weekly allowance of seven loaves, weighing sixteen ounces each; three pounds of beef; two of mutton; a pint of pease; a pound and a quarter of cheese; two ounces of butter; fourteen quarts of beer, and one shilling a week tobacco money; the tobacco money of the boat-swains is two shillings and sixpence a week each; that of their mates one shilling and sixpence, and that of the other officers in proportion to their rank. Besides which each common pensioner receives once in two years, a suit of blue cloaths, a hat, three pair of stockings, two pair of shoes, five neckcloths, three shirts, and two night caps.

This hospital has about one hundred governors, composed of the nobility, great officers of state, and persons in high posts under the king. The principal officers of the house, with their annual salaries, are,

Before we quit the survey on the south side of the Thames, it will be necessary to take in the parish of Rotherhithe.

This parish, which is commonly called Rederiff, was anciently a village on the south-east of London, on the south bank of the Thames; but is now joined by buildings to Southwark. It extends east to Wells's-dock, and to West-lane in the west, including the west side of that lane.

Such parts of this parish as are next the river are well inhabited by masters of ships, sea-faring people and tradesmen, depending upon navigation. And though that part between King-street and Princes-street was some time ago destroyed by fire, as related in this history, yet the ground is covered with very handsome and substantial buildings.

A little way to the east of Princes-street, and near the Thames side, stands the parish church of #### St. MARY, Rotherhithe.

This church is distinguished from others dedicated to the Virgin Mary, by the name of the place in which it is situated. The old church had stood above two hundred years, when, in 1736, it was in so ruinous a condition that the inhabitants applied to parliament for leave to pull it down, which being granted, the present structure was finished in 1739.

This edifice is built with brick and ornamented with stone. It is enlightened by a double range of windows, and the corners both in the tower and body are strengthened with a handsome rustic. The tower consists of two stages: in the lower are a door and window; in the upper a window and dial; and the whole is terminated by a balustrade, from which rises a circular base that supports a kind of lanthorn, very elegantly constructed with Corinthian columns; over these are urns with flames; and from the roof of this lanthorn rises a well-constructed spire terminated by a ball and fane.

This church is a rectory in the gift of a lay patron. The profits arising to the incumbent are said to amount to near two hundred pounds per annum.

Here is a gift sermon every Thursday before the second Sunday in the month, for which the rector receives ten pounds. The vestry is general. The parish officers are, two churchwardens, two side-men, and four overseers and collectors for the poor. The peace officers are, one constable, six headboroughs, two scavengers, and two surveyors of the highway.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Containing the history, antiquities, and government of Westminster, the dutchy of Lancaster, and places adjacent; with the description of the several parishes and other remarkable things within the city and liberty thereof.

WESTMINSTER, which is the third division of this great metropolis, receives its name from its abbey or minster situated to the westward of the city of London; and, according to several historians, was thus denominated to distinguish it from the abbey of Grace on Tower-hill, called Eastminster. A late writer, however, proves this to be a mistake, by shewing that the former is called Westminster in a charter of sanctuary granted by Edward the Confessor in the year 1066, and that the latter was not founded till 1359; he, therefore, supposes that the appellation of Westminster was given to distinguish it from St. Paul's church in the city of London.

This part of the metropolis, in ancient times, was a mean, unhealthy place, with nothing worthy of notice but its minster or abbey, situated in a marshy island, surrounded on one side by the Thames, and on the other by what is called Long-ditch; a branch of the river which began near the east end of the place, where Manchester-court is now situated, intersected King-street, and running along where Gardener's-lane now is, to the place called from thence Long-ditch, crossed Tothill-street, a little to the west of the Gate-house, and continued its course along the south wall of the abbey garden, over which is erected a common sewer. The island thus formed was in a manner a waste overgrown with thorns and briars, and was thence called Thorny island. In this situation was the abbey, minster, or monastery founded; for the convenience of which a few houses were probably first erected, and these at length grew into a small town, in ancient books called the town of Westminster.

For many ages Westminster was entirely detached from London, and there was a very considerable space between them. The Strand was the road which led from London to that town, and it was open on either side to the Thames and to the fields. In 1385 we find that this road was paved as far as the Savoy; and many years after Sir Robert Cecil building a house at Ivy-bridge, his interest brought the pavement of the road to be extended thither; and many of the houses of the nobility were built in the Strand.

Westminster owed its most distinguished privileges to Henry VIII. for in the 37th year of his reign an act was passed to authorize him by either letters patent or proclamation, to make it an honour, a title of distinction which he was empowered by the same act to confer upon Kingston upon Hull, St. Olyth's in Essex, and Donnington in Berkshire; and after the dissolution of the monastery, he converted it into a bishopric, in the year 1541, with a dean and twelve prebendaries, and appointed the whole county of Middlesex, except Fulham, which was still to belong to the bishopric of London, as its diocese.

Many years before this Westminster had been the seat of the royal palace, the high court of parliament, and of our law tribunals. His majesty built the palace of St. James's, and purchased Whitehall for his own residence; the old palace near the abbey being destroyed by fire. He also inclosed a fine spot of ground for a park between the two palaces. And from this time Westminster increased greatly with buildings on every side. This bishopric was soon dissolved, in 1550, by king Edward VI. and thereby the title of city, which had been obtained by the above honour, was lost; though, through courtesy, people still give it that honourable name.

At present the city of Westminster consists but of two parishes, St. Margaret's and St. John the Evangelist; but the liberties contain seven parishes, which are as follow: St. Martin in the fields, St. James's, St. Anne's, St. Paul's Covent Garden, St. Mary le Strand, St. Clement's Danes, St. George's, Hanover-square, and the precinct of the Savoy.

The government both of the city and liberties, is under the jurisdiction of the dean and chapter of Westminster, in civil as well as ecclesiastical affairs, and their authority also extends to the precinct of St. Martin's-le-Grand, by Newgate-street, and in some towns of Essex, that are exempted from the jurisdiction of the bishop of London, and the archbishopric of Canterbury; but the management of the civil part has ever since the reformation been in the hands of laymen, elected from time to time, and confirmed by the dean and chapter.

The principal of these magistrates is the high steward, who is usually one of the prime nobility. This great officer is chosen by the dean and chapter, and he holds his post during life; but upon his death or resignation, a chapter is called for the election of another, in which the dean sits as high steward, till the election is finished.

The next magistrate is the deputy-steward, who is chosen by the high-steward, and confirmed by the dean and chapter. This officer, who likewise holds his post during life, supplies the place of a sheriff; for he keeps the court leet with the other magistrates, and is always chairman at the quarter sessions.

The next in rank is the high bailiff, who is nominated by the dean, and confirmed by the high high steward. He also holds his office for life, and has the chief management in the election of members of parliament for Westminster, and all the other bailiffs are subordinate to him. He summons juries, and in the court-leet sits next to the deputy steward. To him belong all fines, forfeitures and strays, which renders his place very beneficial; but it is commonly executed by a deputy.

Besides these, there are also sixteen burgesses and their assistants, whose office in all respects resembles that of the aldermen's deputies of the city of London, each having his proper ward under his jurisdiction; and out of these are elected two head burgesses, one for the city, and the other for the liberties, who take place in the court-leet next to the head bailiff.

There is also a high constable, who is chosen by the court-leet, and has all the other constables under his direction.

Thus the government of Westminster has but little resemblance to that of an opulent and noble city; it being much more like that of a little country borough, since its representatives are chosen by the householders; and it has not the power of making freemen; has no trading companies; nor any other courts, besides those of the leet, the sessions, and a court of requests lately erected.

Exclusive of these officers there are in Westminster and its liberties fifty-two inquest-men, twelve surveyors of the highways, fifty-five constables, thirty-one beadle, two hundred and thirty-six watchmen, and eighty scavengers, who pay to the rakers for cleaning the streets upwards of 4000*l.* per annum.

We shall begin the survey of this part of the metropolis at Temple-bar; on the outside of which we enter the dutchy of Lancaster liberty. This part extends on the south side of the Strand to the east side of Cecil-street, reaches down this street to the Thames, and thence to Essex buildings, and takes in all the houses to Temple-bar. On the north side it extends from Temple-bar to where the Maypole stood (now situated the New Church) and extending down Holywell-street, behind St. Clement's, passes by Butcher-row, taking in all the range of buildings. Beyond the place of the Maypole this liberty begins again, near the Fountain-tavern in Catharine-street, and reaches from thence into the Strand, as far as Exeter-change; then turning up Burleigh-street, it runs up within four houses of the corner of Essex-street, and crossing it, proceeds into Catharine-street, by the Fountain tavern:

The first public building within this district, which is situated on the north side of the Strand, is the parish church of

St. CLEMENT DANES.

This church is dedicated to St. Clement, a disciple of St. Peter the apostle; and it receives the addition of Danes from its having been originally a burial-place for the people of that nation. A church has been situated on the same spot ever since the year 700. The present edifice began to be erected under the direction of Sir Christopher Wren in 1680, and was completed in two years after, though the steeple was not raised till the year 1719.

The body of the church, which is of stone, has two series of windows, the lower plain and the upper well ornamented, and the termination is by an attic, whose pilasters are crowned with vases. On the south side it is entered by a portico, to which there is an ascent of a few steps; the portico is covered with a dome supported by Ionic columns. Opposite to this there is another, and on each side the base of the steeple in the west front is a small square tower with its dome. The steeple is carried to a great height in several stages: where it begins to diminish the Ionic order takes place, and upon its entablature supports vases. The next stage is Corinthian, and above that stands the Composite supporting a dome which is crowned with a smaller one, from whence rises the ball and its fane.

This church is a rectory, said to be worth 600*l.* per annum, in the gift of the earl of Exeter and his heirs. The vestry is select; and the officers are six burgesses and their deputies, two churchwardens, five overseers, of which four are collectors for the poor, two surveyors for regulating the pavements of the streets, eight constables, eight scavengers, four surveyors of the highway, twenty-four jurymen of the dutchy liberty, four ale-conners, and four flesh tasters.

This parish is divided into two liberties, viz. the upper and the lower. The upper, which is in the liberty of Westminster, contains four wards, Temple-bar ward, Sheer lane ward, Drury-lane ward, and Holywell ward. The lower liberty is in the dutchy of Savoy, and contains also four wards, viz. Royal ward, Church ward, Middle ward, and Savoy ward.

In the upper church-yard are three schools; one for seventy boys, who are taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, by the master, who is allowed 40*l.* per annum, and coals and candles. The boys are also instructed in the mathematics, and are taught to sing by masters who are paid for teaching them. In the second school are forty girls, under a mistress, who teaches them to read, sew, knit, &c. and she has 20*l.* per annum, besides coals and candles: these girls have also a singing master to teach them, and both boys and girls are clothed in blue. The third school is the horn book school, where thirty children are taught by a mistress appointed for that purpose.

Here are also six alms-houses, with six rooms, and twelve poor women in each house, who are allowed 2*s.* per week. And in the lower church-yard are five rooms for poor women, each of whom has 2*s.* 6*d.* per week.

The remarkable places in this parish are, Clement's-Inn, New-Inn, and Lyon's-Inn, the Hackney-coach office, and the society for encouraging arts and manufactures.

CLEMENT'S INN.

This inn received its name from its situation in the neighbourhood of St. Clement's church; it belongs to the Inner Temple, and consists of a hall and three courts, where the students of the law have had lodgings ever since the year 1478.

NEW INN.

This was so called in contradistinction to an old inn which belonged to this society in Sea-coal-lane, near Fleet-ditch. It is situated in Wych-street, and joins to Clement's-inn. It is spacious and airy, consisting only of one well-built court, with a handsome hall and small garden. This inn belongs to the Middle Temple, and is governed by a treasurer, and twelve ancients.

LYON'S INN.

This is opposite to New-inn, and is said to have been in possession of the students and practitioners of the law ever since the year 1420. It belongs to the Inner Temple.

At the north-east corner of New-inn is a passage which leads into

CLARE MARKET.

This is so called from the family of Clare, dukes of Newcastle, who were the original proprietors thereof. It is an excellent market for butcher's meat, poultry, fish, and all sorts of garden stuff.

HACKNEY-COACH-OFFICE.

This office, which is kept on the west side of Surry-street in the Strand, was erected by act of parliament in the year 1696, for licensing hackney coaches and chairs, and to put them under the government of five commissioners, who have each a salary of 150*l.* per annum. The number of coaches is limited to eight hundred; out of which two hundred are to ply every Sunday in their turn, on the forfeiture of 5*l.* for every coachman who plies out of his turn.

For the better government of these coaches and chairs, and preventing the drivers and owners imposing on those who employ them, each coach has its respective number on a tin plate fixed on each side. The price of each licence is 50*l.* No person is allowed to have more than two licences, and every proprietor pays 5*s.* per week by monthly payments, to the receiver of the office. A hackney coachman plying without a licence, using another's figure, or defacing his own, forfeits 5*l.* And no horse, mare, or gelding, under fourteen hands high, is to be used in drawing hackney coaches.

If any coachman abuses a passenger, exacts more for his fare than he ought to do, or refuses to go, whether by day or night, fair or foul weather, on complaint being made to the commissioners, and the number of the coach delivered in, such coachman will be summoned to appear, fined for each offence twenty or forty shillings, according to the nature of his crime. And as a farther regulation for the said hackney coachmen and their employers, the following rates are by the said act of parliament appointed to be taken by them respectively.

That no licensed hackney-coachman, or driver of such coach, shall presume to take for his hire in and about the cities of London and Westminster, or ten miles of the same, above the rate of ten shillings per day, reckoned at twelve hours; and by the hours, eighteen pence for the first, and twelve pence for every hour after; and from any of the inns of court, or thereabouts, to any part of St. James's or Westminster (except beyond Tothil street) one shilling; and from any of the said inns of court to the Royal Exchange, one shilling; and if to the Tower of London, Bishopsgate-street, Aldgate, or thereabouts, one shilling and sixpence; and from the same places to the said inns of court; and the like rates to and from places of the like distances.

Pursuant to the directions of the said act of parliament, and for the better ascertaining the fares between the most remarkable places of this city and suburbs, the commissioners of the hackney-coach office caused the distances between the followings parts to be measured, and the several rates fixed accordingly.

Rates of one shilling.

From Westminster-hall to Marlborough-street, Albemarle-street, Bolton-street, Bloomsbury-square, Soho-square, or Little Queen-street, Holbourn.

In the Strand, between Essex-street and Milford-lane, anciently stood the chapel of St. Esprit, but when, or by whom the same was founded, is unknown. And nearly contiguous to the said Milford-lane, on the west, was situate the bishop of Bath's palace, which coming to the earl of Arundel, it received the appellation of its new master; but it at last making way for new streets, the titles of the last noble possessor are still retained in those denominated Arundel and Norfolk.

Here is a street, from a well formerly therein, called Holywell-street. It probably received this epithet from a chapel, said to have stood near St. Innocent's church, or St. Mary-le-Strand.

At the upper end of Wych-street, and lower end of Drury-lane anciently stood the houses of the noble families of Drury and Craven; and as from the former the neighbouring lane was denominated, so from the latter, a handsome court received the name of its buildings.

Some way farther to the west from St. Clements, we find the parish and church of St. MARY LE STRAND.

This church is so called from its dedication to the Virgin Mary, and its situation in the middle of the Strand.

The original church belonging to this parish is mentioned so early as the year 1222, when it was named St. Mary and the Innocents of the Strand; but how long it stood before that time is uncertain. It was then situated on the south side of the Strand nearly opposite the present edifice; for the erecting of which it was taken down in 1549, by order of Edward Seymour, duke of Somerset; which depriving the parishioners of a place of worship, they joined themselves to the church of St. Clement Danes, and afterwards to that of St. John Baptist in the Savoy, where they continued till the year 1723. At length the act having passed for erecting the fifty new churches within the bills of mortality, one was appointed for this parish, and the first stone laid on the 25th of February 1714. It was finished in three years and a half, though it was not consecrated till the first of January 1723, when, instead of its ancient name, it was called St. Mary le Strand.

This is a very superb, though not a very extensive edifice; massy, without the appearance of being heavy, and formed to stand for ages. At the entrance on the west end is an ascent by a flight of steps cut in the sweep of a circle. These lead to a circular portico of Ionic columns covered with a dome, which is crowned with an elegant vase. The columns are continued along the body of the church, with pilasters of the same order at the corners, and in the intercolumniations are niches handsomely ornamented. Over the dome is a pediment supported by Corinthian columns, which are also continued round the body of the structure, over those of the Ionic order beneath; between which are the windows placed over the niches. These columns are supported on pedestals, and have pilasters behind with arches sprung from them, and the windows have angular and circular pediments alternately. A handsome balustrade is carried round the top, and its summit is adorned with vases. The steeple is light though solid, and ornamented with composite columns and capitals.

This

This church is a rectory in the gift of the bishop of Worcester; the value of the living is 22*g*l. besides surplus fees. Of this sum one hundred pounds has been given and settled by parliament, and an hundred and twenty-five pounds is raised by the inhabitants by a rate of four-pence in the pound, in lieu of tythes.

The vestry is select; and the parish officers are, two churchwardens and two overseers of the poor. The peace officers are, one constable, and two scavengers.

On the site of this church, till the year 1714. stood a very lofty May-pole, which, on public occasions, was adorned with streamers, flags, garlands of flowers, &c. At the digging the foundation for the present church, the virgin earth was discovered at the depth of nineteen feet; whereby it appears that the ground in this neighbourhood originally was not much higher than the Thames; therefore this village was truly denominated the Strand, from its situation on the bank of the river.

The most remarkable building in this parish is a royal palace, called

SOMERSET HOUSE.

This was built about the year 1549 by the duke of Somerset, uncle to Edward VI. and protector of England, who demolished the palaces of the bishops of Chester and Worcester, an inn of chancery called Strand Inn, with the church of St. Mary le Strand, that stood there, and building this palace with the materials, it from him obtained the name of Somerset-house. But the duke being soon after attainted, it fell to the crown, and has usually been assigned for the residence of the queen dowager. In this palace Anne of Denmark, queen to king James I. kept her court, whence it was called Denmark-house during that reign; but it soon after recovered the name of the founder. It was the residence of queen Catharine, dowager of king Charles II. and was settled on the late queen Caroline, in case she had survived his late majesty. It consists of several courts, and has a garden behind situated on the bank of the Thames. The first court is a handsome quadrangle, built on all sides with free-stone. On the south side is a piazza, before the great hall or guard-room; beyond which are other courts that lie on a descent towards the garden and the Thames; and on the side of the river king Charles II. added a magnificent structure of free-stone, with a noble piazza built by Inigo Jones. This new building contains the royal apartments, which command a beautiful prospect of the river, and the country beyond it. The garden was adorned with statues, shady walks, and a bowling green: but as none of the royal family have resided here since queen Catharine, several of the officers of the court, and its dependents, are permitted to lodge in it; and great part of it has been lately used as barracks for soldiers and recruits. The garden is entirely decayed, and the apartments are become suitable to those who occupy them.

Near to the west from Somerset-house, on the north side of the Strand, stands

EXETER EXCHANGE.

This is so called from its situation on the spot where once stood the mansion house of the earls of Exeter. It is a large building erected for the benefit of trade, and consisting of a lower and upper floor. The lower floor is laid out into little shops, ranged on each side a long room; and the upper one is now used for auctions and other like purposes.

Nearly opposite this is an ancient building, called

The SAVOY.

This place receives its name from Peter, earl of Savoy, who built a large house here in the year 1245, and gave it to the fraternity of Mountjoy, of whom queen Eleanor, wife of Edward III. purchased it for her son, the duke of Lancaster. When it came into the hands of Henry VII. he founded here an hospital, and called it the hospital of St. John Baptist. It consisted of a master and four brethren, who were to be in priests orders, and officiate in their turns, and they were to stand alternately at the gate of the Savoy, and if they saw any person who was an object of charity, they were obliged to take him in and feed him. If he proved to be a traveller he was entertained for one night, and a letter of recommendation, with so much money given him as would defray his expences to the next hospital.

In the seventh year of Edward VI. this hospital was suppressed, and the furniture given to the hospitals of Bridewell, St. Thomas, &c. but falling into the hands of queen Mary I. she new founded and endowed it plentifully, and it was under the care of a master, and four brethren in holy orders, and a receiver of the rents, who was also the porter, and locked the gates every night; and he chose a watchman. The original rents amounted to 22,000*l*. per annum, which being deemed too large an endowment, an act of resumption was obtained in the 4th and 5th of William and Mary, so that the lands reverted to the crown. But those who had taken leases from the master of Savoy, had them confirmed for ever, upon the payment of twenty years purchase; a reserve being made of 800*l*. or 1000*l*. a year, in perpetuity for the master and four brethren, &c.

The Savoy has been reduced to ashes several times, particularly by Wat Tyler and Jack Cade; and at other times by accident.

The chapel in the Savoy (which is called St. Mary le Savoy) is probably the chapel of St. John the Baptist. It is all stone work, and seems to be of great antiquity by its aspect. It was repaired, anno 1721, at the sole charge of his majesty George I. who also enclosed the burial ground with a strong brick wall, and added a door to it, half of which consists of iron work.

In the first year of the reign of queen Anne, commissioners were appointed to visit the hospital, who were seven lords spiritual, and as many lords temporal: the commission was opened by Sir Nathan Wright, then lord-keeper of the the great seal; and three of the brethren, or chaplains, were discharged, because they had other benefices, as was also the fourth, by reason he was a teacher of a separate congregation.

The chapel is situate by the church-yard of the Savoy, which stands between the south side of the Strand, and the Thames, and in the county of Middlesex.

It is in the gift of the lord high treasurer, or commissioners of the treasury for the time being.

The value is uncertain, but computed to be worth by fees, dues, &c. 80l. per annum. The vestry consists of fourteen inhabitants. The officers are, two chapel wardens, and two overseers.

The remarkable places and things are, two German churches, one of which is a Calvinist, and the other a Lutheran; one French church, and one Quakers meeting. Barracks for 500 soldiers; the Savoy prison for deserters and other delinquents of the army, and for securing the recruits. Here is also an handsome infirmary for such of the guards as fall sick, and for three or four officers.

A little to the westward from the Savoy ends the duchy liberty, at Cecil-street, on the south side of the Strand; and about opposite this street is Southampton-street, which leads up to Covent-garden.

This place received its name from being formerly a garden belonging to the abbot and monks of the convent of Westminster, whence it was called Convent-garden, a name since corrupted into Covent and sometimes Common-garden. At the dissolution of religious houses it fell to the crown and was given first to Edward duke of Somerset; but soon after upon his attainder, it reverted again to the crown, and Edward VI. granted it in 1552 to John earl of Bedford, together with a field, named the Seven Acres, which being afterwards built into a street, is from its length called Long Acre.

Here is a large square called Covent-garden market. It contains about three acres of ground, and is the best market in England for herbs, fruit and flowers. It is surrounded by a wooden rail, and a column is erected in the middle of it, on the top of which are four sun-dials. There is a magnificent piazza on the north side of this square, designed by Inigo Jones, which, if carried round it according to the plan of this celebrated architect, would have rendered it beyond dispute one of the finest squares in Europe. There was another piazza at the south east corner; but that being lately consumed by fire has not been rebuilt.

On the west side of this square stands the parochial church of #### St. P A U L, Covent-Garden.

This church, which is dedicated to St. Paul, was erected in the year 1640, as a chapel of ease to St. Martin's in the Fields, at the expence of Francis earl of Bedford, for the convenience of his tenants, who were then very considerably increased. It is remarkable for its majestic simplicity, and the gates on each side are very elegant and suitable to the structure.

In 1645 the precinct of Covent-garden was separated from St. Martin's, and constituted an independent parish, which was confirmed after the restoration in 1660, by the appellation of St. Paul's, Covent-garden, when the patronage was vested in the earl of Bedford: and as it escaped the fire in 1666, which did not reach so far, it remains as it came from the hands of that great architect Inigo Jones.

In the front is a plain, but noble portico of the Tuscan order, executed in the most masterly manner; the columns are massy, and the intercolumniation large, which has an air of noble simplicity. The building, though as plain as possible, is happily proportioned; the walls are of brick covered with plaster, and the corners of stone; the roof is flat, and though of great extent, is supported by the walls alone, without columns. The pavement is stone; the windows are of the Tuscan form like the portico, and the altar-piece is adorned with eight fluted columns of the Corinthian order, painted in imitation of porphyry.

This church stands in the liberty of Westminster, and is a rectory valued at 400l. per annum, besides a parsonage house in the gift of the duke of Bedford.

The vestry in most cases is in the nature of a select one, composed of the churchwardens, or any two of them being present, and the ancients of the parish, who have served the office of churchwardens. The parish officers are, three churchwardens, chosen yearly in Easter week, viz. one by the duke of Bedford, one by the rector, and one by the inhabitants, being householders of the parish, or the major part of them, and two overseers of the poor. The peace officers are one burges's assistant, four constables, four scavengers, two surveyors of the highways, and two surveyors of the streets.

In this parish are two charity schools, maintained by subscription; one for thirty boys, which is kept under the belfry, who are taught to read, write, and cast accounts, are clothed, and have five pounds given to put each of them apprentice; the master's salary is twenty-five pounds per annum. The other is for twenty girls, who are clothed, taught to work, read and write, and have three pounds given to put each of them out to do all manner of household work: the mistress, who finds a school room, has a salary of 32l. per annum. Here is likewise a theatre called Covent-garden playhouse, and a round-house.

Returning to the Strand, and proceeding westward from Southampton-street, we come to St. Martin's-lane, near the south east angle of which is situate the parish church of #### St. M A R T I N in the Fields.

This church is so called from its dedication to St. Martin, and being originally situated in the fields. Though the present structure is of a modern date, there was very early a church upon the same spot, dedicated to the same saint;

for there are authentic records of a dispute in 1222, between the abbot of Westminster and the bishop of London, concerning the exemption of the church of St. Martin in the fields, from the jurisdiction of the bishop of London. How long before this building for the service of religion was erected there, is not easy to determine; but it was probably a chapel for the monks of Westminster, when they visited their convent garden, which then extended to it. However, the endowments of this church fell with the monks who possessed it, and in Henry the VIIIth's reign a small church was built there, at the king's expence; but this structure not being capacious enough to accommodate the parishioners, it was greatly enlarged in 1607. At length, after many expensive repairs, that building was taken down in 1721, and soon after the first stone of the present edifice was laid. Five years completed the work, and in 1726 it was consecrated.

The whole expence of building and decorating this church amounted to 60,891l. 10s. 4d. of which 33,450l. was granted by parliament, and the rest raised by subscription, and the sale of seats in the church.

This is an elegant edifice, built of stones. It has a noble portico on the west front, of Corinthian columns, supporting a pediment, in which are the royal arms cut in bas relief. The ascent to this portico is by a flight of very long steps. The length of the church is about one hundred and forty feet, the breadth sixty, and the height forty-five. It has a fine arched roof, sustained by Corinthian stone columns. The steeple has a beautiful spire, and one of the best set of bells in London.

The living of this church, which is a vicarage and impropriation in the gift of the king, is said to be worth 600l. per annum, though rated at no more than 12l. in the king's books.

The vestry is select, and the parish officers are, two churchwardens, four sidesmen, and nine overseers of the poor. The peace officers are, five burgesses, five assistant-burgesses, eight constables, two scavengers, two surveyors of the highways, and two of the streets.

The parish of St. Martin, which is supposed to have been originally taken out of St. Margaret's, has so increased both in houses and inhabitants, that it is now one of the largest and most populous in the bills of mortality; and though the parishes of St. Paul's Covent-garden, St. Anne's, St. James's, and St. George's Hanover-square, have been taken out of it, the number of its houses is computed at upwards of five thousand.

The remarkable places and things in this parish are, part of the Privy garden; part of St. James's-park; the Cockpit; in which is the Treasury, the Wardrobe, and the Plantation-office; the Tilt-yard-guard; the Horse-guards; Whitehall; the Banqueting-house; the Royal Tennis court; the effigies of king Charles I. in a Roman military habit, on horseback, at Charing-cross; and king James II. standing on a pedestal with a truncheon in his hand, in the Privy garden; also the Lottery-office in the same garden; the Jewel-office, and the Secretary of War's office in Whitehall; the king's muse; a play-house on the west side of the Haymarket; a chapel in Coventry-court; part of Leicester-square; part of the king's play-house, called the Theatre Royal in Drury-lane; the New Exchange in the Strand; Northumberland-house; a French chapel in Spring-garden; another in Long's-passage in Orange street; a chapel in Chapel-court, Long-acre; another in Broad-court, Drury-lane, called Tavistock-chapel; one in Oxendon-street; and one in Privy-garden.

In Hungerford-market is a charity school, supported by voluntary subscription; the boys are clothed, and taught to read, write, and cast accounts: the sum of 5l. is given with each of them when put apprentice. The girls are clothed, and taught to work, knit and sew; they have 2l. 10s. given with each of them when put out to service, &c.

In Castle-street by the Muse, is a free school, erected and endowed by Dr. Thomas Tennison, late archbishop of Canterbury; over which school there is a fine library; and adjoining to it a work-house for employing the poor.

Nearly opposite the south end of St. Martin's-lane, stands

NORTHUMBERLAND HOUSE.

This building is so called from its having been in possession of the earls of Northumberland for more than an hundred years. It was first built in the reign of king James I. by Henry Howard, earl of Northampton, and is almost the only house of the ancient nobility remaining in London. It originally consisted of three sides only, but is now a spacious quadrangle, with a large garden and fine walks behind it, extending almost to the Thames.

The entrance into it is on the side of the court opposite to the great gateway; the vestibule is about eighty-two feet long, and more than twelve feet broad, being properly ornamented with columns of the Doric order. Each end of it communicates with a stair-case, leading to the principal apartments, which face the garden. They consist of several spacious rooms, fitted up in the most elegant manner. The ceilings are embellished with copies of antique paintings, or fine ornaments of stucco, richly gilt. The chimney pieces consist of statuary and other curious marble, carved and finished in the most correct taste. The rooms are hung either with beautiful tapestry or the richest damasks, and magnificently furnished with large glasses, chairs, settees, marble tables, &c. with frames of the most exquisite workmanship, and richly gilt. They also contain a great variety of landscapes, history pieces, and portraits, painted by Titian and the most eminent masters. In some of the rooms are large chests, embellished with old genuine japan; which being great rarities are almost inestimable.

The left wing, which forms a state gallery or ball-room, is admirable in every respect, whether we consider the dimensions, the taste, and masterly manner in which it is finished, or the elegant magnificence of the furniture. It is 106 feet long, long, the breadth being a fourth part of the length, and the height equal to the diagonal of the breadth. The ceiling is coved and ornamented with figures and festoons richly gilt. The flat part is divided into five compartments, ornamented with fine imitations of some antique figures; as, a flying Fame blowing a trumpet; a Diana; a triumphal car drawn by two horses; a Flora; and a Victory holding out a laurel wreath. The entablature is Corinthian, and of most exquisite workmanship. The light is admitted through nine windows in the side next the garden, being equidistant from each other, and in the same horizontal direction. Above these is another row of windows, which, though not visible in the room, are so artfully placed as to throw a proper quantity of light over the cornice, so that the highest parts of the room are as much enlightened as the lowest, and the pictures on the opposite side are free from that confused glare which would arise from a less judicious disposition. In the spaces between the windows there are tables of antique marble, and stools covered with crimson damask, alternately. The piers are likewise ornamented with large square and oval glasses, arranged in the aforelaid order, the frames of which form a beautiful variety of foliage to adorn the higher parts quite up to the entablature.

The opposite side is divided into three large spaces by two chimney pieces, made of statuary marble, with cornices supported by figures of Phrygian captives, copied from those in the capitol of Rome, and executed in a masterly manner. The finishing above the chimney pieces consists of terms, sphinxes, festoons, &c. and within the spaces formed by these ornaments are placed whole length portraits of the earl and countess of Northumberland in their robes.

The three grand divisions on this side are ornamented with copies of five of the most admired paintings in Italy, which are placed as follows: In the middle and largest division is Raphael's celebrated school of Athens, copied from the original in the vatican by Raphael Mengs. In the two other divisions on the right and left hand side of the former are placed the feast and council of the Gods, which were also painted by Raphael, and copied by Pompeo Battoni from the originals in the Little Farnese. The two ends of the gallery are ornamented with the triumphal procession of Bacchus and Ariadne (originally painted by Annibal Caracci in the Farnese palace) and Guido's Aurora. The former was copied by Felice Constanzi, and the latter by Melucco, a scholar of Carlo Maratti, from the original in the Villa Rospigliosi. All these pictures are very large, being exactly of the same dimensions with the originals, and are copied in a very masterly manner.

Under these pictures are placed large sofas, covered with crimson damask and richly ornamented. This gallery is lighted up for the reception of company in the evenings, by means of four glass lustres, consisting in all of as many branches as will receive one hundred large wax candles, and suspended from the ceiling by long chains, magnificently gilt.

Exclusive of the apartments already described, there are above 140 rooms in this house, which are chiefly appropriated to the private uses of the family. The apartments of lord and lady Northumberland are very commodious and elegantly furnished; her ladyship's closet is even a repository of curiosities, and, amongst other valuable things, contains so fine a collection of pictures, as to afford a most pleasing and almost endless entertainment to a connoisseur. The two libraries also consist of a great variety of books on the most useful and curious subjects, collected with judgment.

The garden lies between the house and the Thames, and forms a pleasing piece of scenery before the principal apartments; for it consists of a fine lawn surrounded with a neat gravel walk, and bounded next the walls by a border of curious flowers, shrubs, and evergreens.

Near Northumberland-house is a large opening called Charing-cross, from one of the crosses which king Edward I. caused to be erected in memory of his queen Eleanor, and Charing, the name of a village which stood on the spot where the cross was built. The cross continued till the civil wars in the reign of king Charles I. when it was entirely destroyed by the Fanatics, as a monument of popish superstition; but after the restoration, an equestrian statue of king Charles I. was set up in its stead. This statue, which still remains is of brass, and very finely executed. It stands on a pedestal seventeen feet high, and is secured by a pallisade, inclosing an area of thirty feet diameter, which is elevated about twelve inches above street.

Not far from this, on the west side of the street, nearly opposite to Scotland-yard, stands

THE ADMIRALTY OFFICE.

This is a magnificent structure built with brick and stone. The east front has two deep wings, and a very lofty portico, supported by four very large stone pillars. Besides a hall, and other common rooms, here are seven spacious houses for as many commissioners of the admiralty. The wall before the court is built in an elegant manner: a piazza, consisting of beautiful columns runs almost from one end to the other, and each side of the gate is ornamented with the figure of a sea-horse cut in stone.

In this office are transacted all maritime affairs belonging to the jurisdiction of the admiralty, who here regulate the affairs of the navy; nominate admirals, captains, and other officers to serve on board his majesty's ships of war, and give orders for the trial of those who have failed in their duty, or been guilty of other irregularities.

Farther from this, on the opposite side the street, is a magnificent building called

WHITE HALL.

This was originally built by Hubert de Burgh, earl of Kent, before the year 1243. It afterwards came to the archbishops of York; whence it was called York Place, and continued to be the city residence of the archbishops, till it was purchased by by king Henry VIII. of Cardinal Wolsey, in 1530; then it became the place of residence for the court, and continued so till the year 1697, when, by accidental fire, it was all burnt down, except the part called the Banqueting-house, which had been added to the palace of Whitehall by king James I. according to a design of Inigo Jones. This Banqueting-house is an elegant and magnificent structure, built of hewn stone, adorned with an upper and a lower range of pillars, of the Ionic and Composite order; the capitals are enriched with fruit and foliage; and between the columns are the windows. The roof is covered with lead, and surrounded with a balustrade. The Banqueting house chiefly consists of one room, of an oblong form, forty feet high, and a proportionable length and breadth. The ceiling is painted by the celebrated Sir Peter Paul Reubens. It is now used only as a chapel-royal, and the rest of the house serves for state-offices.

Opposite the Banqueting house is a noble edifice called

The HORSE GUARDS.

It consists of a center and two wings, and has an air of solidity perfectly agreeable to the nature of the building. It receives its name from the Horse-guards, who, while the king is at St. James's, are here on duty, two at a time being constantly mounted and completely armed, under two handsome sloped porches detached from the building, and erected to shelter them from the weather. This structure is equally calculated for the use of the foot as well as the horse on duty.

In the center of this edifice is an arched passage into St. James's-park, and the building over this has a pediment, in which are the king's arms in bas relief. The wing on each side of this center is a pavillion; and in the middle rises a cupola: the wings are plainer than the center, and consist each of a front, projecting a little, with ornamented windows in the principal story, and a plain one in the sides. Each has its pediment, with a circular window in the center.

Near the Horse-guards, and fronting the parade in St. James's-park, is a stone building called

The TREASURY.

This edifice consists of three stories, of which the lowest is of the basement kind, with small windows, though they are contained in large arches. This story has the Tuscan proportion, and the second the Doric, with arched windows of a larger size; but what is very remarkable, the upper part of this story is adorned with the triglyphs and metopes of the Doric fræza, though the range of ornament is supported by neither columns nor pilasters. Over this story is a range of Ionic columns in the center, supporting a pediment.

The Treasury is under the government of five lords commissioners, one of whom is called first lord of the Treasury: under these are two joint secretaries, four chief clerks, and sixteen under clerks, with other officers.

This edifice has on the inside a court surrounded with buildings, and here is kept the office of trade and plantations. This office is under the government of eight commissioners, and other officers, whose business it is to examine the Custom-house accounts of all the goods exported and imported to and from the several parts of the kingdom, in order to discover the advantages and disadvantages of the trade of this nation with other kingdoms and states, in regard to the balance of trade, and also to benefit our plantations, by promoting their trade, and encouraging such branches as are most conducive to their respective interests, as well as that of the kingdom in general.

We come now to that noble pile of antiquity Westminster-abbey, of whose foundation, gradual increase, and present state, together with a description of the monuments contained therein, the reader will find in page 138, &c.

Near the north door of this abbey, and at the west end of King-street, stands the parish church of

St. MARGARET.

This church was originally erected by Edward the confessor, who having resolved to rebuild the conventual church of St. Peter with great magnificence, imagined that it would be a dishonour to his new and stately edifice, to have the neighbouring people assemble in it as usual, for the performance of religious worship, as well as prove troublesome and inconvenient to the monks; therefore, about the year 1064, he caused a church to be erected on the north side of St. Peter's, for the use of the neighbouring inhabitants, and dedicated it to St. Margaret, the virgin and martyr of Antioch.

This church, which is situated only thirty feet to the north of the abbey, was rebuilt in the reign of king Edward I. by the parishioners and merchants of the staple, except the chancel, which was erected at the expence of the abbot of Westminster. In the year 1735 it was not only repaired, but its tower was cased; at the expence of three thousand five hundred pounds, granted by parliament in consideration of its being the church where the house of commons attend divine service on stated holidays, as the peers do at Westminster abbey.

It is a plain, neat, and not inelegant Gothic structure, well enlightened by a series of large windows. It has two handsome galleries of considerable length, adorned in the front with carved work: these are supported by slender pillars, which rise to the roof, and have four small black pillars running along each of them, adorned with gilded capitals both at the galleries and at the top, where the flat roof is neatly ornamented with stucco. The steeple consists of a tower, which rises to a considerable height, and is crowned with a turret at each corner, and a small lantern ornamented with carved work in the center, from whence runs a flag staff.

In 1758 it was repaired at the public expence, and ornamented with new gilding and painting.

At the east end of this church is a window curiously painted, with the history of the crucifixion, fixion, together with the figures of several apostles and saints, finely executed. It belonged formerly to a private chapel at Copt hall, near Epping, in Essex, and was purchased by the officers of this parish, a few years ago, for four hundred guineas.

This church is a rectory in the gift of the dean and chapter of Westminster, and is valued at 400*l.* per annum.

The vestry is select. The parish officers are, two churchwardens, and six overseers and collectors for the poor. The peace officers and others are, one high steward, one deputy-steward, one high bailiff and his deputy, seven burgesses, seven assistant burgesses, thirteen constables, eight inquest-men, four surveyors of the highways, two surveyors of the streets, and sixteen scavengers.

The remarkable places and things in this parish are, the tombs, and monuments in the abbey of Westminster; Westminster-hall; the courts of judicature; the Exchequer; the House of Commons; the court of requests; the Painted Chamber; the House of Lords; Lindsey-house, Lindsey-lane; Strafford-house; Buckingham-house, now the Queen's-palace; the canal in St. James's-park; an infirmary; the New chapel; a chapel at the back of Tothill-street; the Gate-house; and a chapel in Queen's-square.

The king's-school, or college, is situated near the abbey, and was founded by queen Elizabeth, anno 1560, as a nursery for the propagation of religion, and orthodox literature. To this school belong one school-master, a second master, and four ushers, and forty scholars, called the king's scholars; of these forty, when qualified, six or more are elected yearly, in Easter term, and translated to the universities, viz. To Trinity-college, in Cambridge, and to Christ-church in Oxford. The scholars have each a black gown every year; and there are four lords scholars (as they are called) who wear purple gowns, and receive a stipend yearly from the treasurer of the college, out of certain rents settled by John Williams, D. D.

The Almonry-school was founded by Mr Emery Hill, where a mistress has 6*l.* per annum, a house and a chaldron of coals, for teaching poor children of this parish.

Near Tothill-fields is a free-school, founded by James Palmer, B. D. for a master and twenty boys. The master has twelve pounds and a chaldron of coals per annum, also a house, and a gown once in two years.

In Chapel-street is a charity school, where about sixty boys have their learning and cloaths, and are put out apprentice, by subscription and collection at the church door. These children wear blue coats, to distinguish them.

In Tothill-side is the Grey coat-hospital, founded by letters patent in the year 1706, for seventy boys and forty girls, who are maintained with all necessaries of meat, drink, washing, lodging, and cloaths, and put out apprentices.

In Tothill side there is also the Green coat hospital, for the poor fatherless children of this parish, founded by king Chares I. anno 1633, who endowed it with fifty pounds per annum, which is paid out of the treasury. This hospital was rebuilt at the charge of doctor Busby and Charles Twitty, esq; anno. 1700.

Lady Ann Dacres alms houses, called Emanuel-college, were founded by her the 17th of December, anno 1601, for ten poor men and ten poor women, (each of whom has liberty to bring up one poor child) according to the settlement for seventeen of St. Margaret's parish, two of Hays, and two of the parish of Chelsea. She gave 100*l.* per annum issuing out of the manor of Bramsburton, in the county of York, until the expiration of a lease of 199 years, and afterwards the whole manor (said to be worth 600*l.* per annum) is to accrue to augment this foundation. The 100*l.* is paid out of the chamber of London, and is under the care and inspection of the Lord-mayor and court of aldermen. No person that is wicked, or cannot say the creed and ten commandments in English, or under fifty years of age, or who has inhabited less than three years in one of the said respective parishes to be admitted into this hospital.

In Tothill-side are Mr. George Whitcher's alms-houses, founded in the year 1683, for six poor people who have each five pounds per annum and a gown. Here is a chapel for their use, and he that reads prayers to the rest has twenty shillings more per annum.

In Tothill-side Westminster, are also twelve alms-houses, six for men and six for women, founded by Mr. James Palmer, B. D. anno 1654. They have each six pounds and a chaldron of coals per annum and a gown once in two years. Here is a chapel for their use, where he prayed with the poor people twice every day, and preached twice every week.

Near these are two alms-houses founded in the year 1705, by Mrs. Judith Kifford, wife of Mr. Thomas Kifford, for two decayed, virtuous, poor gentlewomen; one to be chosen out of this parish, each of whom has five pounds per annum.

A little nearer the chapel in Tothill-fields are two large alms-houses for men and their wives, each house has six pounds per annum. They were founded and endowed by Nicholas Butler, esq; in the year 1675.

Near Tothill-fields are twelve alms-houses erected out of the money left by Emery Hill, who by his will in the year 1677, endowed them for the maintenance of six poor men and their wives, and six widows. The single persons have each 4*l.* 16*s.* per annum and the others 7*l.* 4*s.* Besides each has a gown once in two years, and a chaldron of coals yearly.

In the Little Almonry are twelve alms-houses for poor men and their families; to each is paid 6*l.* per annum by the dean and chapter of Westminster.

In the wool staple towards the easterly end, are eight alms-houses for poor people, and to each is paid out of the treasury 5*l.* per annum. They were founded by Henry VIII. in the 36th year of his reign.

In Lady-alley about the middle of King's-street, are four alms-houses for four poor women, each of whom has 1*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* per annum paid out of the treasury.

In or near Petty France and the New Chapel, are twenty alms-houses built by Cornelius Vanden, but not being endowed are inhabited by the parish-pensioners.

There is in the Little Almonry a workhouse, where the poor of this parish, and of St. John the Evangelist, are employed and maintained.

To this parish belongs a prison called the Gatehouse, where persons are confined for debt, by writ directed to the high bailiff of Westminster: it is also a gaol for criminal persons, who have committed any crime in the city or liberty of Westminster. Also

By Tothill-fields is a Bridewell, or house of correction, adjoining to the east end of the Green-coat hospital, for such as beg or live idly, or lead loose lives in this city or liberty. It is also a gaol for criminals, who commit offences within the said city and liberty, so made by an act of parliament in the reign of queen Anne.

Proceeding westward from St. Margaret's church, we come to a place called Mill-bank; on the west side of which stands the parochial church of

St. JOHN THE EVANGELIST.

The parish of St. Margaret being greatly increased in the number of houses and inhabitants, it was judged necessary to erect one of the fifty new churches within it. This church being finished, was dedicated to St. John the Evangelist; a parish was taken out of St. Margaret's, and the parliament granted the sum of 2500l. to be laid out in the purchase of lands, tenements, &c. for the maintenance of the rector: but besides the profits arising from this purchase, it was also enacted, that as a farther provision for the rector, the sum of 125l. should be annually raised by an equal pound rate upon the inhabitants.

This church was finished in 1728, and is remarkable only for having sunk while it was building, which occasioned an alteration in the plan. On the north and south sides are magnificent porticos, supported by vast stone pillars, as is also the roof of the church. At each of the four corners is a beautiful stone tower and pinnacle: these additions were erected, that the whole might sink equally, and owe their magnitude to the same cause. The parts of this building are held together by iron bars, which cross even the isles.

The advowson of this church is in the dean and chapter of Westminster: and to prevent this rectory being held in commendam, all licences and dispensations for holding it are, by act of parliament declared null and void.

The vestry is select. The parish officers are, two churchwardens, and two overseers and collectors for the poor. The peace officers are, four burgesses, with each his assistant, two constables, one surveyor of the highways, two surveyors of the streets, and two scavengers.

Returning to Westminster-abbey we find, on the north side thereof, an old Gothic building called

WESTMINSTER HALL.

This was first built by William Rufus, as an addition to a royal palace there, and afterwards rebuilt by king Richard II, in the year 1397. It is reckoned one of the largest rooms in Europe, being two hundred and seventy feet long, seventy-four feet broad, and ninety feet high, supported only by buttresses, without one pillar. The roof is timber, and was a few years ago slated, the old covering of lead being thought too heavy: the pavement is of stone. In this spacious room the kings of England have generally held their coronation and other solemn feasts. It is generally used for the trial of peers; and here, ever since the reign of Henry III. the three great courts of Chancery, King's-Bench, and Common Pleas have been held at the four terms of the year; and above stairs is held the court of Exchequer.

The Court of Chancery took its name from the cross bars of iron or wood, called by the Romans cancelli, with which it was formerly inclosed, to prevent the officers being incommoded by the crowding of the people. The supreme and sole judge of this court is the lord high chancellor. This great officer, who is assisted by the masters in Chancery, takes precedency after the archbishop of Canterbury; and, next to the king and princes of the blood, is the highest person in the kingdom in civil affairs. He is generally keeper of the great seal, and is thence styled lord keeper.

The chancery consists of two courts, in one of which the lord chancellor proceeds according to the laws and statutes of the kingdom, and in the other according to equity, judging rather by the spirit than the letter of the laws. In case of absence his place upon the bench is supplied by the master of the rolls, who also determines causes in the same equitable manner.

Out of this court are issued writs for parliaments, charters, patents for sheriffs, writs of certiorari to remove records and false judgments in inferior courts, writs of moderata misericordia, when a person has been amerced too high, and for a reasonable part of goods for widows and orphans. Here also are sealed and enrolled treaties with foreign princes, letters patent, commissions of appeal,oyer and terminer, &c. The actions in this court are by bill or plaint; the witnesses are privately examined; there is no jury, but all the sentences are given by the judge of the court.

The twelve masters in Chancery are assistants of the chancellor or lord-keeper; the first of whom is master of the rolls, which is a place of great dignity, and is in the gift of the king. These gentlemen sit at Westminster-hall, with the lord chancellor, three at a time while the term lasts, and two at a time when the chancellor sits to hear causes in his own house. The salary of the masters in chancery, exclusive of robe money, is 100l. per annum, paid quarterly out of the exchequer.

The Court of King's Bench is the highest court of common law in England. It is so called because the king sometimes sat there in person on an high high bench, and judges, to whom the judicature belongs in his absence, on a low bench at his feet. Or because this court determines pleas between the crown and the subject of treasons, felonies, and other pleas, which properly belong to the king; and also in whatever relates to the loss of life or member of any subject in which the king is concerned. Here likewise are tried breaches of peace, oppression, and misgovernment; and this court corrects the errors of all the judges and justices of England, in their judgments and proceedings, not only in pleas of the crown, but in all pleas, real, personal, and mixed; except only pleas in the exchequer. This court is general, and extends to all England: and wherever it is held the law supposes the sovereign to be there in person. In this court there generally sit four judges, the first of whom is stiled the lord chief justice of the King's-bench, and sometimes the lord chief justice of England.

The Court of Common Pleas was anciently ambulatory, and followed the king wheresoever he went; but at the confirmation of Magna Charta by king John in 1215, it was fixed at Westminster, where it still continues. It is so denominated because in this court are debated the usual or common pleas between subject and subject, and all civil causes whatsoever. After this court was fixed at Westminster, such a number of causes was brought before it, that the king, for the greater dispatch of business, found it necessary, instead of three, to constitute six judges, whom he appointed to sit in two places. At present, however, the number is only four, the principal of which is stiled lord chief justice of the Common Pleas. These sit together in Westminster-hall to hear and determine causes; but no counsellor can plead before them under the degree of a serjeant.

The other officers of this court are, the Custos Brevium; three prothonotaries and their secondaries; several clerks, who have their respective counties allotted them, and are to engross the fines levied on lands in their several divisions: the Chirographer; the Register of the fines, and a clerk of the proclamations. The prothonotaries and chirographer sit in the court covered with black round caps, which was the fashion before the invention of hats and wigs. These are all sworn, and have their offices for life. There are likewise several other officers who are not sworn.

The Court of Exchequer is so called from a chequered cloth, which antiently covered the table where the judges, or chief officers sat. This court was first erected by William the conqueror, for the trial of all causes relating to the revenues of the crown; and in the same court there are now also tried matters of equity between subject and subject.

The judges of this court are, the lord chief baron of the exchequer, and three other judges called barons of the exchequer. There is also the curfitor baron of the exchequer, who administers the oaths to the sheriffs, under-sheriffs, bailiffs, searchers, surveyors, &c. of the Custom-house; but is no judge. When at any time the barons are of different opinions concerning the decision of any cause, they call to their assistance the chancellor of the exchequer, who decides in favour of one of the parties by his casting vote.

Adjoining to the south-east angle of Westminster-hall is a building formerly called St. Stephen's chapel, from its having been dedicated to St. Stephen. It was founded by that king, and rebuilt in 1347 by king Edward III. who converted it to a collegiate church; but ever since it was surrendered to Edward VI. it has been used for the assembly of the representatives of the commons of England, and is now generally called

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

This is a spacious room wainscotted to the ceiling. It is capable of holding six hundred persons, and has commodious apartments about it, as the Speaker's chamber, rooms for committees, and other offices. The benches for the members, which gradually ascend one above another, as in a theatre, are covered with green cloth; the floor is matted, and there are wainscot galleries around it, sustained by cantilevers adorned with carved work, where strangers are often permitted to sit and hear the debate.

At the upper end of this room the speaker is placed upon a raised seat, ornamented behind with Corinthian columns, and the king's arms carved and placed on a pediment; before him is a table, at which the clerk and his assistant sit near him on each hand, just below the chair; and on either side, as well below as in the galleries, the members are placed promiscuously. The speaker and clerks always wear gowns in the house, as the professors of the law do in term time; but no other of the members wear robes, except the four representatives for the city of London, who, the first day of every new parliament, are dressed in scarlet gowns, and sit all together on the right hand of the chair, next to the speaker.

The time of sitting is upon any day in the morning, except on Sundays, or some other high festivals or fast days, upon which it is not usual to assemble, unless upon the most urgent occasions: but though the speaker always adjourns the house to nine o'clock of the morning of the day when they agree to meet again, the house seldom meets till twelve.

This house has an equal share with the lords in making laws, nor can any be made without the consent of the commons, who are the guardians of the liberties of the people; and as they are the grand inquest of the nation, they have a power to impeach the greatest lords in the kingdom, both spiritual and temporal.

On the day prefixed by the king in the writ of summons, his majesty goes in person to the house of lords, where being seated with the crown on his head, and clothed in his royal robes, he sends for the commons by the gentleman usher of the black rod, who coming to the bar of the house, bows, and advancing a few steps, repeats this mark of respect a second and a third time, saying, "Gentlemen of the house of commons, the king commands this honourable house to attend
" him

" him immediately in the house of peers; and then retiring backwards, bowing, withdraws: the commons then immediately attend his majesty in the house of lords, when the lord chancellor or keeper commands them in the king's name to chuse a speaker, upon which they return to their own house. One of the members then standing up in his place, and making a short introductory speech, moves that such member as he then names, may take the chair, and his motion being seconded by some other member, if no contest happens, they lead the person mentioned from his seat to the bar of the house, from whence they conduct him bowing thrice, up the chair; where being placed, he stands up, and returns thanks to the house for the honour done him, and modestly acknowledging his inability to discharge so great a trust, desires they would make choice of a more able person, which being disapproved, he submits to their pleasure; and after receiving the directions of the house, on the usual requests to be made on his appearing before his majesty, adjourns to the day appointed for that purpose.

But before the commons can enter upon any business, or even the choice of a speaker, all the members enter the court of wards, where they take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, with those appointed by the act of the first of William and Mary, in the presence of an officer appointed by his majesty, who is usually the lord steward of the household; and after they have chosen the speaker, they take the same oaths again in the house, at the table, and subscribe their opinions against the doctrines of transubstantiation, the invocation and adoration of saints, and the sacrifice of the mass; and before they can give any vote in the house, except for the choice of a speaker, they are obliged also to abjure the pretender.

Upon the day appointed, the usher of the black rod is again sent for the commons, when he alters his stile, and addresses himself to the speaker. The members, obeying this summons, return to the house of lords, and present their speaker to the king, who is again seated on the throne, and have obtained his approbation, the speaker desires, that the commons, during their sitting, " may have free access to his majesty, " freedom of speech in their own house, and " freedom from arrests." After which the king makes his speech to both houses, the whole house of commons being supposed to be at the bar of the house of lords.

After the speaker and members have taken the oaths, the standing orders of the house are read, and grand committees appointed to sit on usual days: which being done, the house generally begins with reading some bills left unfinished the sessions before. Any member of parliament is at liberty to move for a bill to be brought in; which being agreed to by the house, the person who made the motion, with some of those who seconded it, are ordered to prepare, and bring it in. When the bill is ready, some of the members who were ordered to prepare it, read the order at the side bar of the house, desiring leave to bring the bill to the table; which upon the question being agreed to, it has a first reading by the clerk at the table; and then the speaker taking the bill in his hand, reads the abbreviate or abstract of it: which done, after the debate upon the bill, if any happens, he puts the question, whether it shall have a second reading; and sometimes upon a motion being made appoints a day for it.

When the bill has been read a second time, the question is put, whether it shall be committed, which is either to a committee of the whole house, if the bill be of importance; or to a private committee, any member at pleasure naming the persons to be of that committee; and their names being read by the clerk at the table, they are ordered to meet in the speaker's chamber, and report their opinion to the house. Accordingly meeting there, they chuse their chairman, and either adjourn to some other time, or proceed upon the bill, which in this last case, the chairman orders a clerk who attends them to read, then taking the bill himself, and reading it paragraph by paragraph, he puts every clause to the question, fills up the blanks, and makes amendments according to the opinion of the majority of the committee, of whom there must be eight of the persons named, to proceed regularly, though five may adjourn.

When the committee have gone through the whole bill, the chairman by their desire makes his report at the side bar of the house, reading all the alterations made by the committee, and how any of these amendments have altered the scope of the bill, the clerk having before written down in what page and line of the bill those amendments are to be found; and if the committee have thought fit to add any clauses, they are marked alphabetically, read by the chairman and delivered to the clerk, who reads all the amendments and clauses. The speaker then puts the question, whether they shall be read a second time, and if this be agreed to, he then reads them himself, and particularly as many of them as the house agrees to. After which the question is put, whether the bill so amended shall be ingrossed, that is, written fair on parchment; and read the third time some other day. It being at length read the third time, the speaker holds the bill in his hand, and puts the question, whether the bill shall pass, and if the major part be for it, the clerk writes on the bill Soit baillé aux Seigneurs, i. e. Be it delivered to the lords.

When an engrossed bill is read, and any clauses referred to be added to it, they must be on parchment ingrossed like the bill, which are then called riders; and if agreed to, they are added to the bill.

Petitions are offered like bills at the bar of the house, and brought up and delivered at the table, by the member who presents them.

When a member speaks to a bill, he stands up uncovered, and addresses himself only to the speaker; but if he be answered by another, he is not allowed to reply the same day, unless personally reflected on: for nobody is to speak to a bill above once in a day, unless the whole house be turned into a committee, and then every member may reply as often as the chairman thinks proper. But if a bill be rejected, it cannot be any more proposed, during the same sessions.

Messengers

Messengers from the lords, and all persons appearing at the bar of the house, are introduced by the serjeant attending the house, with the mace upon his shoulder.

While the speaker is in the chair, the mace lies upon the table, except when sent upon any extraordinary occasion into Westminster-hall and the court of requests, to summon the members to attend. But when the members resolve themselves into a committee of the whole house, the mace is laid under the table, and the chairman to that committee takes the chair where the clerk of the house usually sits.

Forty members are necessary to make a house, and eight a committee. But the speaker is not allowed to vote, except the house be equally divided: nor is he to persuade or dissuade in passing a bill; but only to make a short and plain narrative.

The members of the house of commons vote by yeas and noes; but if it appear doubtful which is the greater number, the house divides. If the question relates to any thing already in the house, the noes go out; but if it be to bring any thing in, as a bill, petition, &c. the ayes go out: where the house divides, the speaker appoints four tellers, two of each opinion, who after they have told those within, place them in the passage between the bar and the door, and tell the others who went out; which done, the two tellers who have the majority take the right hand, and place themselves within the bar, all four advancing bowing three times; and being come up to the table deliver the number, saying, the ayes who went out, are so many; the noes who staid so many; or the contrary: which is repeated by the speaker, who declares the majority.

In a committee of the whole house, they divide by changing sides, the ayes taking the right hand of the chair, and the noes the left; and then there are only two tellers.

If when a bill is passed in one house, and sent to the other, they demur upon it; a conference is then demanded in the painted chamber, where certain members deputed from each house meet, and debate the affair, while the lords sit covered at the table, and the commons stand without their hats. If they disagree, the affair is dropped; but if they come to an agreement, it is at length brought, with all the other bills that have passed both houses, to receive the royal assent, in the house, where the king being seated in the chair of state, the clerk of the crown reads the title of each bill; and as he reads the clerk of the parliament, according to the instructions he hath received from his majesty pronounces the royal assent; if it be a public bill by saying, Le Roy le veut, i. e. The king will have it so: or if a private bill, Soit fait comme il est désiré; i. e. Be it done as is desired. But if his majesty does not approve the bill, the answer is Le Roy s'avisera: that is the king will consider of it.

Money bills always begin in the house of commons; because the greatest part of the supplies are raised by the people, and for this reason the commons will not allow the lords to alter them; and on the presenting these bills to his majesty, the answer is, Le Roy remercie ses loyaux sujets, accepte leur benevolence, & aussi le veut: that is, the king thanks his loyal subjects, accepts of their benevolence, and therefore grants his consent.

A bill for a general pardon has but one reading in each house; because they must take it as the king will please to give it: and when this bill is passed the answer is, Les Prelats, Seigneurs, & Communi, en ce parlement assemblez, au nom de tous vos autres sujets, remercient très humblement votre Majesté, & prient Dieu de vous donner en santé bonne vie & longue: that is, the bishops, lords, and commons in this parliament assembled, in the name of all your other subjects, most humbly thank your majesty, and beseech God to grant you a long and healthful life.

The king without his personal presence, may, by a committee granted to some of his nobles, give his royal assent to any bill that requires haste.

When his majesty prorogues or dissolves the parliament, he generally comes in person, and being seated with the crown on his head, sends the black rod for all the house of commons to come to the bar of the house of lords; and then the speech being read by the lord chancellor, he, by the king's special command, pronounces the parliament prorogued or dissolved.

The parliament was formerly dissolved at the death of the king; but to prevent tumults and confusion, it is now expressly provided by a solemn act, that a parliament sitting, or in being at the king's demise, shall continue; and if not sitting shall meet expressly, for keeping the peace of the realm, and preserving the succession.

Adjoining to Westminster-hall, on the south side is an edifice called

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

This house is so denominated from its being the place where the peers of Great Britain assemble in parliament. It is an oblong room, somewhat less than that in which the commons meet, and is hung with fine old tapestry, with historical figures, representing the defeat of the Spanish Armada in 1588, the gift of the states of Holland to queen Elizabeth.

At the upper end of the room is the throne upon which the king is seated on solemn occasions, in his robes, with the crown on his head, and adorned with all the ensigns of majesty. On the right hand of the throne is a seat for the prince of Wales, and on the left another for the next person of the royal family.

Below the throne, on the king's right hand, are the seats of the two archbishops, and a little below them the bench of bishops. Before the throne, are three broad seats stuffed with wool; on the first of which, next to the throne, sits the lord chancellor or keeper of the great seal, who is a speaker of the house of peers; and on the other two sit the lord chief justice, the master of the rolls, and the other judges, who attend occasionally to be consulted in points of law. The benches for the lords spiritual and temporal are covered with red cloth; and there is a bar across the house, at the end opposite to the throne. Without the bar sits the king's first gentleman usher, called the black rod, from a black wand he carries in his hand. Under him is a yeoman usher, who waits at the inside of the door, a crier without, and a serjeant at mace, who always attends the lord chancellor.

When the king is present with the crown on his head, the lords sit uncovered and the judges stand till his majesty gives them leave to sit. In the king's absence the lords, at their entrance, do reverence to the throne, as is done by all who enter the presence chamber. The judges then may sit, but must not be covered till the lord chancellor or keeper signifies to them, that the lords permit them to be so.

When the king goes in state to the house, either at the opening or breaking up of the sessions, the park guns are discharged; and his majesty arriving at the house of lords, enters a room adjoining to it, called the prince's chamber, where he puts on his robes and crown, and from thence is conducted into the house by the lord chamberlain, where all the lords are dressed in their scarlet robes, and being seated on the throne, sends for the commons by the gentleman usher of the black rod. On their appearing, his majesty's speech is read by the lord chancellor to this grand united assembly; after which his majesty returns in the same manner as he came, in his state coach drawn by eight beautiful horses, attended by his guards, and the guns firing.

The house of lords in conjunction, with the king and commons, have the power not only of making and repealing laws, but of constituting the supreme judicature of the kingdom; the lords here assembled take cognizance of treasons and high crimes committed by the peers and others; try all who are impeached by the commons; and acquit or condemn without taking an oath, only laying their right hand upon their breast, and saying, Guilty, or Not guilty upon my honour. They receive appeals from all other courts, and even sometimes reverse the decrees of chancery; and from this highest tribunal lies no appeal. All the lords spiritual and temporal have the peculiar privilege of appointing proxies to vote in their stead, when from sickness or any other cause, they cannot conveniently appear; but such as would make proxies are obliged, at the beginning of every parliament, to enter them in person.

The lords give their suffrages or votes, beginning at the puisne, or lowest baron, and then proceeding in a regular series, every one answering apart, content, or not content. If the affirmatives and negatives are equal, it passes in the negative, the speaker not being allowed a voice, unless he be a peer of the realm.

Between the house of lords and the house of commons is an apartment called the painted chamber. This is said to have been Edward the Confessor's bed-chamber, and the rooms in which the parliaments were anciently opened. Conferences are often held here between the two houses, or their committees, there being a gallery of communication for the members of the house of commons to come up without being crowded.

At the south end of New Palace-yard is a plain old building called the Exchequer, or the office of the receipt of his majesty's exchequer, where the king's revenue is received and disbursed.

This important office is under the direction of the chancellor of the exchequer, who has the comptrollment of the rolls of the lords of the treasury, and sits in the court above the barons of the exchequer. He has the gift of the office of comptroller of the pipe, and that of clerk of the Nihilis.

Another great officer is, the auditor of the receipts of the exchequer. He files the bills of the tellers, and draws all orders to be signed by the lords commissioners of the treasury, for issuing forth all money, in virtue of privy seals, which are recorded by the clerk of the pells, and entered and lodged in the auditor's office. He likewise, by warrant from the lords of the treasury, makes debentures to the several persons who have fees, annuities or pensions, by letters patent from the king, out of the exchequer, and directs them for payment to the tellers. He daily receives the state of each teller's account, and weekly certifies the whole to the lords commissioners, who immediately present the estimate, or balance to the king. He makes half yearly, at Michaelmas and Lady-day, a book called a declaration, containing a methodical abstract of all the accounts and payments made the preceding half year, and delivers one of them to the lords of the treasury, and another to the chancellor of the exchequer; and by him are kept the registers appointed for paying all persons in course, upon several branches of the king's revenue. For the discharge of these offices he has a chief clerk, a clerk of the debenture, a clerk of the registers and issues, a clerk of the cash book, and a clerk for making out exchequer bills; and in the offices for annuities under the auditor are two chief clerks, under whom are nine other clerks.

The other great officers are the four tellers of the exchequer, each of whom has his deputy, his first clerk and four other clerks. Their office is to receive all moneys due to the king, and thereupon to throw down a bill through a pipe into the tally court, where it is received by the auditor's clerk, who there attends to write the words of the bill upon a tally, and then delivers the same to be entered by the clerk of the pells, or his under clerk, who attends to enter it in his book; then the tally is cloven by the two deputy chamberlains, and while the senior deputy reads one part the junior examines the other.

The clerk of the pells is another great officer. He enters the tellers bills on a parchment skin, in latin Pellis, and likewise all receipts and payments for the king; this officer is in the nature of a comptroller; he has a deputy and two clerks.

To the tally court belong the two chamberlains of the exchequer, in whose custody are many ancient records, leagues and treaties with foreign princes, the standards of money, weights, and measures, those ancient books called the black book of the exchequer, and dooms-day book, which last contains an account of all the cities, towns, villages and families in the reign of William the Conqueror. This book is kept under three locks and keys, and cannot be examined for less than 6s. 8d. and for every line transcribed is paid four-pence.

Under these officers are four deputy chamberlains, in whose offices are preserved all the counter-foils of the above tallies, so exactly ranked by months or years, that they may be easily found out, in order to be joined with their respective tallies, which being done and proved true, they deliver it attested for a lawful tally to the clerk of the pipe, to be allowed in the great roll.

The other officers of this court, are the usher of the exchequer, his deputy and clerk; three paymasters of exchequer bills, their deputy, and a comptroller of exchequer bills; a tally writer for the auditor, who has two assistant clerks, and a tally cutter.

There are several other offices belonging to the exchequer, as the Pipe office in Gray's Inn; Foreign Apposer's office, and King's Remembrancer's office, in the Temple; Clerk of the pleas office, in Lincoln's Inn, &c.

In leaving this division we proceed from Westminster-bridge (which has been already described in p. 301, &c.) through a fine street which opens and leads to St. James's Park.* At the west end of this park, fronting the mall and grand canal, stands

The QUEEN'S PALACE.

This building was originally known by the name of Arlington-house; but being purchased by the late duke of Buckingham's father, who rebuilt it in 1703, with brick and stone, it was called Buckingham-house till the year 1762, when his present majesty bought it; and it has obtained the name of the Queen's Palace from the particular pleasure her majesty has expressed in the retirement of it. It is in every respect a fine building, and not only commands a prospect of St. James's-park in front, but has a park, lately much enlarged, and a canal belonging to itself behind it, together with a good garden, and a fine terrace, from whence, as well as from the apartments, there is a prospect of the adjacent country. It has a spacious court-yard, inclosed with iron rails, fronting St. James's Park, with offices on each side, separated from the mansion-house by two wings of bending piazzas, and arched galleries, elevated on pillars of the Tuscan, Doric, and Ionic orders. Each front of this house has two ranges of pilasters of the Corinthian and Tuscan orders.

To this palace has been lately added a new library supplied with the best authors in various languages. Here is also a fine collection of prints; and the whole structure is adorned with a great variety of pictures by the most eminent masters. Among which are the famous cartoons by Ra-phael, removed from Hampton-court. These cartoons are seven pieces of sacred history taken from the New Testament, and were designed as patterns for tapestry. They are painted on paper with great delicacy and beauty, in water colours; the description of which is as follows:

1. The miraculous draught of fishes, Luke v. In this Christ appears in the boat with an air of divine gentleness; the large fowls placed on the shore in the fore-ground have a sea-wildness in them, and prevent the heaviness which that part of the picture would otherwise have had, by breaking the parallel line that would have been made by the boat, and the base of the picture.

2. The delivery of the keys, John xxi. As this is the appearance of our Saviour after the resurrection, present authority, late suffering, humility and majesty, command and love, are finely mixed in his divine aspect. He is wrapped only in one large piece of white drapery; his left arm and breast are bare, and part of his legs naked. The figures of the eleven apostles all express the same passion of admiration, but discover it differently according to their characters. Peter receives his master's orders on his knees, with an admiration mixed with a more particular attention; the beloved disciple has, in his countenance wonder lost in love. The last personage whose back only is seen, one would imagine to be Thomas, whose perplexed concern could not be better drawn than by this acknowledgement of the difficulty to describe it. The mixture of tints in the draperies all together produce a wonderful harmony.

3. The miracle of healing the cripple at the beautiful gate of the temple, Acts iii. All the figures are admirably performed.

4. The death of Ananias, Acts v. Here is the greatest dignity in the apostles; they are, however, only a subordinate group, because the principal action relates to the criminal; thither the eye is directed by almost all the figures. What a horror and reverence is visible in the whole assembly on this mercenary man's falling down dead!

5. Elymas the sorcerer struck with blindness, Acts xii. How admirably are terror and astonishment expressed in the people present, and how variously according to their several characters! What grace and majesty is seen in the Great Apostle of the Gentiles, denouncing vengeance on the sorcerers! The proconsul has a greatness and a grace superior to his character, equal to what might be supposed in a Cæsar.

6. The sacrifice to Paul and Barnabas by the people of Lycaonia, Acts xiv. The occasion of this is finely told; the man healed of his lameness, to express his sense of the divine power which ap-

* This place was originally a wild wet field, till king Henry VIII. inclosed it, laid it out into walks, and drained it by cutting canals, for a pleasure ground to his new palace at St. James's. It was afterwards much enlarged and improved by king Charles II. who planted it with lime-trees, and formed a beautiful vista, near half a mile in length, called the mall from its being adopted to a play at bowls so called. He also formed the water into a canal of 100 feet broad, and 2800 feet long; and furnished the park with a decoy, and other ponds for water fowl. This park, which is near a mile and a half in circumference, and surrounded with magnificent structures, is constantly open and used as a thoroughfare by all sorts of people. At the east end is a spacious parade for the exercise of the horse and foot-guards.

peared in the apostles, and to shew it to be him, not only has a crutch under his feet on the ground, but an old man takes up the lappet of his garment, and looks upon the limb he remembers to have been crippled, expressing great devotion and amazement; which are sentiments seen in the other, with a mixture of joy. The group of the ox and popa are taken from a bas-relievo in the Villa de Medici.

7. St. Paul preaching to the Athenians, Acts xvii. The divine orator is the chief figure; and the picture is conducted with the greatest judgment. The attitude of St. Paul is as fine as possible, pointing to the statue of Mercury, alluding to their idolatry; for the men of Lystra would call him by that name. The little drapery thrown over the apostle's shoulder, and hanging down to his waist, poises the figure, which otherwise would seem ready to tumble forwards.

There were in all twelve of these pieces: two are in the possession of the French king; the king of Sardinia has two of the others; and one belonged to a gentleman in England, who pledged it for a sum of money. When the person who had taken this valuable deposit found it was to be redeemed, he greatly damaged the drawing, for which the gentlemen brought his action in Westminster hall.

On the north side of St. James's park, near the center, is an old building called

St. JAMES'S PALACE.

On the spot where this edifice stands was once an hospital dedicated to St. James, originally founded by the citizens of London for only fourteen maids afflicted with the leprosy, who were to live a chaste and devout life; but afterwards new donations increased the extent of the charity, and eight brethren were added to minister divine service. This hospital, which is mentioned in a manuscript of the Cotton library, so early as in the year 1100, was at length suppressed by king Henry VIII. who allowed the sisters pensions during the term of their lives, and taking down the edifice built a palace in its room, which retained the name of the hospital, and is still standing. In this edifice our kings have resided ever since Whitehall was consumed by fire in 1697, and his majesty usually resides here during the winter season. It is an irregular building, of a mean appearance from without, but it contains many beautiful and magnificent apartments. The chapel of the hospital was converted to the use of the royal family, as it remains to this day, and is a royal peculiar exempted from all episcopal jurisdiction. The service in the chapel is like that in cathedrals; and for that end there belongs to it a dean, a lord-almoner, a sub-dean, forty-eight chaplains, who preach in their turns before the royal family, twelve gentlemen of the chapel, two organists, ten children, a serjeant, a yeoman, a groom of the vestry, and a bell-ringer.

On the east side of this palace is Malborough-house, which is a very large brick edifice, ornamented with stone, and built in a peculiar taste. It has two wings, and a very spacious court before it. The front, which is very extensive, has only two series of windows. The building is terminated by a balustrade on the top; and the apartments are magnificent, well disposed and richly furnished.

But the most elegant building, not only in point of architecture, but in richness of furniture, is lord Speencer's house, situate on the west side of St. James's-palace. Nothing can be more pleasingly elegant than the park front, which is ornamented to an high degree, and yet not with profusion; nor is the fitting up and furniture of the rooms inferior to the beauties of the outside. The library which is thirty feet by twenty-five, is most beautifully ornamented. The chimney-piece very light, of polished white marble. On one side of the room hangs a capital picture of the nature of witchcraft; the execution and finishing is very great; and the extent of the painter's imagination striking, in drawing into one point such a multitude of the emblems of witchcraft, and all designed with a fine wildness of fancy. It is somewhat in the stile of Scarlatt.

From hence you enter the dining room, forty-six by twenty-four; exceedingly elegant: the decorations in the finest taste, and the richest of their kind; the ceiling and cornice of white and green, very beautiful. The slabs of Siena marble, large and finely veined. The chimney-piece, basso-relievo, of white marble beautifully polished. On one side of it is a landscape, the killing of a dragon, the general brilliancy of which is very fine, and the trees beautifully expressed. On the other side is another yet more pleasing, the trees of which are likewise striking. The figures are a centaur carrying off a naked woman: her back appears, which is painted with a most delicate softness: she has a little slight drapery, which is very elegantly designed, though perhaps not perfectly natural.

We next enter the drawing room, which is twenty-four by twenty-one, clear of a noble bow-window, parted from the room only by two pillars of the most exquisite workmanship; they are carved in leaves, the thick foliage of which bends round in a fine arch from one to the other, in a taste that cannot be too much admired. On each side, in a semicircular cove in the wall, an urn of white marble with basso-relievos, very beautiful. Nothing can be more elegant than the chimney-piece; a fine border of Siena marble with a sweet festoon of flowers upon it in white marble polished; the ceiling, cornice, and ornaments of green and white and gold, and in a most delicate stile. Over the chimney, a picture of two usurers; great expression.

Returning, we next view the attic story; the stair case is in a very just taste, wide and lofty; the ceiling and ornaments green and white.

From the landing-place you enter first the music room twenty-five by twenty-three, chimney-piece extremely light and elegant: on the left a small dressing-room, very neat; chimney-piece very beautiful, the cornice of white polished marble, supported by pillars of Siena. This opens into the bed-chamber, twenty-five by twenty.

The beds and tables very finely carved and inlaid, the former of crimson damask, with covered tops and extremely elegant.

Returning to the music-room, you enter the grand dressing-room, twenty-five by twenty-three, which is fitted up with all possible taste; scarce any thing can be more beautiful than the mosaic ceiling, the cornices, and all the ornaments. The chimney-piece is exquisitely designed, and admirably executed: it is of white marble, wrought with the utmost taste, and beautifully polished. Over the cornice are festoons of the lightest carving, and two eagles, with a very fine basso relievo of carving in a glass in the center. The pictures are disposed with great elegance, and hung up by ribbons of gilt carving in the highest taste.

From this room you enter the saloon, forty-five by thirty. The ceiling, which is coved, is in mosaic compartments, green and white and gold; gilt medallions are let into it. The door-cases exceedingly elegant, their cornices supported by pillars most beautifully carved, and gilt with the same mixture of green as in the ceiling. The chimney-piece large, but very light; relievos of white polished marble, wonderfully elegant. Between the windows are two slabs very large, of the finest Siena marble, the frames carved in the most exquisite taste, and richly gilded; they are beyond all comparison more beautiful and rich than any we have seen. The pier-glasses of a vast size, single plates, and the frames of admirable workmanship. The carving and gilding of the sofa frames in a stile and taste till now unknown. In the center of the room hangs an exceeding fine glass lustre. On each side the chimney is an historical landscape, one Alexander and Diogenes; the expression good, but the colouring of both something of the Mannerist.

The next room is called the painted one, twenty-four by twenty-two. On one side is a bow window, ornamented with the most exquisitely carved and gilt pillars you can conceive. The walls and ceiling are painted in compartments by Mr. Stuart, in the most beautiful taste; even the very scrolls and festoons of the slightest sort, which are run between the square and circular compartments, are executed with the minutest elegance. The ground of the whole is green; and the general effect more pleasing than is easily conceived. Nothing can be lighter or more beautiful than the chimney-piece: the frieze contains a most exquisite painting representing a clandestine marriage, which, without variety or glare of colours, has all the harmony of their utmost power. Nothing can be finer than the drapery, which is designed with the justest taste, displaying the form of every limb through it in a most beautiful manner. The soft expression of the naked, and the beauty of the heads, are very great. We should observe, that two of the small compartments of the wall are landscapes, let into it with no other than the painted frame of the divisions; one represents a water-fall, and the other a bridge over a stream, both fine. The frames of the tables, sofas, stands, &c. &c. are all carved and gilt in the same taste as the other ornaments of the room, all with a profusion of richness, but with the utmost elegance. The peacock's feathers over one of the glasses, the turtles on a wreath of flowers, and the magpies on bunches of grapes, are very beautiful, and the deception of the first extraordinary. The bold relief of such slight strokes does honour to the pencil of the artist. The looking-glass window is a piece of taste, and has an happy effect.

At the south-east corner of Hyde-Park is a neat plain building, called

St. GEORGE'S HOSPITAL.

This hospital was first opened for the admission of patients, on the first day of January 1734, and has ever since been supported by voluntary subscriptions and donations, and so well attended and managed, that now it is one of the most flourishing hospitals in the kingdom.

Here are admitted the poor, sick and lame, who are supplied with advice, medicine, diet, washing, lodging, and some of the more distressed even with cloaths. The physicians visit their patients on Mondays and Fridays, and on all intermediate days whenever occasion requires; but the surgeon attends every day; and on every Friday morning there is a general consultation of all the physicians and surgeons. No security for the burial of the patients is required, nor any money, gift, or reward taken of them or their friends, on any account whatever. Those who die, if their friends are unable to bury them, are interred at the charge of the society. And the money collected in the poor box at the door, is kept as a separate fund for furnishing those with some little sum of money, whose distance from their habitations, or other particular necessities, require it.

The apothecaries, who are governors, are appointed to attend by rotation as visitors, to see that the apothecary of the house takes due care of the medicines and patients. Two visitors are chosen weekly out of the subscribers, to attend daily, and take care, by examining the provision and patients, that the orders of the society are punctually observed, that the patients are treated in every respect with order and tenderness, and to make a report in writing of their observations.

Prayers are read daily to the patients; a sermon is preached every Sunday, the communion is administered every month, and the chaplain attends at other times to catechize and perform other religious offices, as often as their cases require; and when the patients are discharged, religious tracts are given to each of them, for their farther edification.

A board of governors meet every Wednesday morning to do the current business of the hospital, to receive and examine the reports of the visitors, to discharge and admit patients, to receive the complaints and proposals of all persons, and to prepare such matters as are proper for the consideration of general boards. A general board of the governors meet regularly five times a year.

The governors are in number upwards of three hundred. No person receiving salary, fee, or reward from the hospital, is capable of being a governor; but every other gentleman subscribing 5l. a year, or upwards, or giving one benefaction of 50l. although he be not an annual subscriber, is thereupon put in nomination to be a governor, and at the first general court, which is held one month after, is accordingly ballotted for by the governors. The subscriptions are received by the treasurers, at the weekly board, held every Wednesday morning in the hospital.

The other rules and regulations of this hospital are as follow:

1. No person is to be admitted a patient, except in cases of accidents, without a note from a governor or contributor, specifying the name and place of abode of such patient, and that he or she is a proper object of this charity.
2. All recommendations are to be delivered every Wednesday morning by nine o'clock.
3. In case out-patients neglect coming two weeks successively on the day and hour they are ordered to attend, such out-patients shall be discharged for irregularity, except they have had leave from their physician.
4. No person discharged for irregularity is to be ever again admitted into the hospital, upon any recommendation whatsoever.
5. No patient is to be suffered to go out of the hospital without leave in writing; and to avoid giving offence, no leave is to be given to any patient to go into St. James's Park; or the Green Park, called Constitution-hill, upon any pretence whatsoever.
6. No governor, officer, or servant, must at any time presume, on pain of expulsion, to take of any tradesman, patient, or other person, any fee, reward, or gratification of any kind, directly or indirectly, for any service done, or to be done, on account of this hospital.
7. No person subscribing less than two guineas a year, can recommend more than two in-patients in the year.
8. When there is not room for all the patients recommended at one time to be received into the hospital, those are taken in whose admission the board are of opinion, will most effectually answer the end of the charity; and the rest, if proper objects, are admitted out-patients, till there is room for them in the hospital.

This hospital enjoys a fine situation, and has all the benefit of a clear and pure air. It is a very neat, though not an expensive building; and though it is extremely plain, yet it is not void of ornament. It has two small wings, and a large front, with only one door, which is in the middle, and to which there is an ascent by a few steps. On the top of this part of the building is a pediment raised above the rest of the edifice, and under this ornament is a stone with an inscription, expressing the noble use to which this structure is applied.

Near this hospital is a Lock-hospital, erected for the reception of persons afflicted with venereal disorders, and supported by voluntary subscriptions and donations.

Returning eastward we come to a street called

Piccadilly, on the south side of which is situated the parish church of

St. JAMES.

This is one of the churches that owes its rise to the increase of buildings and inhabitants; for the church of St. Martin in the Fields being too small for the inhabitants, and too remote from those in this quarter, the earl of St. Alban's, with other persons of distinction in that neighbourhood, erected this edifice at the expence of about 7000l. It was built in the reign of king Charles II. and though a large fabric, was considered as a chapel of ease, to St. Martin's; but being consecrated in 1684, it was dedicated to St. James, in compliment to the name of the duke of York, and the next year, when that prince had ascended the throne, the district for which it was built, was by act of parliament separated from St. Martin's, and made a distinct parish. The walls are brick, supported by rustic quoins of stone; and the windows, which are large, are also cased with stone. The tower at the east end rises regularly from the ground to a considerable height, and is crowned with a neat, well constructed spire.

This church is a rectory, in the patronage of the bishop of London; and is said to be worth 500l. per annum. The vestry is select; and the officers are, two churchwardens, four sidesmen, eight overseers, two burgesses, two assistant-burgesses, seven constables, fourteen scavengers, and two surveyors of the highways.

The remarkable places and things in this parish are,

Burlington-house, so called from its being the residence of the earls of Burlington. It is fenced from the street by a brick wall, about two hundred and twenty feet in length, in which are three coach gates. The front of the house is of stone, and is remarkable for the beauty of the design and workmanship. It has two wings, joined by a circular colonnade of the Doric order. The front was built by the late earl of Burlington. The apartments are in a fine taste, and the stair-case painted with great spirit, by Sab. Ricci. Behind the house is a spacious garden.

Here are several other magnificent houses, as Sunderland-house, Devonshire-house, and two new-houses, one erected by the earl of Bath, and the other by the earl of Egremont.

St. James's-square, which is neatly paved with heading-stone all over; in which there is a most curious oval basin, 150 feet diameter; in the center thereof is a pedestal about fifteen feet square, for a statue of king William III. on horseback; the whole is environed with iron rails eight square, and at each angle without the rails is a stone pillar about nine feet high, and a lamp on the top: the gravel walk within the rails is in breadth from each angle to the margin of the basin, about twenty-six feet.

Soho-square or King's-square, (a part of which only is in this parish) is of considerable extent, and as an area surrounded with high pales, enclosing a garden, in which is a statue of king Charles.

Charles II. standing upon a pedestal placed in the midst of a small basin. At his majesty's feet lie the representations of the four principal rivers, the Thames, Trent, Humber and Severn, pouring out their waters. On the south side of this square are Frith-street and Greek-street, on the east Sutton-street, on the north Charles-street, and on the west Deanmark-street.

Golden-square, which is very small, but neat, is adorned on the inside with grass-plats and gravel walks, and is surrounded with handsome iron rails.

St. James's-market.

Marlborough or Carnaby-market.

A large chapel in King-street, built in 1702 at the sole expence of archbishop Tension, who endowed the same. The morning preacher's salary is 70*l.* per annum, the afternoon preacher has 50*l.* per annum, and the two curates who read prayers have 20*l.* per annum each.

In Berwick-street there is a chapel; the morning preacher has 30*l.* per annum and the afternoon preacher has 20*l.* per annum.

In the same street is a French chapel.

A Presbyterian meeting-house in Swallow-street.

An Anabaptist meeting-house in Glass-house-street.

An opera and a playhouse in the Hay-market, in which there is also a market for hay and straw three days in a week, viz. Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.

There is a charity school in King's-street for thirty-six boys, who are the children of poor inhabitants, for schooling only.

Another over the watch-house for forty poor boys, who are taught to read, write, &c. at the charge of the offertory.

On the north part of Burlington-gardens is the charity-school, a handsome edifice, where eighty girls are boarded, clothed, taught, and placed out to service, &c. at the charge of divers subscribers and by collections.

In the upper burial-ground is a work-house capable of containing 300 poor people. When any of the poor fall sick, they are removed to the infirmary, which is in a street, called the Gravel Pits near Broad-street.

To the north from the parish we come to Great George-street, on the east side of which is situate the parish church of St. G E O R G E, Hamover-square.

This was one of the new churches erected with-in the bills of mortality, by act of parliament, in the reign of queen Anne, and was taken out of the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields. It has a plain body with an elegant portico; the columns, which are Corinthian, are of a large diameter, and the pediment has its acroteria, but without further ornament. It has a tower, which, above the clock, is elegantly adorned at the corners with coupled Corinthian columns that are very lofty: these are crowned with their entablature, which at each corner supports two vases, and over these the tower still rises till it is terminated by a dome crowned with a turret that supports a ball, over which rises the weather-cock.

This parish at first consisted of two outwards of that of St. Martin's in the Fields; but it has now four wards, named Conduit-street, Grosvenor-street, Dover-street and the out-ward.

It is a rectory, the advowson of which is settled upon the bishop of London and his successors. The profits arising to the rector are said to amount to about 600*l.* per annum. Lieutenant general Stewart gave the ground on which this church was erected, and some time after bequeathed to the parish the sum of 4000*l.* towards erecting and endowing a charity school therein.

The vestry is select; and the officers are, two churchwardens, two sidesmen, eight overseers, one burghess and his assistant, four constables, one headborough, four surveyors of the highways, three surveyors of the streets, and six scavengers.

The remarkable places and things in this parish are, Hanover-square; Grosvenor-square; a chapel in Conduit-street called Trinity chapel; a chapel at Knight's-bridge, and another near Grosvenor-square; part of Hyde-park, Chelsea water-works; a workhouse for the poor, and a market for meat and herbage.

Hanover-square, contains about two acres of ground, in the middle of which is a garden enclosed with rails: the houses are new built in the modern taste; they make a grand appearance, and are inhabited by noblemen and gentlemen of distinguished rank.

Grosvenor-square contains about five acres, and in the middle is a large garden surrounded with palisade pales placed upon a circular dwarf wall. This garden is laid out into walks, and adorned with an equestrian statue of king George I. gilt, which stands upon a pedestal in the center.

In Duke-street, Grosvenor-square, in this parish, is a lying-in-hospital, for unmarried as well as married women. It is supported by voluntary contributions; and any woman recommended by a governor or subscriber is received, and provided with assistance, and all necessaries, during the last state of pregnancy, and the month of lying-in.

This hospital, which first began in Jermyn-street, St. James's, and was from thence removed into Duke-street, is governed by a president, a vice-president, and a treasurer, annually elected out of the governors greater benefactors to this charity; by a general court of governors held in the months of March, June, September and December, to take the reports of the committees; and by a house committee who inspect accounts and transact such business as is laid before them.

A physicial committee is appointed at the general quarterly courts out of the physicians, men-midwives, surgeons, and apothecaries, who are to meet once a month to examine the medicines and drugs brought into the dispensatory, and none are suffered to be used without their approbation.

Two physicians and two surgeons attend twice a week on extraordinary cases; a surgeon and man-midwife every day from eleven o'clock till one

one; and such objects as come within these hours have advice in physic and surgery, without fee or reward, whether accidental or recommended.

Every governor or subscriber is entitled to send one in-patient at a time, and out-patients without limitation. All subscriptions are during pleasure. Those who contribute two guineas a year are governors while they continue their subscription, and those who give 20*l.* at one payment are governors during life, and have a vote and interest at the committees.

No officers or servants are permitted, on pain of expulsion, to take any fee, reward, or gratuity whatsoever, of patients or other persons, for any service done, or to be done in this hospital.

The poor women recommended by the governors and subscribers are received on Wednesdays and Fridays, from eleven o'clock till one.

Near Oxford-road, in this parish, is a plain, but commodious brick building, called

The MIDDLESEX HOSPITAL.

The charitable designs of this hospital were carried on for several years in two convenient houses adjoining to each other, in Windmill-street, Tottenham-court-road, where the first institution in August 1745, was intended only for the relief of the indigent sick and lame; but in July 1747, the governors, willing to render it more worthy the notice of the public, extended their plan to the relief of the pregnant wives of the industrious poor; when the great increase of patients soon obliged the governors to think of enlarging their edifice, as well as their plan; and the kind benevolence of the public by donations, legacies, &c. enabled them in 1755, to erect the present more extensive building. The apartments for the reception of the lying-in women are in a separate part of the building, remote from the sick and lame; and that ladies may visit the lying-in patients without being incommoded by the sick and lame, different stair-cases lead to each, the lying-in wards having no communication with the other.

The qualification of a governor of this charity is an annual subscription of three guineas; which also entitles the subscriber to recommend, and have in the house at one time, either one sick or lame patient, or one lying-in woman, and to recommend out-patients. A subscription of five guineas per annum entitles the subscriber to recommend one sick or lame in-patient, out-patients, and one lying-in woman. A subscription of thirty guineas at one payment constitutes the subscriber a governor for life, with the last mentioned privileges.

A committee of the governors meet at the hospital every Tuesday, at ten of the clock, to receive and discharge patients, and to transact the other necessary business of the house. The patients are attended by three eminent physicians, a man-midwife, three surgeons, and a divine. The physicians visit the patients every Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, and on intermediate days, when particular cases require it. The surgeons attend every day.

Patients are admitted on a letter of recommendation from a governor or contributor, who may recommend in-patients, and have out-patients on the books, according to the regulation before-mentioned; and when in-patients are recommended, and there is not room in the house to receive them, they are put on the list to be admitted on the first vacancy, and in the mean time are prescribed for as out-patients.

No security is required for burials.

All accidents are admitted without recommendation.

Tuesday being the day appointed for the admission of patients, they must be at the hospital, with their recommendations, at ten of the clock.

The physicians and surgeons meet every Saturday at twelve o'clock, at the hospital, where they give advice to all such diseased poor who shall come, though not recommended and require it.

Married women are only admitted (in the last month of their pregnancy) after they have been examined by the weekly board, and on their producing an affidavit made before a justice of peace, of the time and place of their marriage, and of the settlement of the husband, with the manner the said settlement was obtained, whether by birth, servitude, or otherwise.

The servants of the house are forbid to take any gratuity of the patients or their friends, on any pretence whatsoever, on pain of expulsion.

Proceeding eastward from Hanover-square, we come to Dean-street, Soho, on the west side of which, in the liberty of Westminster, is situate the parish church of #### St. A N N.

This church owes its foundation to the great increase of public buildings. The inhabitants of the parish of St. Martin's in the Fields became too numerous to be contained in the church, and therefore applying to parliament, this was erected in the year 1686, on a spot of ground then called Kemp's Field, and the parish to which it belongs was separated from St. Martin's in 1687.

The walls of this church are of brick with rustic quoins. The tower which is square, is strengthened with a kind of buttress, and at the springing of the dome, which supports the lantern, there are urns on the corners with flames. The lantern, which is formed of arches, is surrounded with a balustrade at the bottom, and over it is a turret crowned with a globe and fane.

The advowson of this church is settled upon the bishop of London, and the rector, instead of tythes, receives from the parishioners 100*l.* per annum which, together with the glebe, surplus fees, and easter-book, amount to about 300*l.* per annum.

The vestry is select; and the officers are two burgesses, two assistant burgesses, two churchwardens, four collectors for the poor, six constables, four beadles, four scavengers, and two surveyors of the highways.

Leicester-square, which contains an area of between two and three acres. On the north side is Saville-house, the winter residence of his present majesty while prince of Wales; and adjoining to that is Leicester-house, formerly the residence of the princess dowager of Wales. This square is enclosed with iron rails, and in the center is a gilt equestrian statue of his late majesty king George II. on a high pedestal.

Proceeding eastward from St. Anne's Soho, and from the liberties of Westminster, we leave Oxford-road and all the new buildings on the north side of that spacious-street, and come to the parish church of

St. GILES in the Fields.

This church is so called to distinguish it from St. Giles's, Cripplegate. The place in which it stands was formerly a village of the same name as the church, which was standing so early as the year 1222, though it was not made parochial till the year 1547. The little edifice for divine worship being taken down in the year 1623, a church of brick was erected in its stead; but the ground in its neighbourhood being gradually raised to the height of eight feet above the floor, it became very damp and unwholesome. On this the inhabitants, by consent of parliament, had it rebuilt, the sum of 8000*l.* being granted for that purpose. The old fabrick was taken down in 1730, and the present one erected three years after.

The church and steeple are built with Portland stone. The area of the church within the walls is sixty feet wide, and seventy-five feet in length; exclusive of the recess for the altar. The roof is supported with Ionic pillars of Portland stone, on stone piers, and is vaulted underneath. The outside of the church has a rustic basement, and the windows of the galleries have semicircular heads, over which is a medillion cornice. The steeple is one hundred and sixty feet high, and consists of a rustic pedestal, supporting a Doric order of pilasters, and over the clock is an octangular tower with three quarter Ionic columns supporting a balustrade with vases, on which stands the spire, which is also octangular and belted.

The whole expence of erecting this church amounted to 10,026*l.* 15*s.* 9*d.* It is a rectory in the gift of the crown, and the living is computed at 400*l.* per annum.

The vestry is select; consisting of the rector, two churchwardens and thirty-six inhabitants: and the officers are, two churchwardens, ten overseers, two sidesmen, five constables, ten head-boroughs, ten surveyors of the highways, and ten scavengers.

In this parish is one of the largest and most beautiful squares in London, if not in Europe, called Lincoln's-inn-fields. It was originally laid out by the celebrated Inigo Jones. The area contains about ten acres, in the middle of which is a basin of water, surrounded with grass and gravel walks, encompassed with an iron palisade, fixed upon a stone plinth. This square is bounded on the north, west, and south, with spacious and elegant buildings, and to the east with the wall of Lincoln's-in gardens. The north side is called Newman's row, the west side, Arch-row, the south side Portugal-row, and the east side Lincoln's-inn wall. Between these bounds and the palisades is a spacious avenue for carriages, and a path for foot passengers, paved with broad flat stones, and secured by posts at proper distances.

Nearly adjoining to this square is

LINCOLN's-INN.

This is one of the four inns of court, and is situate on the spot where formerly stood the houses of the bishop of Chichester and of the black friars, the latter erected about the year 1222, and the former about 1226; but both of them coming to Henry Lacey, earl of Lincoln, he built in their stead a stately mansion for his city residence. However, it afterwards reverted to the bishopric of Chichester, and was demised by Robert Sherbourn, bishop of that see, to Mr. William Syliard, a student there, for a term of years, at the expiration of which doctor Richard Sampson, his successor, in the year 1536, passed the inheritance thereof to the said Syliard and Eustace his brother; and the latter, in consideration of the sum of 500*l.* conveyed the house and gardens in fee to Richard Kingsmill and the rest of the benchers.

The charge of admission into this house, including fees, amounts to five pounds, and every student, after studying there seven years, is admitted to the bar. The members are obliged to be a fortnight in commons every term, on the penalty of forfeiting 18*s.* in case of absence.

This inn principally consists of three rows of good buildings occupied by gentlemen of the society. These form three sides of the square, and here the buildings are all new and uniform, the north side lying open to the gardens, which are greatly improved with gravel walks, grass plots, rows of trees, and a very long terrace walk. These gardens, which are extremely pleasant and commodious, are laid open for public use. The greatest part of the west side of the square is taken up with the offices belonging to the stamp duty. In the middle of the square is a neat fluted Corinthian column in a small basin surrounded with iron rails. This column supports a handsome sun-dial, which has four sides, and on the corners of the pedestal are four naked boys spouting water out of Triton shells.

Behind the north east side of the square is a good hall and chapel; the latter of which was built by Inigo Jones about the year 1622, on pillars, with an ambulatory or walk underneath, paved with broad stones. The outside of the chapel is a good piece of Gothic architecture, and the windows are painted with the figures at full length of the principal personages mentioned in the scriptures. On the twelve windows on the north side are, Abraham, Moses, Eli, David, and the prophets Daniel, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Amos, and Zachariah, with John the Baptist, and St. Paul, and on the south side are the rest of the apostles. Under these figures are the arms of a great number of gentlemen belonging to this society.

In the old buildings fronting the garden beyond the square, is the library, which consists of a good collection of books in several languages and faculties.

Besides these remarkables in the parish of St. Giles, there is a popish chapel in Duke-street, and several meeting-houses; two charity schools, an alms-house, and a work-house for the reception of the poor.

In Brownlow-street, Long-Acre, there is a lying-in hospital, supported by charitable contributions, for the relief of pregnant poor women, where such married women as are objects of charity, are amply provided with commodious apartments and beds, good nursing, plain suitable diet, proper medicines, and the advice and assistance of gentlemen of skill and experience in midwifery, as well as the attendance of midwives, in the last stage of their pregnancy, and during the month of lying-in. This hospital is nearly under the same direction and government, as those of a like nature, which have been already mentioned.

Proceeding more eastward we come to the parish and church of

St. GEORGE, Bloomsbury.

This is one of the fifty new churches appointed to be built by act of parliament within the bills of mortality. The name of St. George was given to it in honour of his late majesty; and it received the additional epithet of Bloomsbury, from its situation, to distinguish it from others of the same name. It is likewise farther distinguished by standing south and north, and by the statue of king George I. at the top of its spire.

This church was erected at the public expence, and consecrated in January 1731. A district for its parish was by authority of parliament taken out of that of St. Giles's, and the sum of 3000l. was given towards the support of its rector, to which being added 1250l. by the inhabitants of St. Giles's parish, both sums were ordered to be laid out in the purchase of lands, tenements, &c. in fee simple, as a perpetual fund for the maintenance of the rector and his successors; but the poor of this parish and that of St. Giles's in the Fields, are to be maintained by the joint assessment of both parishes, in the same manner as before their being divided.

This church is a rectory in the gift of the crown, and is valued at 400l. per annum. The vestry is select; and the officers are, two churchwardens, four overseers, two sidemen, two constables, two headboroughs, and two scavengers.

The remarkable places in this parish are,

The British Museum; a particular description of which, with the curiosities therein contained, the reader will find in p. 341, &c.

Bloomsbury square. This square is embellished with many good houses, and the grass plots in them idle surrounded with neat iron rails. The north side is entirely taken up with Bedford-house, which is elegant, and was the design of Inigo Jones. Besides the body of the house, are two wings, and on each side the proper offices.

One of the wings is a magnificent gallery, in which are copies of the cartoons at Hampton-court, as large as the originals, by Sir James Thornhill. Behind the house are extensive gardens, which command a view of the country, and particularly of Highgate and Hampstead.

From the north-east corner of Bloomsbury-square there opens a way to Queen's-square, thro' Southampton-row; at the south-west angle of which stands the parish church of

St. GEORGE, Queen-square,

This church likewise took its rise from the great increase of buildings. Several gentlemen at the extremity of the parish of St. Andrew Holbourn having proposed the erecting of a chapel for religious worship, Sir Streynsham Master, and fourteen of the other neighbouring gentlemen, were appointed trustees for the management of this affair. These gentlemen in the year 1705, agreed with Mr. Tooley to give him 3500l. for erecting a chapel and two houses, intending to reimburse themselves by the sale of pews; and this edifice being finished the next year, they settled annual stipends for the maintenance of a chaplain, an afternoon preacher who was also reader, and a clerk, giving to the first and second a salary of 100l. each, and to the last 50l. But the commissioners for erecting fifty new churches, resolving to make this one of them, purchased it, caused a certain district to be appointed for its parish, and had it consecrated in the year 1723, when it was dedicated to St. George, in compliment to Sir Streynsham Master, who had been governor of Fort St. George in the East Indies.

This church is a plain common building, void of all elegance; it is however convenient and well enlightened. The rectory, like that of St. Andrew's, is in the gift of the Montague family, but the value of the living is uncertain.

The vestry is select, consisting of thirty gentlemen; and the officers are, two churchwardens, two sidemen, two constables, and two headboroughs.

In this parish are two very fine squares, each consisting of about four acres. One is called Queen square, and is enclosed with very good houses on all sides, except the north, where it lies open to the fields, which renders it very airy and pleasant. The other is Red-lion-square, which is railed in, and adorned with an obelisk in the center.

In Great Ormond-street, in this parish, is Powis-house, thus called from its having been the town residence of the duke of Powis. It is reckoned one of the most beautiful buildings in and about London. In this street is also the house of Charles Jennens, esq; in which is one of the most capital collection of paintings in England.

In this parish likewise stands that commodious structure called the Foundling Hospital; the origin and description of which has been already given in p. 306, &c.

The next place of attention is

GRAY'S INN.

This inn is situate on the north side of Holbourn, near the bars, and is so called from its being formerly the residence of the ancient and noble family of Gray of Wilton, who in the reign of Edward III. demised it to several students of the law. It is one of the four inns of court, and is inhabited by barristers and students of the law, and also by such gentlemen of independent fortune, as chuse this place for the sake of an agreeable retirement, or the pleasure of the walks.

The members of the house are to be in commons a fortnight every term, for which they pay sixteen shillings. The officers and servants are, a treasurer, a steward, a chief and three under butlers, an upper and under cook, a panner man, a gardener, the steward, the chief butler's men, and two porters.

This inn consists chiefly of two very handsome quadrangles, one of which is called Coney-court, and was built in 1687; and one side of it contains a hall, a chapel and a library. The hall is a fine old structure, well built of timber, in the form of a college hall. The chapel is a Gothic building, lately beautified and repaired. The library is well furnished with books in various faculties and languages, for the use of the students. But the chief ornament belonging to this inn is a spacious garden, consisting of gravel walks, between lofty trees, of grass-plots, agreeable slopes, and a long terrace, with a portico at each end. The terrace is ascended by a handsome flight of steps.

Proceeding down Gray's-inn-lane, and turning to the north-east, we come to the parish and church of

St. JAMES, Clerkenwell.

This church, which is situate on the north side of Clerkenwell-green, is part of the ancient priory church, denominated from its dedication to St. James Minor, bishop of Jerusalem, and the monastery to which it belonged. It is a very heavy structure, partly Gothic, which was the original form, and partly Tuscan. The body, though it has not the least appearance of elegance, is well enlightened, and the steeple consists of a low heavy tower crowned with a turret. It is a curacy in the gift of the parish, and the stipend is no more than 4l. 19s. 10d.

The vestry is general; and the officers are, two churchwardens, four sidersmen, four overseers, five constables, nine headboroughs, two surveyors of the highways, and four scavengers.

In this place was anciently a priory, which was founded by Jordan Briset, a wealthy baron, who, about the year 1100, gave to Robert, his chaplain, fourteen acres of land in a field adjoining to Clerks, or Clerkenwell, whereon to build a monastery; which was no sooner erected and dedicated to the honour of God, and the assumption of the Virgin Mary, than he placed therein a certain number of nuns, in whom and their successors it continued till it was suppressed by Henry VIII. in the year 1539. Soon after which the site thereof became the inheritance of Sir William Cavendish, who being afterwards created duke of Newcastle, erected thereon the present spacious and stately square brick edifice on the north side of the church, and east side of the close.

The church of this parish, which was that of the late priory, for divers ages, not only served as a place for the nuns to celebrate the divine offices in, but it likewise accommodated the neighbouring inhabitants in the performance of their religious duties; and by its being made parochial (soon after the dissolution of its monastery) whereby 'tis manifest, that Clerkenwell at that time must have been a considerable village; and tho' at present it be, by the contiguous buildings, added to this great city, 'tis nevertheless in the county of Middlesex, hundred of Osulston, and manor of Finsbury; and owes its origin to the late monastery, as much as that did its name to the Clerks Well in that neighbourhood.

The steeple of this church being greatly decayed in course of time, a part thereof fell down in the year 1623, which occasioned the parish to contract with the builder, to re-edify the whole. This builder raised the new work upon the old foundation; and having carried on the same with the utmost expedition, the bells were soon after hung therein; but before the same was entirely finished, it fell down and destroyed part of the church, which were both soon after rebuilt, as they at present appear.

Adjoining to the north side of the church, is the beautiful ambulatory, or south side row of the cloister of the ancient priory, consisting of six arches; and although the eastern part of the said cloister be destroyed, yet the nuns hall, which was situate at the north end thereof, is still remaining, though at present it is converted into a cabinet-maker's workshop. And the garden on the east side was formerly the cemetery belonging to the nunnery.

At the lower end of Clerkenwell green, in Rag-street, opposite Mutton-lane, is the celebrated fountain, denominated Clerks, or Clerkenwell, so called from the parish clerks of the city of London, who antiently used to meet there annually, to represent certain parts of scripture in a theatrical manner; to which the Lord-mayor and citizens of London not only repaired, but likewise the nobility, to see their performances: from which well, the late priory, as well as the present church and parish, are denominated.

A little south east of Clerkenwell priory, where at present St. John's-square, &c. are situate, stood the house, or hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, which was founded by the aforesaid Jordan Briset, who, for that end, purchased of the prioress and nuns of Clerkenwell, ten acres of land (for which he gave them twenty acres in his lordship of Willinghale in Kent) whereon he erected the said hospital about the year 1110. But the church thereof was not dedicated to St. John the Baptist till the year 1185.

This magnificent fabrick was the chief seat in in England belonging to the Knights Hospitalers, who, from the greatest poverty, by the profuse liberality of simple Bigots and Enthusiasts, soon attained to that degree of riches and honour, that their prior was reckoned the first baron of the kingdom, and who for state and grandeur vied with the king. Such was the antipathy of the populace to these imperious knights, that the rebels of Kent and Essex under the conduct of Wat Tyler and Jack Straw, anno 1381, consumed this stately edifice by fire; but the same being rebuilt in a much more magnificent manner, it was suppressed by Henry VIII. in the year 1541. Soon after this it was converted into a repository of martial stores, and the royal hunting equipage; to which uses it was employed till the year 1550, when Edward Seymour, duke of Somerset, and protector of the kingdom, caused the church thereof, together with its lofty and beautiful steeple, to be demolished, and the stones thereof employed in building his stately and magnificent palace of Somerset-house. The site of this building and appurtenances is now St. John's-square, at the east end of which is a chapel dedicated to St. John, and endowed of late years by one Mr. Michell. There still remain two gates into this court or square, which bear the marks of great antiquity; but that on the south is the largest, and is called St. John's-gate.

In Cold Bath Fields, in this parish, is a very plain, but neat structure, called

The SMALL POX HOSPITAL.

The centre of this building, which projects a little from the rest, is terminated on the top by an angular pediment, on the apex of which is placed a vase upon a small pediment.

This excellent charity was instituted in the year 1746, supported by a subscription then made by several noblemen, gentlemen and ladies, who were desirous that a charity useful in itself, and so beneficial to the public, might be begun near this great metropolis, there not being any hospital of the kind in Europe.

This hospital consists of two houses, at a proper distance from each other in airy situations. That for preparing the patients for inoculation is a handsome new building near the new road Islington; and that for receiving them when the disease appears, and for the reception of patients in the natural way, is in Cold Bath Fields.

To this hospital belong two presidents, four vice-presidents, and a treasurer, who are annually elected out of the governors. There are a secretary, two apothecaries, a messenger, matrons, proper nurses, &c. No fee, reward, or gratuity, is to be taken from any patients, or other persons, on account of the hospital, on pain of expulsion.

Thirty guineas constitutes a governor for life; each of whom has a vote at all general courts and committees, and is entitled to have one patient in each house at a time.

Every person who subscribes five guineas per annum is entitled to have one patient in the hospital for the natural way at a time, provided their are three beds for men, and two for women patients, in reserve, for the recommendations of governors.

A committee of accounts, consisting of seven governors, is annually held between Lady-day and Michaelmas, who meet at least once a quarter to examine and audit all tradesmen's bills, which are afterwards ordered by the house committee for payment. The accounts are regularly kept, and open at all times for the inspection of the governors. Two governors are appointed visitors, by the house committee, for six months, who frequently attend the hospital for inoculation, and also that for the natural way, alternately. Every person destitute of friends, or money, and labouring under this melancholy disease, or desirous of being inoculated, is a proper object of this charity. Patients in the natural way are received every day: those for inoculation about eight times in the year, of which timely notice is generally given in some of the public papers.

There is no charge attending the admission of patients for inoculation, but patients in the natural way a deposit of one pound and six-pence, to answer the expences of burial in case of death, or to be returned to the person, who paid the same, when discharged the hospital. Proper dresses are provided for the patients, and worn by them in the hospital, while their own cloaths are fumigated with brimstone, which is always done before their discharge.

The sums received for the support of this hospital, from its first institution, amount to twenty-four thousand nine hundred and twenty six pounds. There have been received into the house, during that time, seven thousand nine hundred and forty-six patients, who had the small pox the natural way. Four thousand six hundred and ninety-eight patients have been inoculated, of whom six only are said to have died.

In Clerkenwell-green stands the New prison, erected in the year 1615, for criminals in the county of Middlesex. And in the close is a Bridewell for the confinement and correction of idle and disorderly persons.

At the south end of St. John's-street is a building called Hicks's-hall, being the session-house for the justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex. This building took its name from Sir Baptist Hicks, a mercer in Cheapside, and a justice of the peace, who erected it in 1612. Here the grand jury meet eight times a year to find bills of indictment against the criminals who are to be tried at the sessions-house in the Old Bailey. The hall is a plain brick building, with a portico at the entrance.

Besides these remarkables, there are in this parish an alms-house, three charity-schools, a market for sheep skins, two work-houses, and the New River water-works.

In the same parish is likewise an hospital called the Charter-house, which is a corruption of the word Chartreux, a name formerly used for a convent or priory of the Carthusians.

The buildings of this hospital, which are extremely rude and irregular, have nothing but their convenience and situation to recommend them. The rooms are well disposed, and the square square in the front is very neat, and kept in as good order as most in London. This square, and the large gardens behind, give a free air, and at one and the same time contribute both to health and pleasure.—For the origin and present state of the Charter-house, the reader is referred to p. 217.

In leaving this place, and the parish of St. James Clerkenwell, we cross Pickaxe-street, which brings us into Old-street road, on the north side of which, near the centre, is situate the parish church of ### St. L U K E.

This church owes its rise to the great increase of buildings in the parish of St. Giles, Cripplegate; for notwithstanding there being a chapel of ease, and several meeting-houses, the parish church could not contain half the inhabitants who were desirous of assembling there to attend divine worship. The commissioners for erecting the fifty new churches taking this into consideration, purchased a piece of ground in this parish, and erected one of those churches upon it; after which the inhabitants applying to parliament had the Middlesex liberty of St. Giles appointed for the parish; and by the same act 3500l. was granted to be laid out in fee simple, for the support of a rector, besides the profits of which the churchwardens were to pay him annually 120l. to be raised by burial fees.

The church was finished in 1732, and was consecrated the next year on St. Luke's day, when the name of that saint was given as its patron. Though the building is convenient and well enlightened with two rows of windows, it is a very singular structure. In the center of the west front is the entrance, adorned with coupled Doric pilasters; and to this door is an ascent by a small straight flight of steps. Over the entrance is a round window, and on each side a small tower covered with a dome, and ornamented with two windows in front, one of the usual form, and another over it, answering to that over the door. The tower is carried up square, and behind it the roof of the church forms to the west a kind of pediment, broken by the rise of the tower to which it joins on each side. The uppermost stage of the tower diminishes very considerably, and this, which is the base of an obelisk, supports on each side a dial. From hence rises, as a steeple, a fluted obelisk, which reaches to a great height, diminishing slowly, and being of a considerable thickness towards the top; the upper edges are chopped off, and the whole is terminated by a ball and fane.

The advowson of this church is in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, and it is not to be held in commendam; all licences and dispensations for that purpose being declared void by the before-mentioned act.

The vestry is neither select nor general, all being admitted that have either served or fined for offices; the parish officers are, two churchwardens, four overseers of the poor, four constables, sixteen headboroughs, thirteen scavengers, and four beadles.

In this parish is Tindal's, or the dissenting burial ground, and the artillery ground adjoining, both lying west-ward between the Doghouse-bar-road and Bunhill-row. And on the east side, at the north end of Upper Moorfields, stands the late foundation of

St. L U K E's H O S P I T A L.

This hospital which is appropriated for the reception of lunatics, is supported by private subscriptions, and is designed as an improvement upon Bethlem, which, at the time of its establishment, was incapable of receiving and providing for the relief of all the unhappy objects for whom application was made.

Patients are received into this hospital according to the order of time in which the petitions of their friends have been delivered to the secretary, without favour or partiality. They are even admitted without any expence, except only such as are parish poor must have their bedding provided, which they are at liberty to take away when discharged.

On the admission of any patient, two responsible housekeepers, residing within the bills of mortality, must enter into a bond to the treasurer for the time being, in the penalty of 100l. to take away such patient within seven days after notice given them for that purpose by the committee, or their secretary. These securities must leave their names with their places of abode in writing, delivered to the secretary at least four days before such admission, and must be approved of by the committee; but no governor can be security for any patient.

No person is to be admitted into this hospital who has been a lunatic above twelve calendar months; or has been discharged as an incurable from any other hospital for the reception of lunatics; or who has the venereal disease; is troubled with epileptic or convulsive fits, or is deemed an idiot; nor any woman with child.

The patients are not exposed to public view; nor is any money received for the use of this charity expended in entertaining the general court of committee at any of their meetings.

The general committee receive immediately into the hospital any patient who shall have been discharged cured, in case such patient relapses within two months. They likewise take in by rotation such patients as are discharged uncured; but the number of these in the house must not exceed twenty.

For transacting the business of this hospital, a general court is held twice every year, viz. on the second Wednesday in the months of February and August, and every general court consists of nine governors.

Every person paying twenty guineas or upwards, or paying five guineas, and signing an agreement to pay the like sum for the four next succeeding years, is admitted a governor, except all persons acting as physician, surgeon, apothecary, or secretary to this hospital.

At the general court held annually on the second Wednesday in the month of February, one president, four vice-presidents, a treasurer, a general committee, physician, surgeon, apothecary, and secretary, are elected for the year ensuing. And no person acting as physician, surgeon, or apothecary to any other hospital or infirmary, can be physician, surgeon or apothecary to this hospital.

At the general court held annually on the second Wednesday in August, a special committee of seven governors, who are not of the general committee, are appointed to audit and examine the several accounts relating to this hospital, and report their opinion of such accounts to the general court held on the second Wednesday in February following.

The president has power to order special general courts to be summoned as often as he thinks necessary; and upon every vacancy in the office of treasurer, physician, surgeon, apothecary, or secretary, a general court is summoned to meet, in order to fill up the vacancy: but no person is entitled to vote at such general court, unless he has paid his subscription money on or before the day in which the vacancy is declared.

The general committee consists of the president, vice-presidents, and treasurer for the time being, and of the five governors named as lessees in the lease of the ground on which the hospital is built, and of all persons who have paid roof or upwards for the use of the hospital; and of such twenty-four governors residing within the bills of mortality, as are annually elected for that purpose at the general court held on the second Wednesday in February, of which committee five at least are necessary to do business. They meet one stated day in every month, or oftener, if they see convenient, and at such other times as the treasurer, or any sub-committee for the time being appoint. And have power to hire, govern, and discharge the domestic servants of this hospital, to keep the buildings properly repaired, and purchase provisions, furniture, and other necessaries for the same: to admit and discharge patients: to see that the several books relating to the hospital be regularly kept: that all debts, legacies, annual subscriptions, and other revenues of this hospital be received and recovered as the same shall respectively become due: that all monies in the hands of the treasurer, above what is necessary in the opinion of the said committee for defraying the current expences of the hospital, be from time to time placed out in transferable government securities, and no other, in the names of the treasurer for the time being, and two of the vice-presidents, or of two such other governors as the general court shall appoint for that purpose; and that all just demands be regularly discharged at least once in six months.

For the more easy dispatch of business, this committee has power to summon sub-committees, one of which is called the house-committee; and such sub-committees have power to summon the general committee as often as they think proper.

All purchases of provisions, and other materials for the use of the hospital, are to be made as often as possible by contract: but no contract is to be made by which any member of the committee is directly or indirectly concerned.

A book, intituled, The Visitor's Book, is kept in the hospital, for the governors to enter complaints of any neglect or misconduct in the officers or servants, these complaints being signed by such governor's name are taken into consideration, and redressed by the committee.

The physician, who is allowed to have the liberty of pupils, attends every committee day, and one other day in the week, and as often otherwise as there is occasion. The surgeon also attends the hospital every weekly committee day, and as often as there is occasion; and the six apothecaries who generously attend and administer their medicines gratis, are there monthly by rotation, attending every weekly committee day, and two other days in the week, and as often at other times as there is occasion.

Every officer or servant who shall take any fee, gratuity, or reward, directly or indirectly, from any tradesman or other person dealing with this hospital, patient, or friend of any patient, in respect of any service done or to be done, shall forthwith be discharged, and rendered incapable of being received again into the service of this hospital. Except that it be lawful for the secretary of this hospital, upon his waiting on every governor with a staff and a printed copy of the rules and orders of this hospital, to accept of a fee not exceeding one guinea.

Close adjoining to the north side of this hospital is a building called the Foundery, which was originally used by a founder in his trade, but now more remarkable for being the chief methodist meeting under the direction of the Reverend John Wesley. And on the south side of Old-street road is another methodist meeting, called Mr. Whitfield's tabernacle, a different congregation from the above.

In Pest-house row, in the parish of St. Luke, is an alms-house, founded by George Palyn, citizen and girdler, for six poor members of his company, and endowed with an estate of forty pounds a year, of which the company is trustee.

Near this alms-house is a noble charity called

THE FRENCH HOSPITAL.

This hospital was erected in the year 1717, and the governors by letters patent of the 4th of king George I. in 1718, were constituted a body politic and corporate, by the name of "The governor and directors of the hospital for the poor French protestants, and their descendants residing in Great Britain."

This hospital contains two hundred and twenty poor helpless men and women, one hundred and forty-six of whom are upon the foundation, and are plentifully supplied with all the necessaries of life, at the expence of the hospital; but the other seventy-four are paid for by their friends, at the rate of 9l. per annum each. This charity also extends to lunatics, for whose accommodation a large infirmary is provided.

To this foundation belong a chaplain, physician, surgeon, and other officers, who carefully attend the pensioners, and administer to their several necessities.

In

In Pest-house Fields is an house erected in 1672, by the viscountess Lumley, for the accommodation of six poor women of Aldgate and Bishopsgate parishes, with an allowance of four pounds, and twelve bushels of coals per annum each.

In Pest-house-lane is an alms-house founded in 1616, by Edward Alleyn, a comedian, for ten poor men and women, who receive six-pence a week each, and a coat and gown every other year.

In George-yard, Old-street, an alms-house was erected in 1655, by Susan Amyas of London, widow, for the habitation of eight poor single men or women, who are allowed, as a body, twenty shillings a year for water, and six pounds a year for coals. Each of them has a separate allowance of four pounds a year; and twenty shillings a year are settled for one of the eight to read prayers every day.

Besides these remarkables, there are, in the parish of St. Luke, three charity schools, one free-school, and a work-house for the reception of the poor.

The next parish and church we come to is that of

St. LEONARD, Shoreditch.

This church is thus denominated from its dedication to St. Leonard, bishop of Leomeges in France, and its situation in the hamlet of Shoreditch.

There was a church in this place dedicated to the same saint in very early times, and there are records of a dispute concerning it in the reign of Henry II. The last structure, which was a very mean heavy pile, stood till the year 1735, when the inhabitants having the year before applied to parliament, it was pulled down, and the present light and elegant edifice was soon after erected in its stead.

To this church there is an ascent by a double flight of plain steps, which lead to a portico of the angular kind supported by four Doric columns, and bearing an angular pediment. The body of the edifice is plain, but well-enlightened, and the steeple light, elegant and lofty. The tower at a proper height has a series of Ionic columns, and on their entablature are scrolls which support as many Corinthian columns on pedestals, and supporting a dome, from whose crown rises a series of columns of the Composite order, on whose entablature rests the spire standing upon four balls, which give it an additional air of lightness, and on the top is a ball and vane.

This church is both a rectory and a vicarage; but the distinct rights of the rector and the vicar are said to be not thoroughly ascertained; however, the profits of the vicarage amount to about 350l. per annum.

The vestry is occasionally both select and general: and the officers are, two churchwardens, six overseers of the poor, four constables, eighteen headboroughs, six scavengers, four surveyors of the highways, and four beadles.

Among the various public buildings in this parish, one of the most remarkable is an hospital called

The Haberdashers Alms-houses, or Aske's Hospital.

This edifice was erected in 1692, by the company of Haberdashers, pursuant to the will of Robert Aske, esq; one of their members, who left thirty thousand pounds for the building, and the relief of twenty poor members of the company of Haberdashers, besides the maintenance and education of twenty boys, sons of decayed freemen of the same company. The men who are all to be single, have each an apartment of three rooms, with proper diet and firing, a gown once in two years, and three pounds per annum in money. The boys have also a ward to themselves, with all necessaries: their master, who reads prayers twice a day in the chapel, has, besides a house, 40l. per annum, which, together with the salaries of the clerk, butler, porter, and other domesticks, amounts to about 800l. a year.

This building, which is of brick and stone, is four hundred feet long, with an ambulatory in front of three hundred and forty feet, under a piazza, elevated on stone columns of the Tuscan order. In the middle of the building is a chapel, adorned with columns, entablature, and pediment of the Ionic order; and under the pediment is a niche, with a statue of the founder clothed in his gown, and holding in his hand a roll of parchment, which seems to be his last will. Under him is the following inscription:

ROBERTO ASKE Armigero, bujus Hospitii Fundatori, Socie. Haberd. B. M. P. C.

And on one side of him is this inscription:

Anno Christi MDCLXXXII. Societas Haberdasheorum de London hoc Hospitium condiderunt, ex Legato & Testamento Roberti Aske Armigeri, ejusdem Societatis; ad viginti Senum Alimenta, & totidum Puerorum Educationem.

On the other side the following:

The worshipful company of Haberdashers built this hospital, pursuant to the gift and trust of R. Aske, Esq; a late worthy member of it, for the relief of twenty poor members, and for the education of twenty boys sons of decayed freemen of that company

Fronting the entrance of the chapel is a large pair of very handsome iron gates, and at each end of the hospital is an edifice of the same height as the chapel.

In Kingland road is a very handsome and beautiful school built by subscription, in the year 1722, in which there are apartments for a master and mistress, who have 100 children under their care, viz. fifty boys and fifty girls, who are maintained by subscription, are clothed yearly, and have books provided for them.

Near

Near Hoxton are six alms-houses, containing twelve rooms for the widows of twelve weavers, each of whom has 1*l.* per annum paid quarterly, and twenty-four bushels of coals.

Near to these are twelve alms-houses for 12 poor widows of Shoreditch parish, each of whom has 4*l.* per annum and one sack of coals; founded by judge Fuller.

Also eight alms-houses, where eight poor widows of this parish have five shillings per month and half a chaldron of coals yearly; founded and endowed by John Walter, citizen and draper of London.

Likewise six houses for six poor men (or for men and their wives) of this parish, each of whom has 1*l.* a year; the gift of Allen Badger, esq; anno 1698.

Northward from the above, in Hoxton town, are two alms-houses built by Mr. Bearmore.

On the east side of Kingland road are twelve alms-houses, given by Mr. Samuel Harwar, citizen and draper of London, built in the year 1713; in six of them the drapers company put in decayed freemen, or their wives, and the other six are filled up by the parish. Every one has a load of coals yearly, and 6*s.* per month paid by the drapers company.

Near to these, in the same road is a large handsome building called

J E F E R I E S ' s A L M S - H O U S E .

This edifice, which consists of fourteen handsome well-built houses, and a chapel, was founded by Sir Robert Jefferies, knight and alderman, and Lord-mayor of London in 1686, who died in the month of February 1703. These houses were erected by the company of ironmongers in the year 1713, in each of which are four rooms and a cellar, so that they contain fifty-six poor people. He likewise left 15*l.* per annum to a minister to read prayers every day, and preach on Sundays. By the will of the donor, each of the poor people has 1*l.* 10*s.* per quarter, and somewhat more, paid by the ironmongers company, of which he was a member. No man is admitted under fifty-six years of age; and if married, his wife may cohabit with him, and be elected in his stead when he dies. The women are clothed in blue, and the men have gowns with hanging sleeves of the same colour. The donor's effigies is curiously carved, and placed in the front of the chapel.

In this parish there are likewise two charity-schools, and a large workhouse for the poor.

Proceeding from Shoreditch church southward, we traverse Spital-fields, and the parts adjacent, the grand seat of the weaving trade and manufacture in all branches. In which we find the liberty of Norton Falgate, containing about two hundred houses. It is extra-parochial, for the inhabitants maintain their own poor, and marry and bury where they please: but they generally make use of a chapel, built originally for them near Spital-yard, by Sir George Wheeler, prebendary of Durham.

Spital-fields was originally a hamlet belonging to the parish of St. Dunstan, Stepney; but is now a parish so made by act of parliament in 1723. In which year the foundation of their church was laid, and in 1729 it was finished, and dedicated to Our Saviour by the name of

C H R I S T C H U R C H, Spital-fields.

This is one of the fifty new churches, built of stone, with a very high steeple, in which is a fine ring of bells. The body of the church is solid and well proportioned: it is ornamented with a Doric portico, to which there is a handsome ascent by a flight of steps; and upon these the Doric order arises, supported on pedestals. The tower over these rises with arched windows and niches, and on its diminishing for the steeple, is supported by the heads of the under corners, which form a kind of buttresses: from this part rises the base of the spire, with an arcade; its corners are in the same manner supported with a kind of pyramidal buttresses ending in a point, and the spire is terminated by a vane and fane.

This church is made a rectory, but is not to be held in commendam. For the maintenance of the rector and his successors, the parliament granted the sum of 3000*l.* to be laid out in the purchase of lands and tenements in fee simple: besides which provision the churchwardens are by that act appointed to pay him annually the sum of 125*l.* to be raised by burial fees.

The vestry consists of those who have served or fined for overseers of the poor; and the officers are, two churchwardens, twelve auditors of accounts, four overseers, one sidesman, one constable, nine headboroughs, one surveyor of the highways, four scavengers, two surveyors of the streets, and one aleconner.

This parish enjoys the privilege of a market, which is of great reputation for all sorts of provisions. And here are two French and two English alms-houses, two charity schools and a workhouse for the poor.

At the north east corner of Hare-street, Spital-fields is situate the parish church of

S t . M A T T H E W, Bethnal-green.

This parish was formerly one of the hamlets of Stepney, from which it was separated by an act of parliament in the 13th year of his late majesty king George II. The church is a neat commodious edifice, built with brick coped and coined with free-stone; and the tower, which is not high, is of the same materials.

At Mile-end, in this parish is an hospital belonging to the corporation of Trinity-house. It was founded in 1695 for twenty-eight decayed or ancient seamen, who have been masters or pilots of ships, and for their widows, each of whom receive 16*s.* the first Monday in every month, besides 20*s.* a year for coals, and a gown every other year. This is a noble edifice, built of brick and stone, consisting of two wings, and containing twenty-eight apartments. In the centre, between the two wings, is a chapel, which rises considerably higher than the other buildings.

Here is likewise a beautiful building, school and chapel, called

BENCROFT'S Alms-house.

These were erected by the drapers company in the year 1735, pursuant to the will of Mr. Francis Bencroft, who bequeathed to that company upwards of twenty-eight thousand pounds, for purchasing a site, and building upon it an alms-house, with convenient apartments for twenty-four alms-men, a chapel and a school room for one hundred poor boys, and two dwelling-houses for two school-masters, and also for endowing the same; so that each alms-man should have eight pounds, and half a chaldron of coals yearly, and a gown of baize every third year; that the school-boys should be clothed, and taught reading, writing, and arithmetic; that each of the masters should have a salary of 30*l.* a year, and that both should have the yearly sum of 20*l.* for coals and candles for their own use, and that of the school; together with a sufficient allowance for books, paper, pens, and ink: every boy put out apprentice was taught to four pounds, but only two pounds ten shillings if put out to service.

This edifice is not only neat, but extremely elegant, consisting of two wings and a center detached from both of them. In the middle of the front is the chapel, before which is a noble portico, with Ionic columns, and coupled pilasters at the corners, supporting a pediment, in the plane of which is the dial. There is an ascent to the portico by a flight of steps; and over the chapel is a handsome turret. On each side of the portico are two houses like those in the wings. The construction of the wings is uniform, lofty and convenient: twelve doors in each open in a regular series, and the windows are of a moderate size, numerous, and proportioned to the apartments they are to enlighten. The square is surrounded with gravel walks, with a large grass-plot in the middle, and next the road the wall is adorned with handsome iron rails and gates. It is remarkable that the above Mr. Francis Bencroft, who left so large a sum for erecting and endowing this fine hospital, and even ordered two sermons to be annually preached in commemoration of his charity, was one of the Lord-mayors officers, and by informations and summoning the citizens before the Lord-mayor, upon the most trifling occasions, and other things not belonging to his office, not only pillaged the poor, but also many of the rich, who rather than lose time in appearing before that magistrate, gave a ready acquiescence to his demands, which together with his numerous quarterages from the brokers, &c. enabled him to amass annually a considerable sum of money. But by these and other mercenary practices, he so incurred the hatred and illwill of the citizens, of all rank and denomination, that the persons who attended his funeral obsequies, with great difficulty saved his corpse from being thrown off the bearers shoulders in the church by the enraged populace; who, raising the bells, rang them for joy at his lamented death.

In this parish are also eight alms-houses belonging to the drapers company, twelve belonging to the skinners company, twelve to the vintners company, and twelve others known by the name of Fuller's alms-houses, from having been founded in 1592 by a judge of that name. In Dog-row, near Mile-end, is an alms-house built in 1711, by captain Fisher, for the widows of six masters of ships. And at Bechnat-green is an alms-house, founded by Mr. Bermeeter, for six poor women.

At the north east extremity of this parish the bloody Bonner, bishop of London, had a house, where he was wont to torture the protestants; which, though now converted into many dwelling houses, retains the name of Bonner's-hall.

Proceeding to the south-east from Spital-fields, we come to Whitechapel road, on the south side of which, at the stones end stands the parish church of

St. MARY, Whitechapel.

This church was originally erected as a chapel of ease to the church of St. Dunstan, Stepney; and from its external appearance probably received the additional epithet of White. We read of this church so early as the year 1329, and the first chapel was probably of much greater antiquity.

The old church being in a very ruinous condition in 1693, it was taken down and rebuilt in the present form. It is a coarse and very irregular building. The body, which is formed of brick, and ornamented with stone rustic work at the corners, is ninety-three feet in length, sixty three in breadth, and the height of the tower and turret eighty feet. The principal door is adorned with a kind of rustic pilasters, with cherubims heads by way of capitals, and a pediment above. The body has many windows, which are of various forms and different sizes, a sort of Venetian, oval and square. The square windows have ill-proportioned circular pediments, and the oval, or more properly elliptic windows, some of which stand upright, and others crossways, are surmounted with thick festoons. The steeple, which is of stone, and appears to be a part of the old structure, rises above the principal door, and is crowned with a plain square battlement, in the center of which rises a small turret with its dome and fanes.

This church is a rectory, in the gift of the principal and scholars of King's hall and Brazen-Nose College, Oxford; and the incumbent's profits are said to be worth 350*l.* per annum.

The vestry is general; and the officers are, three churchwardens, six overseers of the poor, one constable, sixteen headboroughs, ten scavengers, two surveyors of the highways, and three beadles.

On the south side of Whitechapel road, in this parish, and near a place called Whitechapel-mount, is a large and commodious brick building, erected by voluntary contributions, called

THE LONDON INFIRMARY.

This hospital is supported by charitable contributions, for the relief of all sick and diseased persons;

fons; and, in particular, manufacturers, seamen in the merchants' service, and their wives and children. It was instituted on the second of November 1740, in a large house in Prescot Street, Goodman's Fields, which is at present the Magdalen-house; but that becoming too small for this extensive charity, a new, more capacious and more commodious building, was erected by the voluntary contributions of several governors, in an airy situation, near the Mount in Whitechapel road.

This is a very neat brick building, contrived to be plain and yet elegant, without being very expensive; and it consisting of one extended front, without either wings or inner courts, the whole is seen at one view. To the middle door is an ascent by a flight of steps, and over this part extends a very large angular pediment, within which is a dial. Above the ground floor extend two series, of each twenty-three sash windows, their number and the length of the building giving it an air of dignity. The architect has properly considered the use for which it is designed, and has suited every thing to convenience. It is properly furnished, and fitted up with about one hundred and sixty beds for the reception of the patients.

The society for carrying on this laudable undertaking consists of a president, two vice presidents, and a treasurer, annually elected out of the most considerable benefactors to this charity, and of such persons, who by giving a benefaction of thirty guineas or more at one time, become governors for life; and those who subscribe five guineas or more a year, are governors during such subscription.

A general court of governors is held in the months of March, June, September and December, to take the reports of the committee, elect a house committee for the ensuing quarter, inspect accounts, and transact such other business as may be then laid before them. The anniversary feast of this charity is held between the first of February and the last day of April, when a printed account of the general state of the hospital, the number of patients received and discharged, and an abstract of the accounts for the year past is laid before them.

A house committee of thirteen governors is appointed at every general quarterly court, who at their first meeting elect a chairman to preside for the first quarter, who meet at the hospital on Tuesdays weekly, at eleven in the forenoon, to receive and dismiss patients, to order and inspect the provisions and furniture sent in, and such necessities that may be wanting, and to examine and regulate the conduct of the servants and patients, and other matters which come before them, according to the constitution of this charity. All governors that please to attend, have a vote at this committee, and their attendance is esteemed a favour.

A committee of accounts, consisting of twelve governors, is appointed at the general quarterly court in June, for one year, who meet at the hospital once a quarter, to examine and audit tradesmen's bills, which are paid by the treasurer.

within a fortnight after. The accounts are open at all times for the inspection of the governors.

A physical committee consisting of the governors who practise physic, surgery, or pharmacy, or are conversant in the knowledge of drugs or medicines (excepting such as shall be directly or indirectly concerned in serving the hospital with such necessities) are summoned by order of the house committee for the time being every first Thursday in the month, and have power to order and inspect the necessary drugs and medicines, and report their proceedings to the general quarterly court by their chairman.

Two governors are appointed visitors by the house committee, for one fortnight to attend twice a week, or oftener, if they think proper, to inspect into the management and conduct of the house, during the interval of the meetings of the house committee.

A clergyman of the church of England reads prayers every day, and preaches every Sunday, and reads prayers morning and afternoon; administers the sacrament regularly every month; and is ready to visit, pray by, and administer the sacrament at all times when required, to the patients in the wards.

Three physicians attend alternately; two of the surgeons daily, from eleven o'clock till one, without fee or reward, and give their advice and assistance to all such objects as come within those hours, whether recommended or accidental. A surgeon extraordinary attends in consultation, in all dangerous cases. The surgeons in waiting have an apprentice, or pupil, constantly in the house, to receive, and, if necessary, to call the surgeon to such accidents as shall be brought in at any hour of the day or night.

An apothecary (with an assistant) constantly resides at the hospital, who compounds and dispenses all medicines used here, and solely attends the business thereof.

A steward (for whose fidelity proper security is given) has the charge of the house and furniture, keeps and account of every thing brought to or expended in the house, and subjects the same to the examination of the visitors and house committee, and has the inspection likewise of the conduct of all the men-servants. Two matrons have the direction of the nurses and other women-servants, and see the diet and medicines administered according to order. Under them are nurses and watchers, in proportion to the number of patients, who are guided by written orders, to prevent any misconduct. Proper diet for the patients has been settled by the physicians and surgeons engaged in this charity, and is fixed up in the wards for the satisfaction of the patients and their friends.

No officers or servants are permitted, upon pain of expulsion, to take of any tradesmen, patients, or other persons, any fee, reward, or gratuity of any kind, directly or indirectly, for any service done, or to be done, on account of this hospital.

Every governor is entitled to send one in-patient at a time, and out-patients without limitation. Subscribers of smaller sums may likewise send what number of out-patients they please. All subscriptions are during pleasure, and any small sums from well-disposed persons will be thankfully received; but in order to carry on this undertaking, all persons are desired to pay their subscription at the time of subscribing.

The poor objects recommended as in-patients, if there are beds empty, are received at any hour without difficulty or expence, and are supplied with advice, medicine, diet, washing, lodging, and every comfortable assistance during their cure: nor is any security required against future contingencies, they being, in case of death, buried at the expence of the charity, if not removed by their friends. All out-patients have advice and medicines administered from eleven till one.

All accidents, whether recommended or not, are received at any hour of the day or night.

This is the plan of this noble charity; and such has been the extraordinary encouragement given to it, that from the third of November 1740, to the first of January 1759, the sums generously contributed to its support amounted to seventy-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-three pounds, a great part of which is laid out in government securities. But what is still more extraordinary, one hundred and thirty-seven thousand two hundred and fifty-two distressed objects have been relieved at this hospital; and from labouring under the oppression of some of the most malignant diseases and unhappy accidents, have been reinstated in their honest and industrious capacities of working; and, so far as our observation reaches, their morals much amended, whereby the public again enjoy the benefit of their labour, and they, and their families, are preserved from perishing, and prevented from being an incumbrance to the community. And, notwithstanding the great number of objects relieved by this charity, it has not lessened the number of patients relieved by other hospitals.

The subscribers are desired to take notice, that if any patients do not conform to the rules of the house, or are guilty of any misbehaviour, they will be discharged, and never more relieved by this charity: and not to send any patient unable to walk, till they are first assured of room in the house; and when they recommend an in-patient, whose settlement is in the country, it is further requested, that they will satisfy the house committee concerning the removal of such patient, when cured, or judged incurable.

“No persons of known ability to pay for their cure, are allowed to partake of this charity; nor any with infectious distempers, or deemed incurable by the physicians and surgeons, or any in consumptive or asthmatic condition, are admitted into this house, being more capable of relief as out-patients.”

The patients, being admitted without any expence, are required to be constant in their attendance on the physicians or surgeons at the hospital, before eleven o'clock; and at nine o'clock, to return thanks at the chapel, and at the weekly committee next after their cure; and those only who attend their cure, and return thanks, will receive a certificate thereof, which will entitle them to future relief.

On the south side of Whitechapel are six alms-houses, containing twelve rooms for as many poor widows of this parish, each of whom has 5l. 4s. per annum and a chaldron of coals, founded by William Meggs, esq; which having become ruinous have lately been rebuilt by Mr. Goodwin, late of this parish.

In Whitechapel-road is a court, called his majesty's court of record for the manor of Stepney, for the trial of debts under 5l. contracted within the said manor. Here is also a prison for debtors, called Whitechapel prison. Likewise two free schools in one house, erected at the proper costs and charges of Ralph Davenant, rector of this parish.

Proceeding to the south from Whitechapel-road, we find, on the north side of the Thames, the parish and church of

St. A N N E, Limehouse.

This is one of the fifty new churches appointed by act of parliament to be built within the bills of mortality. The foundation was laid in the year 1712, but it was not finished till 1729. It is of a very singular construction; the body is not one plain building, but is continued under separate portions. The door under the tower has a portico, covered with a dome supported by pilasters, and to this door there is an ascent by a flight of steps. The tower, which is square, has a Corinthian window adorned with columns and pilasters. The corners of the tower are also strengthened by pilasters, which on their tops support vases. The upper stage of the tower is plain, and extremely heavy, and from this part rises a turret at each corner, and a more lofty one in the middle.

This church is a rectory, the parish of which was taken out of St. Dunstan, Stepney, and like that is in the gift of Brazen-nose college, Oxford. It is valued at 60l. to be paid annually to the rector by the churchwardens, and the produce of 3500l. given by parliament to purchase an estate in fee simple.

The vestry consists of such only as pay two shillings per month to the poor; and the officers are, two churchwardens, two overseers of the poor, one constable, four headboroughs, two scavengers, two surveyors of the highways, and one beadle.

Adjoining to this parish is the hamlet of Poplar and Blackwall, which form a street upwards of a mile in length, inhabited by seafaring people, and such as are concerned in ship-building. About the middle of Poplar, on the north side, is a set of alms-houses founded for widows of seamen in the India service; adjoining to which is a large chapel of ease to this part of the parish of St. Dunstan, Stepney (of which hereafter.) Blackwall is remarkable for the mooring of Indiamen at the stairs; and for a considerable ship-yard, where many East-Indiamen are both laid up and built.

Proceeding westward from St. Anne's, Limehouse, we come to Ratcliff-cross, near which, in Broad-

Broad-street, is a school, also a set of alms-houses, with a chapel, founded by Nicholas Gibson in 1537, and left in trust to the coopers company, with a considerable estate for their support: and at the north-west angle of School-house-lane, in Brook-street, is a noted quakers meeting.

Adjoining to Ratcliffe, on the west end is the parish and church of #### St. P A U L, Shadwell.

This church, which is a rectory, situate on the south side of Upper Shadwell, owes its name to its being dedicated to St. Paul the Apostle, and its situation; the advowson whereof is in the dean and chapter of St. Paul's.

Shadwell, though now joined to London, was anciently a hamlet belonging to Stepney; but being greatly increased in the number of its inhabitants, Thomas Neale, esq; erected the present church in the year 1656 for their accommodation; and in 1669 this district was by act of parliament constituted a distinct parish from that of Stepney, and 120l. per annum was granted for the maintenance of the rector in lieu of tythes, besides a considerable glebe, oblations and church dues, which, together, are supposed to make the value of the living upwards of 300l. per annum.

The church, which is but a mean edifice built with brick, is eighty-seven feet long, and sixty-three broad; the height to the roof is twenty-eight feet, and that of the steeple sixty. The body has a few windows with rustic arches, and some very mean ones in the roof. At the corners of the building are balls placed on a kind of small pedestals. The tower is carried up without ornament, and is terminated with balls at the corners in the same manner as the body of the church, and is crowned with a plain low turret.

The vestry is general; and the officers are, two churchwardens, four collectors for the poor, one constable, seven headboroughs, two scavengers, and two beadles.

This parish, which is one of the Tower Hamlets, received the name of Shadwell from a spring or well which at this time lies buried under a pillar near the south west corner of the church, within the church-yard. And the south part of the parish, denominated Lower Shadwell, being anciently part of Wapping Marsh, it was within the course of the river Thames, till the same was embanked.

The streets in this parish, called Old and New Gravel-lanes, were so denominated from their being anciently ways wherein carts laden with gravel from the neighbouring fields used to pass to the river Thames, where it was used in ballasting ships, before ballast was taken out of the said river.

In the north east part of this parish (now called Sun Tavern-fields) a Roman cemetery was discovered about the year 1615, wherein were found two coffins; one whereof, being of stone, contained the bones of a man; and the other of lead, beautifully embellished with scollop shells and a eronister border, contained those of a woman, at whose head and feet were placed two urns of the height of three feet each; and at the sides divers beautiful red earthen bottles, with a number of lachrymatories of Hexagon and Octagon forms; and on each side of the inhumed bones were deposited two ivory scepters of the length of eighteen inches each; and upon the breast the figure of a small cupid curiously wrought, as were likewise two pieces of jet, resembling nails, of the length of two inches.

The person here interred, according to the opinion of that judicious antiquary Sir Robert Cotton, who made the discovery, must have been the consort of some prince or Roman pretor, by the decorations of the coffin, and things therein contained.

At the same time were likewise discovered a great number of urns, with Roman coin, which on one side had this inscription, Imp. Papienus Maximus P. F. and on the reverse, with hands conjoined, Patrus Senatus.

The remarkables in this parish at present are, the church, a presbyterian meeting-house, two charity schools, an alms-house, a market, a dock for ship building, and a work-house for the reception of the poor.

More to the west from this parish, on the east side of Canon-street, stands the parochial church of #### St. GEORGE in the East.

This is one of the fifty new churches appointed to be built by act of parliament in the reign of queen Anne, the foundation of which was laid in 1715, and the structure finished four years after.

This is a massy structure, erected in a very singular taste. The floor is raised a considerable height above the level of the ground; and to the principal door, which is in the west front of the tower, is an ascent by a double flight of steps, cut with a sweep, and defended by a low wall of the same form; but the most remarkable thing is, there are two turrets over the body of the church, and one on the tower, which last is in the manner of a fortification, with a staff on the top for an occasional flag.

This parish is taken out of that of Stepney; and by act of parliament the hamlet of Wapping Stepney is appropriated to that purpose, and in all respects rendered independent of Stepney parish. Towards the maintenance of the rector and his successors the parliament gave the sum of 3000l. to be laid out in the purchase of lands, tenements, &c. in fee simple; and as a farther provision, the churchwardens are annually to pay him the sum of 100l. to be raised by burial fees. The advowson of this rectory, like that of Stepney, is in the principal and scholars of King's hall, and Brazen-Nose College, Oxford.

The vestry consists of such as pay two shillings per month to the poor; and the officers are, two churchwardens, four overseers of the poor, one constable, twelve headboroughs, four scavengers, two surveyors of the highways, and two beadles.

In this parish we find a turnpike at the north end of Canon-street; two squares, in one of which is a Sweden church, and in the other a Danes church; two meeting houses of the anabaptist.

baptist persuasion; and a noble foundation for poor boys and girls by Mr. Raine, brewer; it is situate in Fowden-fields, Old Gravel-lane for 50 boys and 50 girls. And the same gentleman in 1737, also founded an hospital near to the said school, and erected a handsome commodious brick building for 48 girls, to be taken out of the said school to be kept to work, &c. till fit for service; and 100l. to be given every May-day to portion one of those girls, chosen by lot, to be married at that time.

From hence, crossing Old Gravel-lane, we come to the parish church of St. J O H N, Wapping.

The old church was built in the year 1617, when the increase of houses in the parish of St. Mary Whitechapel rendered such an edifice necessary. It was dedicated to St. John the Baptist, and as there were other churches under the patronage of the same saint, it was distinguished, from its situation, by the name of Wapping. Originally it was no more than a chapel of ease to St. Mary's parish; but in 1694 the hamlet of Wapping was constituted a distinct parish; the inhabitants were empowered to purchase 30l. per annum in mortmain, and as a farther provision for the rector, he was allowed to receive all ecclesiastical dues, except tithes, instead of which the rector has 130l. a year raised upon the inhabitants by an equal pound rate.

From the ruined situation of this church, a new one has been very lately erected in its stead. It is a neat brick building, and consists only of a plain body, with a tower, from which rises a spire.

The advowson is in the principal and scholars of King's Hall, and Brazen Nose College, Oxford.

The vestry is neither select nor general, all being admitted who have either served or fined for offences. The officers are, two churchwardens, four overseers of the poor, one constable, seven headboroughs, four scavengers and one beadle.

The site of this parish, together with the parts adjoining, were antiently within the flux of the river Thames; but when, or by whom they were at first embanked is unknown. By frequent inundations of the river Thames, its banks in these parts became great sufferers; for about the year 1565 divers breaches were made therein, which were no sooner repaired, than another happened in the year 1571; when the commissioners of sewers, after viewing the same, were of opinion, that the most effectual way to secure the bank of the river in those parts, would be to erect houses thereon: to which end ground was taken, and the first foundations of houses laid where Wapping at present is situate.

In this parish is Execution Dock, so called from its being the place where pirates and others who have committed capital crimes at sea, are executed on a gallows which leans over the water.

In Cock-alley, near the church, is a charity-school for forty boys, who have learning and cloaths by subscription.

Near the same alley is a school for twenty girls.

Six poor children of this parish are educated at the free-school erected in the parish of Allhallows Barkin; pursuant to the will of alderman Hickson, bearing date the 16th of February 1686.

Proceeding from hence through the Hermitage, we come to the parish church of St. CATHARINE.

This church, which is situate on the east side of St. Catharine's-court near the Tower, was originally an hospital, founded by Matilda consort to king Stephen, and was farther endowed by queen Eleanor, the relict of Henry III. Queen Eleanor consort to Edward I. and king Henry VI. who not only confirmed all the former grants, and added several additional ones, but gave an ample charter to this hospital. It was exempt from the jurisdiction of the bishop of London, till its suppression by Henry VIII. soon after which king Edward VI. annexed it to the diocese of London. The church, which is a very antique building, is at present collegiate, and has a master and three brethren, who have 40l. each; three sisters who have 20l. and ten beads-women who have 8l. per annum each; but the other profits arising from their estates, being only known to the master and brethren, are divided amongst them.

Having now gone through and described the several parishes and churches, &c. of the cities of London and Westminster, Borough of Southwark, and their respective liberties, we shall now subjoin a list of their chapels, together with those in all other parts within the bill of mortality belonging to the established church; likewise the number of all the meeting-houses of the several denominations, both domestic and foreign, within the said district.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Containing an account of the principal towns and villages within that circumference of the city of London called the Bill of Mortality; with an ample description of the public buildings, and other remarkables contained in each respective place.

As these towns and villages are dispersed in various parts round this vast metropolis, we shall, for the sake of uniformity, digest them in alphabetical order. To effect which we begin with the village of

B A T T E R S E A.

THIS village is situate on the river Thames, about four miles from London, and the same distance from Richmond. The gardens about this spot are remarkable for producing the finest asparagus. It gave the title of baron to the late lord viscount St. John, who had a seat here, which is a plain old building. And in this place Sir Walter St. John founded a free school for twenty boys.

BOW.

B O W.

This village is situate a little to the east of Mile-end, and is likewise called Stratford le Bow. It received the name of Bow from the stone arches of its bridge built over the river Lea, by Maud wife of Henry I. The church built by Henry II. was originally a chapel of ease to Stepney, but was lately made parochial.

This village is inhabited by many whitsters and scarlet dyers, and here has been set up within these few years a large manufactory of porcelain, which is brought to such perfection as to be very little inferior to that of China.

Here is an annual fair held on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, in Whitsun week, for toys, &c.

B R E N T F O R D.

This town, which is situate about eight miles from London, received its name from a brook called Brent, which runs through the west part of the town, named Old Brentford, into the Thames. As it is a great thoroughfare to the west, it has a considerable trade, particularly in corn, which is brought both by land and water. The church and market house stands in that part of the town called New Brentford. It has also two charity schools, though the church, which has been lately new built, is only a chapel to Great Eling. That part of it called Old Brentford is situate upon a fine rising bank close to the Thames, directly opposite to which, on the other side the river is Kew Green, which from hence appears to great advantage.

B R O M L E Y.

In this village, which is situate near Bow, was formerly a monastery. The great house here was built by Sir John Jacob, bart. commissioner of the customs at the restoration, and afterwards became the seat of Sir William Benson, sheriff of London in the reign of queen Anne, the father to William Benson, esq; auditor of the imprest, who some years ago sold it, with the manor and rectory, to Mr. Lloyd, a gentleman of Wales.

C H A R L T O N.

This village, which is very pleasant and well built, is situate near Blackheath, and is remarkable for a fair held annually in its neighbourhood on St. Luke's day. It is called Horn Fair, and there are sold at it ram's horns, horn toys, and wares of all sorts. Of the origin of this fair tradition gives us the following account. King John having a palace at Eltham, and being hunting near Charlton, then a mean hamlet, was separated from his attendants; when entering a cottage he admired the beauty of the mistress, whom he found alone, and debauched: her husband, however, suddenly returning, caught them in the fact, and threatening to kill them both, the king was forced to discover himself, and to purchase his safety with gold, besides which he gave him all the land from thence as far as the place now called Cuckold's Point, and also bestowing on him the whole hamlet, established a fair, as a condition of his holding his new demesne, in which horns were both to be sold and worn. A sermon is preached on the fair day in the church, which is one of the handsomest in the county, and was repaired by Sir Edward Newton, bart. to whom king James I. granted this manor. This gentleman built his house at the entrance of the village. It is a long Gothic structure, with four turrets on the top; it has a spacious court-yard in the front, with two large Gothic piers to the gates, and on the outside of the wall is a long row of some of the oldest cypress trees in England. Behind the house are large gardens, adjoining to which is a small but neat park. This house now belongs to the earl of Egmont.

On the edge of the hill, and at a small distance from the church, are two fine houses, one of which was in the possession of the late governor Hunter, and the other was erected by the late lord Romney.

C H E L S E A.

This is a very large and populous village, situate on the banks of the Thames, about a mile to the westward of St. James's park.

In this village there is a beautiful edifice for the reception of old soldiers and invalids in the land service, called CHELSEA HOSPITAL, the ROYAL HOSPITAL, and sometimes CHELSEA COLLEGE.

The original building on this spot was a college founded by Dr. Sutcliff, dean of Exeter, in the reign of king James I. for the study of Polemic divinity, and was endowed in order to support a provost and fellows, for the instruction of youth in that branch of learning. The king, who laid the first stone, gave many of the materials, and promoted the work by a large sum of money, and the clergy were very liberal upon the same occasion; but the sum settled upon the foundation by Dr. Sutcliff being far unequal to the end proposed, the rest was left to private contributions; and these coming in slowly, the work was stopped before it was finished, and therefore soon fell to ruin. At length the ground on which the old college was erected, becoming escheated to the crown, Charles II. began to erect the present hospital, which was carried on by James II. and completed by William and Mary.

The whole edifice, which was built by the great Sir Christopher Wren, consists of a vast range of buildings. The front toward the north opens into a piece of ground laid out in walks for the pensioners; and that facing the south, into a garden which extends to the Thames, and is kept in good order. This side affords not only a view of that fine river, but of the county of Surry beyond it. In the center of this edifice is a pediment supported by four columns, over which is a handsome turret, and through this part is an opening which leads through the building. On one side of this entrance is the chapel, the furniture and plate of which was given by king James I. and on the other side is the hall, where all the pensioners dine in common, the officers by by themselves. In this hall is the picture of king Charles II. on horseback, with several other pieces as big as the life, designed by Signior Vario, and finished by Mr. Cook. These were presented by the earl of Ranelagh. The pavement of both the chapel and hall are black and white marble. The altar-piece in the chapel is the resurrection, painted by Sebastian Ricci.

The wings, which extend east and west, join the chapel and hall to the north, and are open towards the Thames, on the south: these are near three hundred and sixty feet in length, and about eighty in breadth; they are three stories high, and the rooms are so well disposed, and the air so happily thrown in by means of the open spaces, that nothing can be more pleasant. On the front of this square is a colonade extending along the side of the hall and chapel, over which, upon the cornice, is the following inscription in capitals:

In subsidium et levamen emeritorum senio, bello-que fractorum, condidit CAROLUS II. Auxit JACOBUS II. Perfecere GULIELMUS et MA-RIA, Rex et Regina, MDCXC.

And in the midst of the quadrangle is the statue of king Charles II. in the ancient Roman dress, somewhat bigger than the life, standing upon a marble pedestal. This was given by Mr. Tobias Rustat, and is said to have cost him five hundred pounds.

There are several other buildings adjoining, that form two other large squares, and consist of apartments for the officers and servants of the house; for old maimed officers of horse and foot, and the infirmary for the sick.

An air of neatness and elegance is observable in all these buildings. They are composed of brick and stone, and which way soever they are viewed, there appears such a disposition of the parts as is best suited to the purposes of the charity, the reception of a great number, and the providing them with every thing that can contribute to the convenience and pleasure of the pensioners.

Chelsea Hospital is more particularly remarkable for its great regularity and proper subordination of parts, which is very apparent in the north front. The middle is very principal, and the transition from thence to the extremities, is very easy and delightful.

The expence of erecting these buildings is computed to amount to one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, and the extent of the ground is above forty acres.

In the wings are sixteen wards, in which are accommodations for above four hundred men, and there are besides in the other buildings, a considerable number of apartments for officers and servants.

These pensioners consist of superannuated veterans, who have been at least twenty years in the army; or those soldiers who are disabled in the service of the crown. They wear red coats lined with blue, and are provided with all other cloaths, diet, washing and lodging. The governor has five hundred pounds a year; the lieutenant-governor two hundred and fifty pounds; and the major one hundred and fifty pounds. Thirty-six officers are allowed six-pence a day; thirty-four light horsemen, and thirty serjeants, have two shillings a week each; forty-eight corporals and drums have ten-pence per week; and three hundred and thirty-six private men, are each allowed eight-pence a week. As the house is called a garrison, all the members are obliged to do duty in their respective turns; and they have prayers twice a day in the chapel, performed by two chaplains, who have each a salary of one hundred pounds a year. The physician, secretary, comptroller, deputy treasurer, steward, and surgeon, have also each one hundred pounds per annum, and many other officers have considerable salaries. As to the out-pensioners, who amount to between eight and nine thousand, they have each seven pounds twelve shillings and six-pence a year.

These great expences are supported by a poundage deducted out of the pay of the army, with one day's pay once a year from each officer and common soldier; and when there is any deficiency, it is supplied by a sum raised by parliament. This hospital is governed by the following commissioners; the president of the council, the first commissioner of the treasury, the principal secretary of state, the paymaster general of the forces, the secretary at war, the comptrollers of the army, and by the governor and lieutenant governor of the hospital.

Besides this hospital, there is at Chelsea, a physic-garden belonging to the apothecaries company. It contains almost four acres, and is enriched with a vast variety of plants, both domestic and exotic. This garden was given to the apothecaries company by Sir Hans Sloane, bart. on condition of their paying a quit-rent of five pounds a year, and delivering annually to the president and fellows of the Royal Society, at one of their public meetings, fifty specimens of different sorts of plants, well cured, and of the growth of this garden, till the number of specimens amount to two thousand.

In this village is also a celebrated place of public resort, called RANELAGH GARDENS, from their formerly belonging to the earl of Ranelagh. This is one of those public places of pleasure, which is not to be equalled in Europe, and is the resort of people of the first quality. Though its gardens are beautiful, it is more to be admired for the amphitheatre. This is a circular building, the external diameter is one hundred and eighty-five feet: round the whole is an arcade, and over that a gallery with a balustrade (to admit the company into the upper boxes) except where the entrances break the continuity. Over this are the windows, and it terminates with the roof. The internal diameter is one hundred and fifty feet, and the architecture of the inside corresponds with the outside, except that over every column, between the windows, termini support the roof. In the middle of the area, where the orchestra was at first designed, is a chimney having four faces. This makes it warm and comfortable in bad weather. The orchestra fills up the place of one of the entrances. The entertainment consists of a fine band of music, with an organ, accompanied by the best voices. The regale is tea and coffee.

In this village likewise is a useful engine called CHELSEA WATERWORKS, the management of which is invested in a society, who were incorporated by act of parliament in the year 1722, by the name of "The governor and company of the Chelsea waterworks." They have a common seal, and power to purchase lands, &c. in mortmain to the value of 1000l. per annum, with a right to alienate and dispose of the same as they shall think proper. The works are divided into two thousand shares; and a governor, deputy-governor, and thirteen directors are appointed to conduct the business of the company.

C H E S W I C K.

In this village which is situate on the north bank of the Thames, about four miles from London, are two manors, one belonging to the prebendary of Cheshwick in St. Paul's cathedral, and the other called the dean's manor, from belonging to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's.

The most remarkable building in this place is the house of the late earl of Burlington, which was originally very plain but commodious, with good offices about it; but a part of the old edifice being some years ago destroyed by fire, his lordship erected near it a beautiful villa, which, for elegance of taste, surpasses every thing of its kind. The court in the front, which is of a proportionable size with the building, is very nearly gravelled. On each side are yew hedges in panels, with termini placed at a proper distance; and in the front of these hedges are two rows of cedars of Libanus, which at a small distance have a fine effect. The ascent to the house is by a noble flight of steps, on one side of which is the statue of Palladio, and on the other that of Inigo Jones. The portico is supported by six fine fluted columns of the Corinthian order, with a pediment; and the cornice, frieze and architrave are very elegant.

Though the other front towards the garden is plainer, yet it is in a very bold, noble and masterly stile, and has at the same time a pleasing simplicity, as hath also the side front towards the Serpentine river, which is different from the other two. The inside of this structure is finished with the utmost elegance; the ceilings are richly gilt and painted, and the rooms adorned with the following pictures executed by the best masters.

Having thus described the paintings within this beautiful structure, we shall now proceed to the gardens, which are laid out in the most elegant taste.

On descending from the back part of the house, you enter a verdant lawn planted with clumps of evergreen, between which are two rows of large stone vases. At each end next the house are two wolves in stone, done by that celebrated statuary Scheemaker. At the farther end are two large lions, and the view is terminated by three fine antique statues, dug up in Adrian's garden at Rome, with stone seats between them.

On

On the right hand, turning to the house, is an open grove of trees, which affords a view of the orangery, that is seen as perfectly as if the trees were planted on the lawn; and when they are in flower their fragrance is diffused over the whole place, even to the house.

Leaving the house to the left, an easy slope covered with short grass takes you down to the serpentine river, on the side whereof are clumps of evergreens, with agreeable breaks, between which the water is seen; and at the farther end is an opening into an inclosure, where are a Roman temple, and an obelisk, with grass slopes, and in the middle a circular piece of water.

You are led from hence to the wilderness, through which are three strait avenues terminated by three different edifices; and within the quarters are serpentine walks, through which you may ramble near a mile in the shade. On each side the serpentine river are verdant walks, which accompany the river in all its turnings. On the right hand of this river is a building that is the exact model of the portico of the church of Covent Garden; on the left is a wilderness laid out in regular walks, and in the middle, across the river, is a Palladian wooden bridge.

Besides this beautiful building, there are several other very elegant seats in this village; as the earl of Shrewsbury's, the earl of Grantham's, now colonel Elliot's, and the late lord Wilming-ton's, &c. Here is likewise a very good charity school.

DULWICH.

This is a very pleasant village, situate about five miles from London, where there is a spring of exceeding good mineral water, which principally supplies this city, and in particular St. Bartholomew's hospital.

Opposite the Green Man, a noted house for entertainment, is a fine ascending walk through the woods, which affords from its top a very noble prospect; but this is much exceeded by a hill behind the house, where from under a tree distinguished by the name of "The Oak of Honour," you have a view as in a fine piece of painting, of the houses as well as churches, and other public edifices, from Putney down to Chelsea, with all the adjacent villages, together with Westminster, London, Deptford, Greenwich, &c.

The principal building in this village is the college, the foundation and present state of which the reader will find in p. 222. The original edifice is in the old taste; but part of it has been lately pulled down and rebuilt with greater elegance. The master's rooms are richly adorned with very noble old furniture, which he is obliged to purchase on his entering into that station; and for his use there is a library, to which every master adds a number of books. The college is also accommodated with a very pleasant garden, adorned with walks, and a great number of flowers and fruit-trees.

ELTHAM.

In this town, which is situate about seven miles from London, in the county of Kent, was a palace built by Anthony Beck, bishop of Durham, who bestowed it upon queen Eleanor, the wife of Edward I. King Edward II. constantly resided in this place, and his son being born here, was on that account called John of Eltham. The palace was afterwards much enlarged by the succeeding kings, who when the court was kept at Greenwich often retired thither; and here were made the statutes of Eltham, by which the king's house is still governed. At this time, however, there are no traces of the palace left. The town has the honour of giving the title of earl to the prince of Wales; and there are here several houses belonging to wealthy citizens, and two charity schools.

FULHAM.

This village is situate on the banks of the Thames, about four miles from London. The Danes encamped here in the year 879, and the place was held of the king by the canons of St. Paul's in the time of William the Conqueror. It is now only remarkable for several gentlemen's seats, besides a palace of the bishop of London, who uses it in summer; and for a wooden bridge over the Thames to Putney, where toll is not only taken for horses and carriages, but likewise for foot passengers.

HACKNEY.

This is a very large and populous village, situate on the north-east side of London. The parish has several hamlets belonging to it, among which are Clapton on the north, Dorlestone and Shacklewell on the west, and Hummertown on the east.

The church belonging to this village was a distinct rectory and vicarage in the year 1292, and dedicated to St. Augustine; but the knights templars having obtained a mill and other possessions in the parish, they were, upon the suppression of their order, granted to the knights templars of St. John of Jerusalem, from whom the church is supposed to have received the present appellation of St. John. However, it was not presented to by that name till after the year 1660. It is in the gift of Mr. Tyson, lord of the manor, but in ecclesiastical affairs is subject to the bishop of London. The vestry, which is select, consists of thirty-seven members; and the officers are, two churchwardens, two overseers of the poor, three constables, ten headboroughs, two surveyors of the highways, and one beadle.

This village being anciently celebrated for the numerous seats of the nobility and gentry, occasioned a great resort thither of persons of all conditions from the city of London; whereby so great a number of horses were daily hired to the city on that account, that at length all horses to be let received the common appellation of Hackney horses; which denomination has since communicated itself both to public coaches and chairs. And though this place is deserted by the nobility, yet it so greatly abounds with merchants and other persons of distinction, that it excels all other other villages in the kingdom in the riches and opulency of its inhabitants, as may be judged from the great number of persons who keep carriages therein.

In this village are two meeting houses, viz. a presbyterian meeting near the church, and an independent meeting in Mare-street; besides a presbyterian meeting house at Clapton. Here are also six boarding schools, a free school, a charity school, and several alms-houses.

At the bottom of Hackney Marsh there have been discovered within these few years the remains of a great stone causeway, which, by the coins found there, appears to have been one of the famous highways made by the Romans.

HAMPSTEAD.

This village is situate near the top of a hill about four miles on the north-west side of London. On the summit of this hill is a heath, which is adorned with many handsome houses, and extends about a mile every way, affording a most beautiful prospect over the city as far as Shooter's hill, and into the counties around it. This village used to be formerly resorted to for its mineral waters; and there is here a fine assembly room for dancing. Its old ruinous church, which was a chapel belonging to the lord of the manor, was some few years ago taken down, and a new one erected in its stead: besides which, there is a handsome chapel near the wells, built by the contribution of the inhabitants, who are principally citizens and merchants of London.

HIGHGATE.

This is a very large and populous village, situate about four miles north of London. It received its name from its high situation on the top of a hill, and a gate erected there about four hundred years ago, to receive toll for the bishop of London; upon an old miry road from Grays-inn to Barnet being turned through that bishop's park. The gate, however, has been very lately taken down, and the road laid entirely open.

The church, which is a very old edifice, is a chapel of ease to Pancras and Hornsey; and where it stands was formerly an hermitage, near which the lord chief baron Cholmondely built and endowed a free-school in 1562, which was enlarged in the year 1570, by Edwin Sandys, bishop of London, and a chapel added to it.

On that side of this village next London, the fineness of the prospect over the city, as far as Shooter's-hill, and below Greenwich, has occasioned several handsome edifices to be built; among which is a very fine house erected by the late Sir William Ashurst. Here are likewise several dissenting meeting houses.

ISLEWORTH or THISTLEWORTH.

In this village, which is pleasantly situated on the Thames opposite to Richmond, are two charity schools; and in its neighbourhood are the seats of several persons of distinction.

Between this village and the town of Brentford, stands a handsome building called Sion House, one of the seats of the right honourable the duke and dutchess of Northumberland. It received the name of Sion from a monastery which was founded by Henry V. in the year 1414, very near the place where the house now stands, and was endowed with 1000 marks per annum, for the maintenance of sixty nuns. It was dedicated to St. Saviour and St. Bridget; from the latter of whom the nuns were called Brigettines, and were of the order of Augustines, as reformed by some new regulations made by the aforesaid Bridget.

This monastery was almost one of the first that was suppressed by Henry VIII. perhaps not on account of any great irregularities of behaviour which had been discovered in it by the visitors, but because the members of that society had been remarkably favourable to the king's declared enemies, and particularly to the maid of Kent; for she met with a very kind reception amongst them, and so far excited the curiosity of the neighbourhood, as to induce the famous Sir Thomas More to have two private conferences with her at this very place.

When the monastery was suppressed, its revenues amounted to one thousand nine hundred and forty-four pounds, eleven shillings and elevenpence three farthings; and on account of its fine situation, it was not sold nor given immediately to any court-favourite, but appropriated to the king's own use. And accordingly we find, that when the corpse of Henry VIII. was to be removed from Westminster to Windsor to be interred, it lay the first night, not at Richmond, as is commonly supposed, but at Sion; which by this means became the scene in which a prophecy was supposed to be fulfilled. For father Peto, preaching before the king at Greenwich in 1534, told him, that the dogs would lick his blood as they had done Ahab's. Now, as the king died of a dropical disorder, and had been dead a fortnight before he was removed to Sion, it so happened, that some corrupted matter of a bloody colour ran through the coffin at that place. Whereupon the incident, though a natural consequence of the aforesaid circumstances, was misconstrued into a completion of Peto's pretended prophecy, and considered as a piece of divine justice inflicted upon the king for having forced the Brigettines from their religious sanctuary. In the next reign the monastery was given by the king to his uncle the duke of Somerset, the protector, who in 1547 (as is generally supposed) began to build Sion-House, and finished the shell of it, as it now remains, except a few trifling alterations.

The house is built on the very spot where the church belonging to the monastery formerly stood, and is a very large, venerable, and majestic structure, built of white stone, in the form of a hollow square, so that it has four external and as many internal fronts: the latter of which surround a square front in the middle. The roof is flat, covered with lead, and surrounded with indented battlements, like the walls of a fortified city.

city. Upon every one of the four outward angles of the roof, there is a square turret, flat-roofed, and embattled like the other parts of the building. The house is three stories high, and the east front, which faces the Thames, is supported by arches, forming a piazza. The gardens formed two square areas, inclosed with high walls before the east and west fronts, and were laid out and finished in a very grand manner; but being made at a time when extensive views were judged to be inconsistent with that solemn reserve and stately privacy affected by the great, they were so situated as to deprive the house of every beautiful prospect which the neighbourhood afforded. None of them at least could be seen from the lower apartments. To remedy in some measure that inconvenience, the protector built a very high triangular terrace in the angle between the walls of the two gardens; and this it was that his enemies afterwards did not scruple to call a fortification, and to insinuate that it was one proof, amongst many others, which they alledged of his having formed a design very dangerous to the liberties of the king and people. Such was the state of the gardens as finished by the protector. After his attainder and execution on the twenty-second of January 1552, Sion was confiscated to the crown. Whereupon the furniture of the apartments, in which the duke had lived, (and they were probably a part of the old monastery) were given to Sir John Wroth the keeper, and the new house, that is, the present house at Sion, to the duke of Northumberland, which then became the residence of his son, the lord Guildford, and his daughter-in-law, the unfortunate Jane Grey. The duke being beheaded on the twenty-second of August, 1553, Sion-house once more reverted to the crown. Three years after this, queen Mary restored it to the Bridgettines; and it remained in their possession until the society was expelled by queen Elizabeth in the first year of her reign. Such of the nuns as persisted in their errors carried away their portable treasure, and settled successively at Zurickzee in Zealand, at Mechlin, Roan; and lastly at Lisbon, where the society still subsists.

Some years after this second dissolution, which Sion had undergone as a monastery, it was granted, by a lease of a long term, to Henry, earl of Northumberland, who, in consideration of his eminent services to the government, was permitted to enjoy it by paying a very small rent as an acknowledgement. This acknowledgment, however, was entirely laid aside by James I. who, considering his lordship no longer as a tenant, gave Sion to him and his heirs for ever. Many improvements were made in his time; for it appears from one of his lordship's letters to the king in 1613, that he had laid out 9000*l.* in the house and gardens, which sum was probably expended in finishing them according to the protector's plan. His son Algernon, afterwards appointed lord high admiral of England, succeeded to the estate in November 1632. He employed Inigo Jones, to new face the inner court, to make many alterations in the apartments, and to finish the great hall in the manner in which it appears at present.

In the year 1646 the dukes of York and Gloucester, and the princess Elizabeth, were sent hither by an order of the parliament, and, according to lord Clarendon, were treated by the earl and countess of Northumberland in all respects as was most suitable to their birth. The unhappy king frequently visited them at Sion in 1647, and thought it a great alleviation of his misfortunes to find his children so happy in their confinement. The duke of Gloucester and the princess Elizabeth continued at Sion till 1649, at which time the earl resigned them to the care of his sister the countess of Leicester. In 1682, Charles duke of Somerset married the lady Elizabeth Percy, the only daughter and heiress of Josceline earl of Northumberland, by which means Sion, and the immense estate of the Percies, became his grace's property. The duke and dutchess lent this house at Sion to the princess of Denmark, who honoured it with her residence during the time of a misunderstanding which arose between her royal highness and her sister.

On the death of Charles duke of Somerset, Algernon earl of Hertford, his only surviving son, succeeded to the title and a vast estate, and soon after gave Sion to his daughter and son-in-law, the present dutchess and duke of Northumberland, to whose fine taste and liberality are owing the many and great improvements which have been made since that time.

It has been already observed, that the old gardens were indeed very grand and magnificent, according to the fashion of the age in which they were made, but, in consequence of the taste that then prevailed, they deprived the lower apartments of almost every advantage of prospect, which the fine situation of Sion house naturally affords. To make the necessary alterations, required nothing less than his Grace's generosity. Accordingly, the high triangular terrace, which the protector had raised at a great expence, was removed, the walls of the old garden were taken down, and the ground before the house levelled, and it now forms a fine lawn, extending from Isleworth to Brentford. By these means also a beautiful prospect is opened into the king's gardens at Richmond, as well as up and down the Thames. Towards the Thames the lawn is bounded by an ha-ha, and a meadow; which his lordship ordered to be cut down into a gentle slope, so that the surface of the water may now be seen even from the lowest apartments, and the gardens. In consequence of these improvements, the most beautiful piece of scenery imaginable is formed before two of the principal fronts; for even the Thames itself seems to belong to the garden, and the different sorts of vessels, which successively sail as it were through them, appear to be the property of their noble proprietor.

The house stands nearly in the middle point of that side of the lawn, which is the farthest from the Thames, and communicates with Isleworth and Brentford, either by means of the lawn or a fine gravel walk, which in some places runs along the side, and in others through the middle of a beautiful shrubbery; so that even in the most retired parts of this charming maze, where the prospect is most confined, almost the whole vegetable getable world rises up as it were in miniature around you, and presents you with every foreign shrub, plant, and flower, which can be adopted by the soil of this climate. His lordship has not only thus improved the ground where the old gardens stood, but has also made a very large addition to it, and separated the two parts, by making a new serpentine river. It communicates with the Thames, is well restored with all sorts of river fish, and can be emptied and filled by means of a sluice, which is so contrived as to admit the fish into the New River, but to prevent their returning back again into the Thames.

His grace has also built two bridges, which form a communication between the two gardens; and has erected in that, which lies near Brentford, a stately Doric column, upon the top of which is a fine proportioned statue of Flora, so judiciously placed as to command as it were a distinct view of the situation over which she is supposed to preside.

At a proper distance from the house are the kitchen gardens, which are very large, and contain every thing, as an hot house, fire-walls, &c. The greenhouse is a very neat building with a Gothic front, the back and end walls of which are the only remains of the old monastery.

This building stands near a circular basin of water, well stored with gold and silver fish; and in the middle of the basin is a spouting fountain, which is well supplied, and kept perpetually playing.

Before we leave the description of this beautiful structure, we cannot help taking notice of the great gallery, which extends the whole length of the east front of the arcades, and of that immense quantity of old china vases, of different forms and sizes, which are crowded together in almost every apartment. It is likewise to be observed, that many fine prospects may be seen from the leads on the top of the house; for they command a view of the country to the distance of twelve or fourteen miles, and consequently the greatest part of London may be seen from them. We must also add, that the gardens, when viewed from the top of the house, form a more beautiful landscape than can easily be imagined.

ISLINGTON.

This village is situate on the north side of London, to which, by the late increase of buildings, it is almost contiguous. It appears to have been originally built by the Saxons, and in the time of William the Conqueror was called Ifendon or Ifledon.

The principal building in this village is the church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, and is one of the prebends of St. Paul's. The original edifice was erected in the year 1503, and stood till 1751, when it being in a ruinous condition, the inhabitants applied to parliament for leave to rebuild it, and soon after erected the present structure, which is a very substantial brick edifice, though it does not want an air of lightness. The body is well enlightened, and the angles strengthened and decorated with a plain rustic. The floor is raised considerably above the level of the church-yard, and the door in the front is adorned with a portico, which consists of a dome supported by four Doric columns; but both the door and the portico appear too small for the rest of the building. The steeple consists of a tower, which rises square to a considerable height, terminated by a cornice supporting four vases, at the corners. Upon this part is placed an octangular balustrade, from within which rises the base of the dome in the same form, supporting Corinthian columns with their shafts wrought with rustic. Upon these rests the dome, and from its crown rises the spire, which is terminated by a ball and its fane. Though the body of the church is very large, the roof is supported without pillars, and the inside is extremely commodious, and very neatly ornamented.

The vestry is general; and the parish officers are, three churchwardens, four overseers of the poor, six constables, seven headboroughs, three surveyors of the highways, and one beadle.

This parish is very extensive, and includes Upper and Lower Holloway, three sides of Newington Green, and part of Kingsland. There are in Islington two independent meeting-houses, and a charity-school, founded by dame Alice Owen, for educating thirty children. This foundation, together with that of a row of almshouses, are under the care of the Brewers company. There is here also a spring of chalybeate water in a very pleasant garden, which for some years was honoured by the constant attendance of the princess Amelia, and many persons of quality, who drank the waters. To this place, which is called New Tunbridge Wells, many people resort, particularly during the summer, the price of drinking the waters being three pence for each person. Near this place is a house of entertainment called Sadler's Wells, where, during the summer season, people are amused with ropedancing, tumbling, and pantomime entertainments.

At the south-west side of this village is a fine reservoir called the New-River Head, which consists of a large basin, into which the New River discharges itself; part of the water is from thence conveyed by pipes to London, while another part is thrown by an engine through other pipes up hill to a reservoir, which lies much higher, in order to supply the more rising parts of London.

Here is an ancient manor house, denominated Canonbury, from its having formerly belonged to the prior and canons of St. Bartholomew in Smithfield; the eastern part whereof still shews it to be of great antiquity. This mansion, at present vulgarly called Cambray-house, is pleasantly situate on a beautiful eminence, on the east side of this village, and commands three delightful prospects to the east, north and south.

KENSINGTON.

This is a very large and populous village, situated about two miles west from London: and is remarkable for a royal palace, which, in the reign of his late majesty, was generally the summer residence of the court.

This

This building, which was the seat of the lord chancellor Finch, afterwards earl of Nottingham, was purchased by king William, who greatly improved it, and caused a royal road to be made to it through St. James's and Hyde Parks, with lamp-posts erected at equal distances on each side. Queen Mary enlarged the gardens: her sister, queen Anne, improved what she had begun; and was so pleased with the place, that she frequently supped during the summer in the Greenhouse, which is very beautiful: but her late majesty queen Caroline completed the design, by extending the gardens from the great road leading to Acton; by bringing what is called the serpentine river into them, and by taking in some acres out of Hyde Park, on which she caused a mount to be raised, with a chair upon it, that could be easily turned round, so as to afford shelter from the wind.

These gardens, which are three miles and a half in compass, are kept in great order, and in summer time, when the court is not there, are resorted to by great numbers of people, who from a decent appearance and behaviour, obtain easy admittance. Though this palace is very irregular, in point of architecture, yet the royal apartments are extremely grand, and some of the pictures with which they are adorned are executed by the best masters.

When you pass the base court, you enter thro' a large portico into a stone gallery, that leads to the great stair-case, which is very handsome, and consists of several flights of black marble steps, adorned with iron balusters finely wrought. The painting here affords the view of several balconies with groups of figures representing yeomen of the guard, and spectators, among whom are drawn Mr. Ulrick, commonly called the young Turk, in the Potonese dress in which he waited on his majesty king George I. Peter the wild youth, &c. The stair-case is richly decorated and painted by Mr. Kent.

The first room is hung with very fine tapestry, representing the goddess Diana hunting, and killing the wild boar. Over the chimney is a picture in a grand taste, representing one of the Graces in the character of Painting, receiving instructions from Cupid. This piece is said to be done by Guido Reni. In one corner of the room is a marble statue of Venus, with an apple in her hand; and in another is the statue of Bacchus, whose head is finely executed; but the body, which is inferior to it, seems to be done by another hand.

The ceiling of the next room is painted with Minerva, surrounded by the arts and sciences, by Mr. Kent. Over the chimney is a very fine piece representing Cupid admiring Psyche, while she is asleep, by Vandyke. On each side of the room are hung several pictures, as king Henry VIII. and the comptroller of his household, by Holbein: a three-quarter picture of king Charles I. and another of his queen, by Vandyke: the duke and dutchess of York, by Sir Peter Lely: as also king William and queen Mary, when prince and princess of Orange, over the doors, by the same hand.

The third room, which was the late queen's apartment, is adorned with very beautiful tapestry, representing a Dutch winter-piece, and the various diversions peculiar to the natives of Holland, done by Mr. Vanderbank. Over the chimney is an admirable picture of king Charles II. king James II. and their sister the princess of Orange, when children, by Vandyke.

In the fourth room is the picture of a battle or skirmish between the Germans and Italians, by Holbein. Another of Danae descending in a shower of gold; and another of the widow Elior, finely executed by our countryman Riley.

In the fifth room is a picture of the crucifixion, and another of Our Saviour laid on the cross, both by Titian: of Our Saviour calling St. Matthew from the receipt of customs, by Annibal Carracci; and of his healing the sick in the temple, by Verrio: a picture of Henry IV. of France, by Titian: two heads of queen Mary I. and queen Elizabeth, when children, by Holbein: the late queen Anne, when an infant, by Sir Peter Lely: and several heads by Raphael.

In the sixth room, or rather gallery, are the pictures of king Henry VIII. and queen Katharine of Arragon, both by Holbein: king Philip of Spain, and queen Mary, by the same hand: king James I. by Vandyke: king Charles II. the face by Sir Peter Lely: queen Elizabeth in a Chinese dress, drawn when she was a prisoner at Woodstock: king James II. when duke of York, and another of his queen, both by Sir Peter Lely: king William and queen Mary in their coronation robes, by Sir Godfrey Kneller. Sir Godfrey was knighted on his painting these pictures; king William being doubtless pleased with so fine a picture of his queen. The next is queen Anne, after Sir Godfrey Kneller; and a picture of queen Caroline, which is but poorly executed. In this room is a curious amber cabinet, in a glass case; and at the upper end a beautiful orrery, likewise in a glass case.

The seventh, which is called the Cupola room, has a star in the centre, and the ceiling all around is adorned with paintings in Mosaic. Round the room are placed, at proper distances, eight bustos of ancient poets, and six statues of the heathen gods and goddesses at full length, gilt. Over the chimney piece is a curious bas relief in marble, representing a Roman marriage, with a busto of Cleopatra, by Mr. Ryfbrack.

In the king's great drawing room, over the chimney, is a very fine picture of St. Francis adoring the infant Jesus, held in the lap of the Virgin Mary, Joseph attending, the whole performed by Sir Peter Paul Rubens. In this room are also the holy family, finely painted by Paul Veronese: three priests, by Tintoret: a noble picture of St. Agnes over one of the doors, by Domenichino: St. John Baptist's head, Mary Magdalen, and a naked Venus, all by Titian: a Venus in a supine posture, stealing an arrow out of Cupid's quiver, with beautiful ornaments, in the high gusto of the Greek antique, representing Love and the Drama, by Jacobo da Pontormo: upon the original out lines of the great Michel Angelo Buonaroti: a picture of Villars, duke duke of Buckingham, and his younger brother, when boys, one of the capital pieces of Vandyke: two large pictures by Guido Reni, one of Venus dressing by the graces; the other of Andromeda chained to a rock: Our Saviour in the manger, by Bassan; and a picture of part of the holy family, by Palma the elder.

The ceiling in this room, in which there is such a mixture of sacred and prophane pieces, is painted with the story of Jupiter and Semele.

In the state chamber, the bed is of crimson damask; and over the chimney is a picture of Our Saviour and St. John Baptist, by Raphael.

In the state dressing-room the hangings are all of needle-work, a present from the queen of Prussia. Here is a picture of Edward VI. by Holbein; of a young nobleman of Venice, by Tintoret; another young nobleman of the same place, by Tintoret; and Titian's lady, painted by himself.

The painted gallery is adorned with many admirable pieces. At one end is king Charles I. on a white horse; with the duke of d'Esperrion holding his helmet; the king is an august and noble figure, with some dejection in his countenance: the triumphal arch, curtain, and other parts of the back ground, are finely executed, and so kept, that the king is the principal figure that strikes the eye: at a little distance it has more of the life than a picture, and one is almost ready to get out of the horse's way, and bow to the king.

At the other end of the gallery, opposite this picture, is the same king, with his queen, and two children, king Charles II. when a child, and king James II. an infant in the queen's lap. The king's paternal tenderness is finely expressed, his son standing at his knee: the queen's countenance is expressive of all affectionate obedience to his majesty, and a fond care of her child; which she seems to desire the king to look on. The infant is exquisitely performed; the vacancy of thought in the face, and the inactivity of the hands, are equal to life itself at that age. These two admirable pieces were done by Vandyke.

Another very capital picture in this gallery is, Esther fainting before king Ahasuerus, painted by Tintoret. All the figures are finely drawn and richly dressed in the Venetian manner; for the Venetian school painted all their historical figures in their own habits, thinking them more noble and picturesque than any other.

The next piece is the nine muses in concert, finely drawn by the same master.

Midas preferring Pan to Apollo, is a fine piece, by Andrea Schiavone; but it is greatly hurt by time: the figures, however, are well drawn and coloured; and the affectation of judgment in Midas is finely expressed.

The shepherds offering gifts to Christ, St. John in prison, the story of the woman of Samaria, and John Baptist's head, are fine pieces, by old Palma.

Noah's flood, by Bassan, is a masterly performance.

Over the chimney is a Madona, by Raphael, which, though a small piece, gives a very high idea of that great master's abilities. There is also in this gallery a Madona by Vandyke, which is exquisitely performed.

The other pictures here are, the birth of Jupiter, a fine piece, by Giulio Romano; a Cupid whetting his arrow, by Annibal Caracci; and a Venus and Cupid, by Titian.

K E W.

In this town, which is situate on the Thames, opposite to Old Brentford, is a chapel of ease erected at the expence of several of the nobility and gentry, on a piece of ground that was given for that purpose by queen Anne. Here the late Mr. Molineux, secretary to his majesty king George II. when prince of Wales; had a very fine seat on the green, the gardens of which are said to produce the best fruit in England.

Opposite to Kew Green is a very neat bridge, which consists of eleven arches. The two piers and their dependent arches on each side next the shore are built of brick and stone, the intermediate arches, which are seven in number, are entirely wood. The center arch is fifty feet wide, and the road over the bridge is thirty feet. This bridge was erected in consequence of an act of parliament passed for that purpose in the year 1758.

In this town stood the seats of lady Eyre and Sir Thomas Abney, both of which were purchased by her late majesty queen Caroline; the former for the late duke of Cumberland, and the latter for the princesses Amelia and Caroline.

LOW LEYTON or LEIGHTON.

This is a very pleasant village situate on the side of a hill near Walthamstow, at the foot of which runs the river Lea. In this parish are several very handsome seats which formerly belonged to the nobility, but are now in the possession of wealthy citizens, and other gentlemen; particularly the seat of the late Sir Fisher Trench, bart. which is a modern structure; and adorned with large and delightful gardens.

The parish of Leyton is washed on one side by the river Lea or Ley, from which the village obtains its name, and rises in a gentle ascent for about two miles, from the river to Waltham Forest; on which side lies one ward of the parish called Leyton Stone: in this part is a chapel of ease erected some few years ago for the convenience of the inhabitants.

The parish church is a small building, consisting of a chancel and two isles. It is dedicated to the Virgin Mary; and the advowson of the vicarage is vested in the lord of the manor.

MARYBORNE, or Mary le Bonne.

This village, which by the great increase of buildings, is now almost united to the metropolis; took its origin from the following circumstance.

The village of Tyborne going to decay, and its church, named St. John the Evangelist, left alone by the side of the highway, it was robbed of its books, vestments, images, and other decorations corations; on which the parishioners petitioned the bishop of London for leave to take down their old, and erect a new one elsewhere, which being readily granted in the year 1400, they built a new church where they had some time before erected a chapel, and that structure being dedicated to the Virgin Mary, received the additional epithet of Borne, from its vicinity to the neighbouring brook or bourn.

The old church, which was a mean edifice, was pulled down, and a new one erected in 1741. This structure is built with brick in as plain a manner as possible. It has two series of small arched windows on each side, and the only ornaments are a vase at each corner, and a turret at the west end.

The vestry of this parish is general; and the officers are, two churchwardens, two overseers of the poor, two constables, two surveyors of the highways, and one beadle.

There are in this village a French meeting-house, a charity school, and a place of public entertainment, which has a pleasant garden, and a band of vocal and instrumental music.

If the spirit of building should continue as it has gone on for some few years past, this village will undoubtedly, in a very short time, be quite joined, and become a part of the metropolis.

P A N C R A S.

This is a small hamlet on the north west side of London, in the road to Kentish town. It has a church dedicated to St. Pancras, and called St. Pancras in the Fields, an old plain Gothic structure, with a square tower, without a spire.

It is a vulgar tradition that this church is of greater antiquity than that of St. Paul's cathedral, of which it is only a prebend; but this arises from a mistake; for the church of St. Pancras, termed the mother of St. Paul's, was situated in the city of Canterbury, and was changed from a Pagan temple to a Christian church by St. Austin the monk, in the year 598, when he dedicated it to St. Pancras.

The church yard is a general burial-place for persons of the Romish religion. At a public house on the south side of the church is a medicinal spring.

This church, which stood on the north side of St. Pancras-lane, near Queen-street, in Cheap ward (see page 485) owed its name, as did the church mentioned in the above article, to St. Pancras, a young phrygian nobleman, who suffered martyrdom under the emperor Dioclesian, for his strict adherence to the Christian religion.

The service of this church is only performed the first Sunday in every month, owing to the great extent of the parish, and the number of chapels erected in various parts of it for the convenience of the inhabitants.

P E C K H A M.

This is a very pleasant village situate about four miles from London, in the parish of Camberwell.

In this village is the seat of the late lord Trevor, built in the reign of king James II. by Sir Thomas Bond, who being deeply engaged in the pernicious schemes of that imprudent prince, was obliged to leave the kingdom with him, when the house was plundered by the populace, and became forfeited to the crown.

The front of this building stands to the north, with a spacious garden before it, from which extends two rows of large elms, of considerable length, through which the Tower of London terminates the prospect. On each side of this avenue you have a view of the city; and the masts of vessels appearing at high-water over the trees and houses up to Greenwich, greatly improve the prospect. The kitchen garden and the walls were planted with the choicest fruit trees from France, and an experienced gardener was sent for from Paris to have the management of them; so that the collection of fruit trees in this garden has been accounted one of the best in England.

Soon after lord Trevor died, the seat was purchased by a private gentleman, who began to make very considerable improvements, and had he lived a few years longer, would have rendered it a very delightful spot of retirement.

Here are likewise several other villas and neat houses, inhabited by the tradesmen of London, and those who have retired from business.

P U T N E Y.

This village which is situate on the Thames, five miles south west of London, is famous for being the birth-place of Thomas Cromwell, earl of Essex, whose father was a blacksmith in this place.

About this village the citizens of London have many very handsome seats; and on Putney Heath is a public house remarkable for polite assemblies, and in the summer season for breakfasting and dancing, and for one of the pleasantest bowling-greens in England.

Here is an old church erected after the same model with that of Fulham, on the opposite shore, and they are both said to have been built by two sisters. That part of Putney which joins to the heath commands a fine view both up and down the river Thames.

R I C H M O N D.

This is reckoned the finest village in the British dominions, and has therefore been termed the Frescati of England. It was anciently the seats of our monarchs, and the place from its splendor was called Shene, which in the Saxon tongue signifies bright or shining.

In this place king Edward III. died of grief for the loss of his heroic son Edward the black prince; and here died Anne the wife of Richard II. who first taught the English women the use of the side saddle. Richard was so afflicted at her death, that it gave him such a dislike to the place where it happened, that he defaced the fine palace; but it was afterwards repaired and beautified by king Henry V. who also founded near it three religious houses.

In

In the year 1497 this palace was destroyed by fire, when king Henry VII. was there; but in 1501 that prince caused it to be new built, and commanded that the village should be called Richmond. Henry VII. died here; as did likewise his daughter queen Elizabeth. On the ground where formerly stood a part of the old palace is a seat belonging to the earl of Cholmondeley.

The present palace, which is delightfully situated, is a plain edifice built by the duke of Ormond, who received a grant of a considerable space of land about Richmond, from king William III. as a reward for his military services; but on the attainder of that duke in the beginning of the reign of king George I. it devolved to the crown; and it was by his late majesty confirmed to queen Caroline, in case she became queen dowager of England.

The king took great delight here, and made several improvements in the palace, while her majesty amused herself at her royal dairy house, Merlin's cave, the Hermitage, and the other improvements which she made in the park and gardens of this delightful mansion.

The gardens are extremely fine, and are formed with an agreeable wildness and pleasing irregularity, that cannot fail to charm all who are in love with nature, and afford a much higher and more lasting satisfaction than can possibly arise from the most extensive decorations of art.

On entering these rural walks, you are conducted to the dairy, a neat but low brick building, to which there is an ascent by a flight of steps; in the front is a handsome angular pediment. The walls on the inside are covered with stucco, and the house is furnished suitable to a royal dairy, the utensils for the milk being of the most beautiful china.

Proceeding through a grove of trees you come to the temple, which is situated on a mount. It is a circular dome crowned with a ball, and supported by Tuscan columns, with a circular altar in the middle, and to which there is an ascent by very steep slopes.

Returning by the dairy, and crossing the gravel walk which leads from the palace to the river, you come to a wood, which you enter by a walk terminated by the queen's pavillion, a neat elegant structure, wherein is seen a beautiful chimney-piece, taken from a design in the addition to Palladis, and a model of a palace intended to be built in this place. In another part of this wood is the duke's summer-house, which has a lofty arched entrance, and the roof rising to a point is terminated by a ball.

From the wood you come to the summer-house on the terrace, a light small building with very large and lofty windows, to give a better view of the country, and particularly of that noble seat called Sion-house. In this edifice are two pictures, representing the taking of Vigo by the duke of Ormond.

Passing through a labyrinth, you see, near a pond, Merlin's cave, a Gothic building thatched; within which are the following figures in wax, Merlin, an ancient British enchanter; the excellent and learned queen Elizabeth, and a queen of the Amazons; here is also a library consisting of a well-chosen collection of the works of modern authors neatly bound in vellum.

On leaving this edifice, which has an antique and venerable appearance, you come to a large oval of above five hundred feet in diameter, called the Forest oval, and turning from hence you have a view of the Hermitage, a grotesque building, which seems as if it had stood many hundred years, though it was built by order of her late majesty. It has three arched doors, and the middle part which projects forward, is adorned with a kind of ruinous angular pediment; the stones of the whole edifice appear as if rudely laid together, and the venerable look of the whole is improved by the thickness of the solemn grove behind, and the little turret on the top with a bell, to which you may ascend by a winding walk.

The inside of this building is in the form of an octagon with niches, in which are the busts of the following truly great men, who by their writings were an honour not only to their country, but to human nature. The first on the right hand is the incomparable Sir Isaac Newton, and next to him the justly celebrated Mr. John Locke. The first on the left hand is Mr. Woolaston, the author of The Religion of Nature Displayed; next to him is the reverend and learned Dr. Samuel Clarke, and in a kind of alcove is the truly honourable Mr. Robert Boyle.

From this seat of contemplation you pass thro' fields cloathed with grass; through corn fields, and a wild ground interspersed with broom and furze, which afford excellent shelter for hares and pheasants, of which there are great abundance.

Leaving this beautiful variety, in which nature appears in all her forms of cultivation and barren wildness, you come to an amphi theatre formed by young elms, and a diagonal wilderness, through which you pass to the forest walk, that extends about half a mile, and then passing through a small wilderness you leave the gardens.

At the north-east extremity of the garden is another house that belonged to her majesty, and near it the house of his late royal highness Frederick prince of Wales, which is on the inside adorned with stucco. Opposite this last house is the princess Amelia's, built by a Dutch architect, the outside of which is painted.

To the west of the gardens are seen the fine houses of several of the nobility and gentry, particularly the lady Buckworth's, and Mr. Geoffrey's; and extending the view across the Thames, there appears Isleworth.

Having thus described this beautiful mansion, we shall now return to the village itself. The green is exceeding pleasant, it being levelled and enclosed in a handsome manner; it is also surrounded with lofty elms, and adorned on each side with the houses of persons of distinction. Among the various seats on this spacious green is a handsome edifice that formerly belonged to Sir Charles Hedges, and since to Sir Matthew Decker, in the gardens of which is said to be the longest and highest hedge of holly that was ever seen, with several other hedges of evergreens. There are here also vistas cut through woods, grottos, fountains, a fine canal, a decoy, summer-mer-house and stove-houses, in which the anana, or pine apple, was first brought to maturity in England.

On the north east side of the green is a fine house, which belonged to the late Mr. Hegdigger, and a little beyond it that of the late duke of Cumberland; passing by which you come to a small park belonging to his majesty, well stocked with deer, and opposite to it is the entrance into the gardens.

This village runs up a hill, on the ascent of which are wells of a purging mineral water, frequented during the summer by a great number of gentry and others. On the top there is a most extensive and beautiful prospect of the country, interspersed with villages and inclosures; the Thames is seen running beneath, and the landscape is improved by the many fine seats that are scattered along its banks.

Besides these remarkables, there are in this village the following: An almshouse built by Dr. Duppa, bishop of Winchester in the reign of king Charles II. for the support of ten poor widows, pursuant to a vow made by that prelate during that prince's exile. Another almshouse endowed with above 100l. a year, which, since its foundation, has been considerably encreased by John Mitchell, esq; Here are also two charity schools, one for fifty boys, and the other for fifty girls. Likewise a very small but neat playhouse.

STEPNEY.

This is a very ancient village situate about two miles east of London; and is remarkable for its church, and the great number of tomb stones, both in that edifice and its spacious cemetery.

That this village is of great antiquity, and has been of great importance in former times, may be collected from its being once the residence of kings, the seat of parliament, which was held there, and the place where the deans of St. Paul's had their country mansion; some faint remains of which are still to be seen.

There was a church here so long ago as the time of the Saxons, when it was called the church of all Saints, Ecclesia omnium Sanctorum, and we read of the manor of Stepney under the reign of William the Conqueror, by the name of Stibenbede, or Stiben's-heath; but it does not appear when the church changed its name by being dedicated to St. Dunstan, the name it at present bears. To this church belong both a rectory and vicarage; the former, which was a sine-cure, was in the gift of the bishop of London, and the latter, in the gift of the rector, till Ridley, bishop of London, gave the manor of Stepney, and the advowson of the church to Edward VI. who, in his turn, granted them to Sir Thomas Wentworth, lord chamberlain of his household. But the advowson being afterwards purchased by the principal and scholars of King's-hall and Brazen-Nose college in Oxford, they presented two persons to the rectory and vicarage by the name of the Portionists of Ratcliff and Spital-fields, till the year 1744, when the hamlet of Bethnal-green being separated from it, and made a new parish by act of parliament, Stepney became possessed by only one rector.

This parish was of such vast extent, and so amazingly encreased in buildings, as to produce the parishes of St. Mary Stratford at Bow, St. Mary Whitechapel, St. Anne's Limehouse, St. John's at Wapping, St. Paul's Shadwell, St. George's Ratcliff Highway, Christ-church Spital-fields, and St. Matthew's Bethnal-green; all which have been separated from it, and yet it still remains one of the largest parishes within the bill of mortality, and contains the hamlets of Mile-end, Old and New Towns, Ratcliff and Poplar.

The present church, which has been lately repaired and beautified, is of very considerable extent, being 104 feet long, though it is no more than 54 feet broad. The height of the roof is 35 feet, and that of the tower, with its turret, 92 feet. The wall and battlements are built of brick and wrought stone, plastered over; and the roof is covered with lead. The pillars, arches and windows, are of the modern Gothic, and the west porch, built in 1610, has not any resemblance to the rest of the building, it being of the Tuscan order. The tower, which is plain and heavy, is supported at the corners by a kind of double buttresses; it is crowned with square plain battlements, without pinnacles, and with a small mean turret; and the same kind of battlements are carried round the body of the church.

On the inside are three galleries and an organ, and the altar-piece is adorned with four Corinthian pilasters, with their entablature and a pediment; these have gilt capitals, with the arms of queen Anne carved. On the east side of the portico, leading up to the gallery on the north side of the chancel, is a stone, whereon are engraved the following words:

Of Carthage great I was a stone,
O mortals read with pity!
Time consumes all, it spareth none,
Men, mountains, towns, nor city:
Therefore, O mortals! all bethink
You whereunto you must,
Since now such stately buildings
Lie buried in the dust.

The church is well pewed with oak, and wainscoted about eight feet high, and the pulpit is of the same sort of timber.

The vestry is select, consisting of a certain number of representatives chosen by each hamlet, and the churchwardens for the time being.

Among the various monumental inscriptions in this great cemetery, the following are the most remarkable.

On a grave stone near the south east corner of the church-yard, is this inscription on Mrs. Mary Angel:

To say, an Angel here inter'd doth lye,
May be thought strange, for Angels never dye.
Indeed some fell from Heav'n to Hell,
Are lost and rise no more:
This only fell by Death to Earth,
Not lost but gone before.
Her Dust lodg'd here, her Soul perfect in Grace
'Mongst Saints and Angels now hath took its place.

At

At the east end of the church-yard, near the church, is a monument of white-marble, adorned with a cherub, urn, palm branches and a coat of arms, under which is the following inscription:

Here lieth interred the body of dame Rebecca Berry, the wife of Thomas Elton of Stratford Bow, gent. who departed this life April 16, 1696, aged 52.

Come ladies, you that would appear
Like angels fair, come dress you here;
Come dress you at this marble stone,
And make that humble grace your own;
Which once adorn'd as fair a mind,
As e're yet lodg'd in woman kind.
So she was dress'd; whose humble life
Was free from pride, was free from strife.
Free from all envious brauls and jars
(Of human life the civil wars)
These ne're disturb'd her peaceful mind,
Which still was gentle, still was kind.
Her very looks, her garb, her mien,
Disclos'd the humble soul within.
Trace her through every scene of life,
View her as widow, virgin, wife;
Still the same humble she appears,
The same in youth the same in years;
The same in low and high estate,
Ne're vex'd with this, ne're mov'd with that.
Go, ladies, now, and if you'd be
As fair, as great, as good as she,
Go learn of her humility.

On a stone, near the foot path, on the north west side of the church is the following:

Whoever treadeth on this stone,
I pray you tread most neatly,
For underneath the same doth lye
Your honest friend Will. Wheatly.

On the south side is another stone with this inscription:

Here lies the body of Daniel Saul,
Spitalfields weaver, and that is all.

Under a stone southward from the church is the following:

Here remains all that was mortal of Mr. Roger Crab, who entered into eternity the 11th day of September 1680, in the 60th year of his age.

Tread gently, reader, near the dust
Committed to this tomb-stone's trust,
For while 'twas flesh it held a guest
With universal love possess;
A soul that stemm'd opinion's tyde,
Did over sects in triumph ride,
Yet separate from the giddy crowd and paths tradition had allowed,
Through good and ill report he past,
Oft censur'd, yet approv'd at last.
Would'st thou his religion know,
In brief 'twas this: to all to do
Just as he would be done unto.

So kind in Nature's laws he stood,
A temple undefil'd with blood,
A friend to every thing was good.
The rest angels alone can fitly tell.
Haste then to them and him; and so farewell.

The last inscription we shall mention is the following, on a spacious marble stone, near the south side of the church:

Here lieth interred the bodies of captain Thomas Chever's, who departed this life November 18, 1675. Aged 44 years.

And of Ann Chevers his wife, who departed this life, November 14, 1675. Aged 34 years.

And of John Chevers their son, who departed this life, November 13, 1675. Aged 5 days.

Reader, consider well how poor a span,
And how uncertain is the life of man:
Here lie the husband, wife, and child, by Death
All three in five days time depriv'd of breath.
The child dies first, the mother on the morrow
Follows, and then the father dies with sorrow.
A Cæsar falls by many wounds, well may
Two stabs at heart the stoutest captain slay.

The other remarkables in this parish are, a Presbyterian, Independent, Anabaptist, and a Quaker meeting-houses; two charity-schools; fifteen almshouses; an hospital; two workhouses; a large ship-yard to build in; and two Portuguese and one German burial grounds, the first of which contains near one thousand sepulchral stones of beautiful marble, under which persons of all ages and ranks lie promiscuously in rows without distinction, and whose graves are never re opened.

TOTTENHAM HIGH CROSS.

This is a pleasant village situate on the west side of the River Lea, five miles north of London, in the road to Ware.

The original proprietors of this manor were the earls of Northumberland and Chester; after whom it fell into the hands of David king of Scotland, who gave it to the monastery of the Trinity in London; but Henry VIII. granted it to William Lord Howard of Effingham, who being afterwards attainted, it reverted again to the king, who then granted it to the dean and chapter of St. Paul's, to whom it still belongs.

The present earl of Northumberland and the lord Colerain have seats here, and there are also a great number of handsome houses belonging to the citizens of London.

The church stands on a hill, which has a little river called the Mosel at the bottom, to the west, north and east. The parish is divided into four wards, viz. 1. Nether ward, in which stands the parsonage and vicarage. 2. Middle ward, comprehending Church end, and Marsh-street. 3. High Cross ward, containing the hall, the mill, Page-green, and the High Cross. 4. Wood-green ward, which comprehends all the rest of the parish, and is larger than the other three wards put together.

The Cross, which gives name to the place, was once much higher than it is at present; and upon that spot queen Eleanor's corpse was rested, when on the road from Lincolnshire to London. St. Loy's well, in this parish, is said to be always full, and never to run over; and many strange cures have been performed at Bishop's well.

An almshouse was founded here in 1596 by one Zancher, a Spaniard, the first confectioner ever known in this kingdom. Here are also a free-school, and a charity-school for twenty-two girls, who are taught and cloathed.

TOWTING.

There are two villages of this name, situate near each other, and distinguished by the epithets upper and lower. The former lies in the road from Southwark to Epsom, about four miles from London.

In this village is an almshouse founded in 1709, by the mother of Sir John Bateman, Lord-mayor of London, for six poor women, to be nominated by the eldest heir of the family. It is likewise adorned with several fine seats belonging to the gentlemen and citizens of London, particularly the house and gardens of the Bateman family.

Lower Towing is two miles south west of Wandsworth; and here the lord Gray and the earl of Lindsey had their seats in the last century.

TWICKENHAM.

This is a very pleasant village, situate on the banks of the Thames between Teddington and Isleworth, and between two brooks that here fall into that river.

The church, which is a modern edifice, rebuilt by the contribution of the inhabitants, is a fine Doric structure. Here is a charity-school for fifty boys, who are taught and cloathed; and this delightful village is adorned with the seats of several persons of distinction, particularly on the bank of the river.

At the upper end of the village there is an elegant Gothic seat called Strawberry-hill, belonging to the honourable Mr. Walpole; near which is a beautiful house, late the earl of Radnor's, now in the possession of Mr. Hindley. The next of considerable note is Sir William Stanhope's, formerly the residence of our most celebrated poet, Mr. Alexander Pope: then Mr. Backwell's; and the last on this beautiful bank is doctor Battie's, at present in the possession of Mr. Paulet. All these houses, besides several others on this delightful spot, enjoy a most pleasing prospect both up and down the river, perpetually enlivened with the west country navigation, and other moving pictures on the surface of this enchanting river.

Below the church is the fine seat of Mr. Whitchurch, that of the earl of Strafford, Mrs. Pitt, and at the entrance into the meadows, the elegant structure called Marble-hall, belonging to the countess of Suffolk. Still farther down the stream you have the small but very neat house of Mr. Barlow; the larger and more grand one of Mr. Cambridge; and the sweet retirement called Twickenham Park, the residence of the countess of Montrath. This brings you down to Isleworth, which from the entrance into the meadows at lady Suffolk's, is about a mile and a half on the bank of the river, opposite to Ham walks and Richmond-hill, and is one of the most beautiful walks in England.

On the right hand of the road, between Turnham-green and Brentford, is Gunnersbury-house, a noble and elegant structure built by Inigo Jones, or, as some say, by Mr. Webb, who was son-in-law to Inigo Jones. Indeed the architecture shews, that if the plan was not drawn by that celebrated architect himself, it was designed by some of his scholars; for the building has that majestic boldness and simplicity which grace all the works of that excellent artist. It is situated on a rising ground; the approach to it from the garden is remarkably fine. The loggia has a beautiful appearance at a distance, and commands a fine prospect of the county of Surry, the river of Thames, and of all the meadows on its banks for some miles, and in clear weather, of even the city of London.

The apartments are extremely convenient and well contrived. The hall, which is large and spacious, is on each side supported by rows of columns, and from thence you ascend, by a noble flight of stairs, to a saloon, which is a double cube of twenty-five feet high, and most elegantly furnished. This fine room has an entrance into the portico on the back front, which is supported by columns, and from the fineness of the prospect over the Thames, is a delightful place to sit in, during the afternoon in the summer season; for it being contrived to face the south east, the sun never shines on it after two o'clock; but extending its beams over the country, enlivens the beautiful landscape that lies before this part of the edifice.

On entering the garden from the house, you ascend a noble terrace, which affords a delightful view of the neighbouring country; and from this terrace, which extends the whole breadth of the garden, you descend by a beautiful flight of steps, with a grand balustrade on each side. But the gardens are laid out too plain, having the walls in view on every side. This was the house of the late Henry Furnesse, esq; who had a fine collection of pictures. It is now in the possession of the princess Amelia.

WALTHAMSTOW.

This is a very pleasant village, situate on the river Lea, and contiguous to Low Layton. Here are three manors, viz. Walthamstow, Tony or High-hall, Walthamstow Frances or Low-hall, which was the manor of the late J. Conyers, esq; and the manor of the rectory, which once belonged to Trinity-abbey in London.

The church, which is dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, is a large edifice situated upon a hill, and consists of three isles; that on the north side built by Sir George Monox, knight, alderman and Lord-mayor of London in the reign of Henry VIII. is called Monox's isle; that on the south side bears the name of Thorn's isle, from a citizen and merchant.

taylor of that name, who in all probability, was at the expence of building it.

In this church there are a great number of monuments, particularly one near the altar erected to the memory of Sir Thomas Stanley, Knt. second son to the earl of Derby, on which there is the effigy of a lady on her knees. And before the communion table within the rails, is a piece of marble over the body of doctor Pierce, bishop of Bath and Wells.

In the parish of Walthamstow there are several ancient seats, and handsome houses, belonging to persons of distinction; the most remarkable of which was that of Higham-hall, pleasantly situated upon Higham-hills, a rising ground, about half a mile north from Clay-street, just above the river Lea, overlooking the counties of Middlesex and Hertfordshire, and commanding a most delightful and extensive prospect. It has been a magnificent and spacious fabrick, and in ancient times, when the lords resided upon their royalties, no place could be more admirably situated than this mansion, erected at the top of the hill of Higham, and having within its view the whole extent of its jurisdiction; but there are hardly now any traces of its ancient grandeur remaining.

Opposite the church is the Nag's-head, a noted public house for the accommodation of the gentry who occasionally resort hither to participate of those pleasures which the rusticity of this delightful village naturally affords.

W A N S T E D.

In this village which is situate near Woodford, about eight miles east of London, are several fine seats of the nobility, gentry, and wealthy citizens; but the most remarkable is Wantsted-house, the magnificent seat of the earl of Tilney.

This noble mansion was prepared by Sir Joseph Child, his lordship's grandfather, who added to the advantage of a fine situation, many rows of trees, planted in avenues and vistas leading up to the spot of ground where the old houses stood. The late lord, before he was enobled, laid out the most spacious pieces of ground in gardens that are to be seen in England.

The green-house is a very superb building furnished with stoves and artificial places for heat, from an apartment which has a bagnio, and other conveniences, that render it both pleasant and useful.

The present building is a magnificent structure, two hundred and sixty feet in length, and seventy in depth. The fore front, which is of Portland stone, has a long vista that reaches to the great road at Leighton Stone, and from the back front facing the gardens is an easy descent that leads to the terrace; and affords a most beautiful prospect of the river, which is formed into canals; and beyond it the walks and wildernesses extend to a great distance, rising up the hill, as they sloped downwards before; so that the sight is lost in the woods, and the whole country, as far as the eye can reach, appears one continued garden.

This beautiful building, which was erected by the late earl of Tilney, and designed by colonel Campbell, is certainly one of the noblest houses not only near London, but in the kingdom. It consists of two stories, the state and ground story. This latter is the basement, into which you enter by a door in the middle underneath the grand entrance, which is in a noble portico of six Corinthian columns supporting a pediment in which are the arms of this nobleman. To this you ascend by a flight of steps, and pass into a magnificent saloon richly decorated with painting and sculpture, through which you pass into the other state rooms which are suitably furnished with pictures, gilding, velvet, tapestry, and other rich hangings.

Before the house is an octangular basin which seems equal to the length of the front. On each side as you approach the house are two marble statues of Hercules and Venus, with obelisks and vases alternately placed. The garden front has not any portico, but a pediment with a bas relief supported by six three quarter columns.

The church belonging to this parish was some few years ago rebuilt, chiefly by the liberality of Sir Richard Child, bart. lord viscount Castlemain; and in the chancel is a very superb monument for Sir Josiah Child, whose statue in white marble stands pointing downward to the inscription. Underneath lies the figure of Bernard his second son, and on each side sits a woman veiled, one leaning her head upon her hand, and the other closing her hands and wringing them. There are also several boys in mourning postures, and one expressing the vanity of life by blowing up a bubble.

W I M B L E T O N.

This is the village where Ethelbert king of Kent was defeated in a battle by Ceaulin the West Saxon, in the year 568. The common or heath, which is supposed to be as high as that of Hampstead, is about a mile each way, and is adorned on the sides with several handsome seats.

About half a mile south from the road, on the common, stands Wimbledon house, which was built by Sir Thomas Cecil, son of the lord treasurer Burleigh, in the year 1588, and was afterwards general Lambert's, who had here a most remarkable fine flower garden.

The manor of Wimbledon was purchased by Sarah Churchill, dutchess dowager of Marlborough, who left it to the late John Spencer, esq; brother to the late duke of Marlborough, together with a fine seat she built here, which is adorned with a grand terrace walk, that extends from the house to the seat of Sir Abraham Janssen, bart. and has a beautiful prospect to the south.

W O O L W I C H.

This town is situated on the southern bank of the Thames, about nine miles from London. Here is a royal dock, the oldest in the kingdom, for building ships of war; and also a gun-yard called called the Warren. In the former more ships have been built than in any other two docks in the kingdom; and in the latter, artillery of all kinds and dimensions are cast. Here the company of matrosses are employed in making up cartridges, and in charging bombs, carcasses, and grenades, for the public service. Here are likewise in this town many yards of warehouses, and magazines of military and naval stores; and an academy has been lately established here, for teaching the military sciences, and whatever else relates to the attack and defence of fortified places.

A guardship is generally stationed in the river before the dock-yard, where the water is so deep that the largest ships may safely ride without touching the ground, even at low water.

The town has been of late years considerably enlarged, and the parish church rebuilt in a very handsome manner, as one of the fifty new churches. Here is a weekly market on Friday.

ADDINGTON.

THIS village is situated at the descent of a high spacious common to which it gives name, about three miles from Croydon, in the county of Surry. Its church, though said to be above three hundred years old, is still very substantial; but the most remarkable circumstance is, that the lord of the manor held it in the reign of Henry III. by the service of making his majesty a mess of pottage in an earthen pot in the king's kitchen at his coronation. And so late as the coronation of king Charles II. Thomas Leigh, esq; then lord of the manor, made a mess according to his tenure, and brought it to his majesty's table, when that king, though he did not taste what he had prepared, yet accepted of his service.

St. ALBANS.

This town, which is situated on the river Ver, twenty miles from London, received its name from an abbey built here about the year 703, to the memory of St. Albanus, the first martyr of Britain, who suffered in the first persecution of the emperor Dioclesian. It is incorporated by charter, and governed by a mayor, high steward, recorder, twelve aldermen, a town clerk, and twenty-four assistants.

In this borough there is a particular district called a Liberty, which has a jurisdiction, both in ecclesiastical and civil matters, peculiar to itself. This liberty has a jail, and a jail-delivery at St. Albans four times a year, on the Thursday after the quarter sessions at Hertford.

There are four wards in this town, in each of which are two churchwardens and a constable. It is large and populous, though not one of the most beautiful towns in the kingdom. The country round it is, however, very pleasant, and abounds with fine seats. Here are two charity schools; one founded for twenty-eight boys, who are clothed; and the other for twenty-one girls, of whom fourteen only are clothed.

The origin of St. Albans was owing to the monastery built by Offa, king of the Mercians, to the memory of St. Alban, in expiation of his barbarous murder of Ethelbert, king of the East-Angles, whom he had treacherously inveigled to his court, on pretence of marrying his daughter. This monastery or abbey church has been rebuilt in whole or part several times. The town purchased it at the dissolution for four hundred pounds, which prevented so noble a fabric being pulled down, and torn to pieces, for making money of the materials; and it is made a parish church for the borough.

In this ancient edifice is a funeral monument and effigies of king Offa, who is represented seated on his throne; under which is the following inscription:

Fundator Ecclesie circa annum 793.
Quem male depictum, et residentem cernitis alte
Sublimem folio, MERCIUS OFFA fecit.

That is,

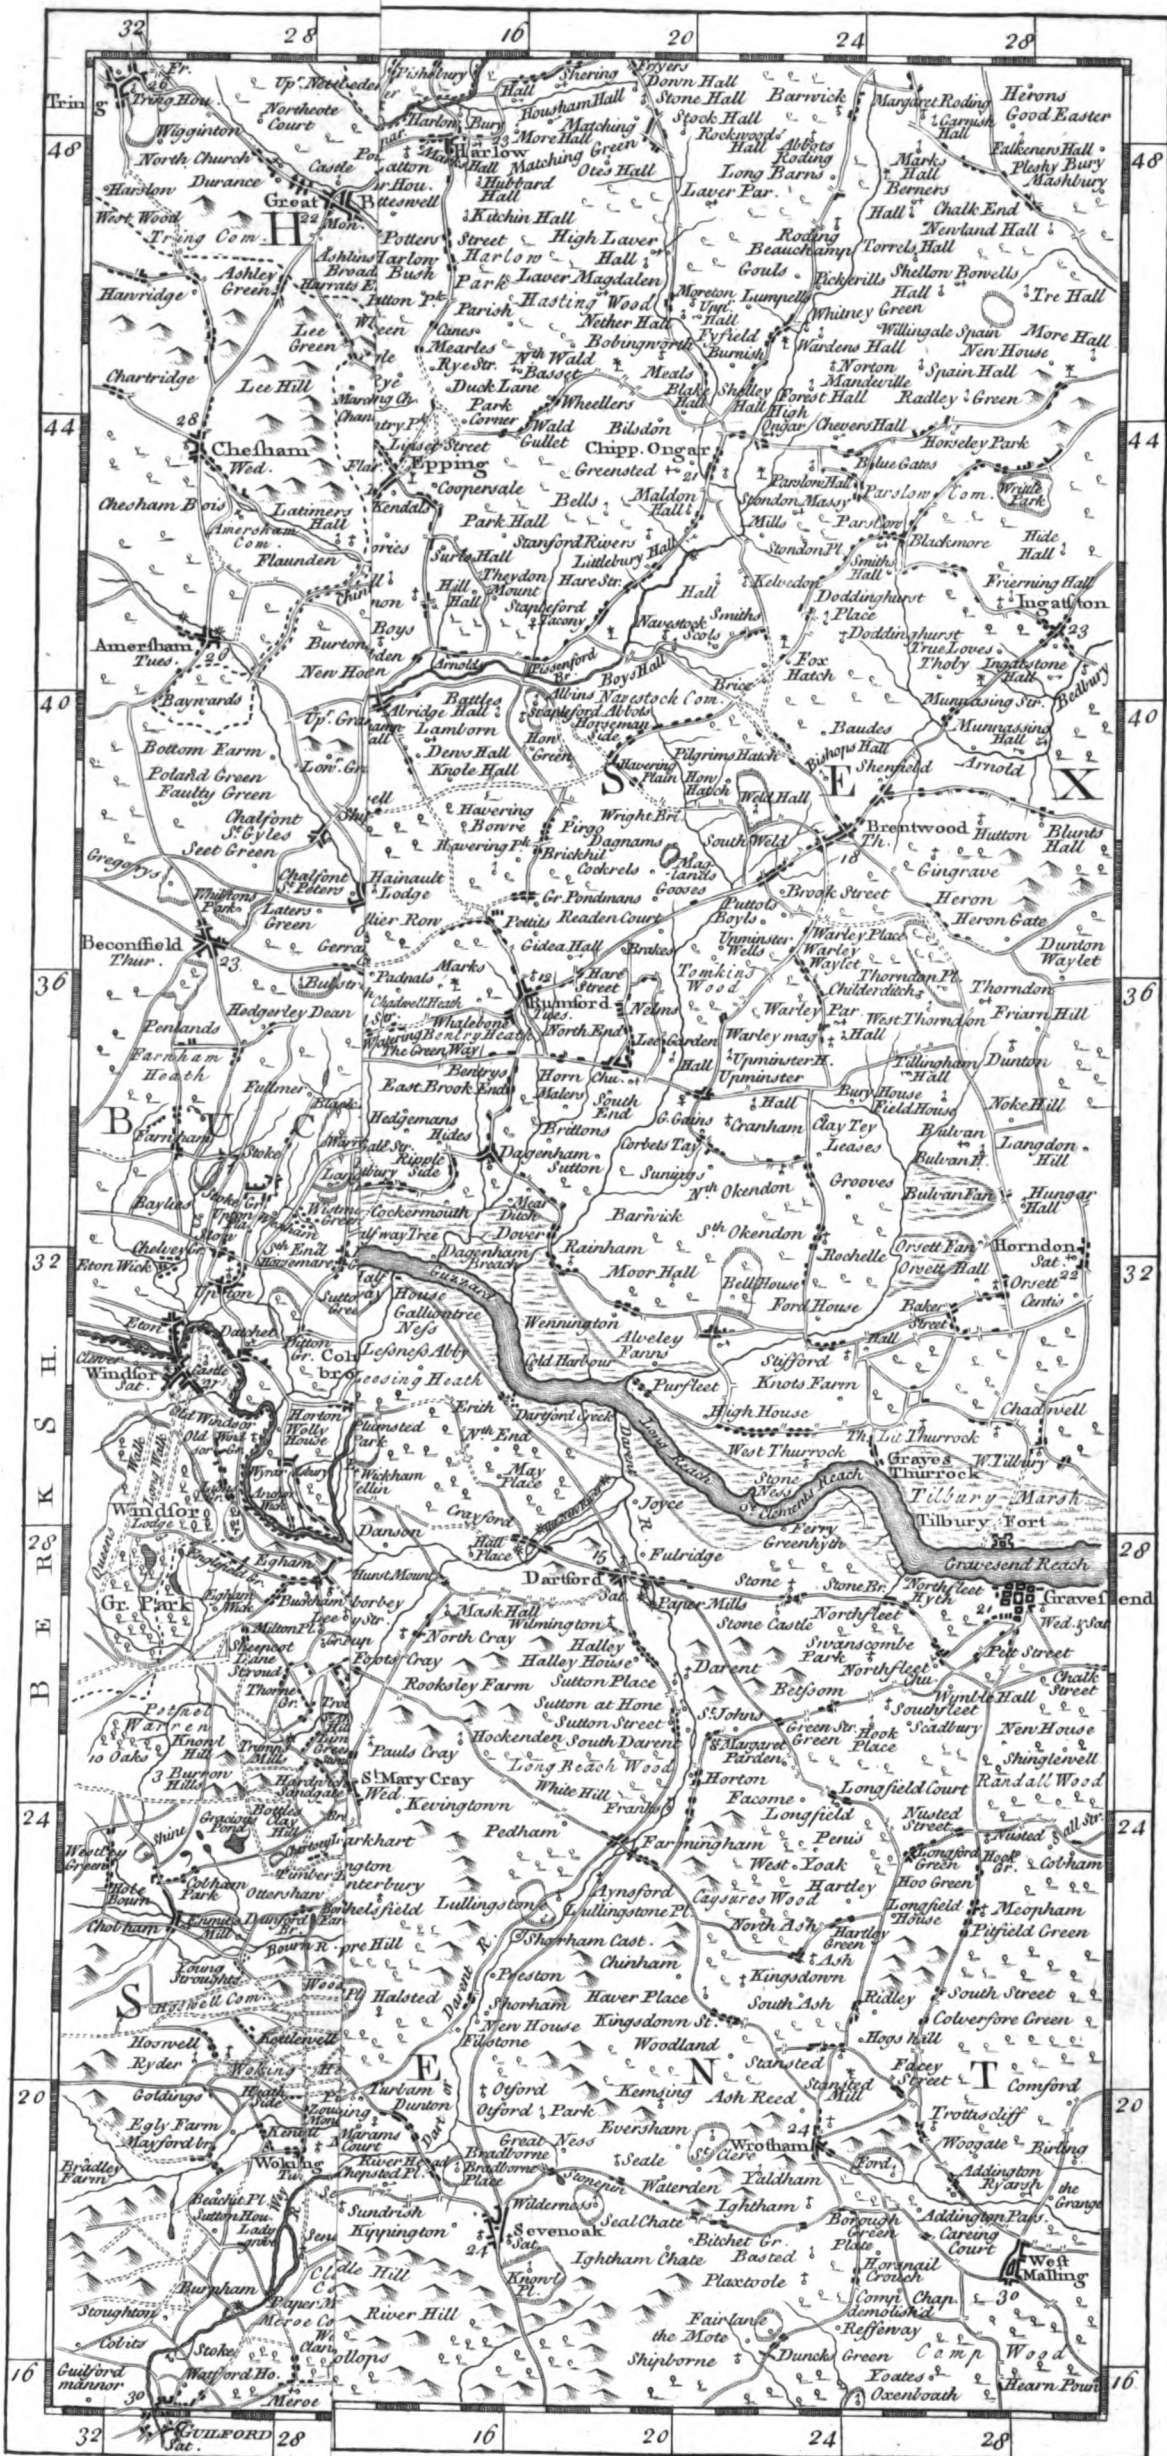

The founder of the church about the year 793.
Whom you behold ill-painted on his throne
Sublime, was once for MERCIAN OFFA known.

On the east side stood the shrine of St. Alban, where is still to be seen the following short inscription:

S. ALBANUS VEROL AMENSIS, ANGLORUM
PROTOMARTYR, 17 Junii 293.

In the south isle near the above shrine is the monument of Humphry, brother to king Henry V. commonly distinguished by the title of the Good Duke of Gloucester. It is adorned with a ducal coronet, and the arms of France and England quartered. In niches on one side are seventeen kings; but in the niches on the other side there are not any statues remaining. The inscription, which alludes to the pretended miraculous cure of a blind man, detected by the duke, is as follows:

Pia Memoria V. Opt. Sacrum.

Hic jacet HUMPHREDUS, dux ille Glocestrius olim.
Henrici sexti protector, fraudis ineptæ
Detector, dum ficta notat miracula cæci
Lumen erat patriæ, columen venerabile regni,
Pacis amans, Musisque favens melioribus; unde
Gratum opus Oxoniæ, quæ nunc schola sacra refulget, Invida sed mulier regno, regi, sibi nequam,
Abstulit hunc, humili vix hoc dignatâ sepulcro.
Invidia rumpente tamen, post funera vivat.

In English thus:

Sacred to the pious memory of an excellent man.

Interr'd within this consecrated ground
Lies he, whom Henry his protector found;
Good Humphrey, Gloucester's duke, who well could spy
Fraud couch'd within the blind impostor's eye:
His country's light, the state's rever'd support,
Who peace, and rising learning, deign'd to court;
Whence his rich library, at Oxford plac'd,
Her ample schools with sacred influence grac'd:
Yet fell beneath an envious woman's wile,
Both to herself, her king, and kingdom, vile;
Who scarce allow'd his bones this spot of land;
Yet spite of envy shall his glory stand.

In digging for a grave about forty years ago, the stairs leading to the vault where the body lies, were discovered. It contains a leaden coffin, with the body preserved by the pickle it lies in, except the legs, from which the flesh is wasted, the pickle of that end being dried up. On the wall at the east end of the vault is a crucifix painted, with a cup on each side of the head; another at the side; and a fourth at the feet.

The west end of the choir hath a noble piece of Gothic workmanship, for the ornament of the high altar. And there are many curious models and coins to be seen in the church, which have been dug out of the ruins of old Verulam.

Besides this venerable piece of antiquity, there are in this town three churches, viz. St. Michael's, St. Peter's, and St. Stephen's.

In the church of St. Michael, is a monument of the famous Francis Bacon, lord Verulam, and viscount of St. Albans. It was erected by Sir Thomas Marrin, who had been secretary to this great man. The philosopher is sitting thoughtfully in an elbow chair; and on the monument is this inscription:

Francisc. Bacon, Baro de Verulam, Sti. Albani Viceco.
Seu notioribus titulis,
Scientiarum lumen, facundia lex,
Sic fedebat.
Qui, postquam omnia naturalis sapientia,
Et civilis arcana evolvisset,
Naturæ decretum explevit,
Composita solvantur,
An. Dom. 1626. Ætat. 66.
Tanti viri mem. Thomas Meautys, superstitis cultor;
Defuncti admirator.

In English thus.

Francis Bacon, baron of Verulam, and viscount of St. Albans; or by his more known titles, the light of the sciences, and the law of eloquence; was thus accustomed to sit; who, after having unravelled all the mysteries of natural and civil wisdom, fulfilled the degree of nature, "that things joined should be loosed," in the year of our Lord 1626, and of his age 66.

To the memory of so great a man, this was erected by Sir Thomas Meautys, who revered him while living, and admires him dead.

The late dutchess dowager of Marlborough had a seat here, and which now belongs to lord Spencer, built by the late duke upon the river Verlam, which runs through the garden; and who also built handsome almshouses at the entrance of the town.

The following remarkable inscription and character is cut upon the pedestal of a fine statue of the late queen Anne, carved by the noted Mr. Rysbrack, and erected at St. Albans, at the expence of the dutchess, in gratitude to the memory of that excellent princess:

"Queen Anne was very graceful and majestic
"in her person; religious without affectation.
"She always meant well. She had no false ambition, which appeared by her never complaining at king William's being preferred to the crown before her, when it was taken from the king her father, for following such counsels, and pursuing such measures, as rendered the revolution necessary. It was her greatest affliction to be forced to act against him, even for security. Her journey to Nottingham was never concerted, but occasioned by the great consternation she was under at the king's sudden return from Salisbury.

"She always paid the greatest respect to king William and queen Mary; never insisted upon any one circumstance of grandeur, more than what was established in her family by king Charles II. though, after the revolution, she was presumptive heir to the crown, and, after the death of her sister, was in the place of prince of Wales.

"Upon her accession to the throne, the civil list was not increased. The late earl of Godolphin, lord high treasurer of England, often said, that from accidents in the customs, and lenity in the collection, it did not arise, one year with another, to more than five hundred thousand pounds a year.

"She had no variety in her expences, nor bought any one jewel in the whole time of her reign.

"She paid out of her civil list many pensions granted in former reigns, which have since been thrown upon the public.

"When a war was necessary to secure Europe against the power of France, she contributed, in one year, towards the war, out of her civil list, one hundred thousand pounds, in ease of her subjects.

"She granted the revenue arising from the first fruits, to augment the provisions of the poorer clergy.

"She never refused her private charity to proper objects.

"Till a few years before her death, she never had but twenty thousand pounds a year for her "privy.

“ privy purse. At the latter end of her reign,
 “ it did not exceed twenty-six thousand pounds a “ year; which was much to her honour, because “ it is subject to no account. And as to her robes
 “ it will appear by records in the exchequer, “ that in nine years she spent only thirty-two “ thousand and fifty pounds, including the coro“ nation expence.

“ She was extremely well bred, treated her “ chief ladies and servants as if they had been “ her equals. Her behaviour to all that ap“ proached her was decent, and full of dignity;
 “ and shewed condescension, without art or “ meanness.

“ All this I know to be true.

“ SARAH MARLBOROUGH.
 “ MDCCXXXVIII.”

Near this town two bloody battles were fought between the houses of York and Lancaster: the first upon the twenty-third of May 1455, in which the Yorkists got the day; the second on Shrove Tuesday, in the 39th of Henry VI. when the martial queen Margaret overcame the Yorkists, who had then the king in their power, and fought under the sanction of his name.

In the middle of this town king Edward I. erected a very stately cross in memory of queen Eleanor, who dying in Lincolnshire was carried through St. Albans to Westminster, where she was interred.

St. Albans sends two members to parliament, has a large market, especially for wheat, on Saturday; and three annual fairs, viz. the 25th of March, the 17th of June, and the 29th of September, all for the sale of horses, cows and sheep, and for hiring of servants.

On the west side of the river Ver, opposite to this town, stood the ancient and famous city of Verulam. When Julius Cæsar invaded Britain, Verulam was a large and populous place, though the only remains of it at present are, the ruins of walls, and some tessellated pavements and Roman coins, which have from time to time been discovered by digging.

About the year 1666 there was dug up in this place a copper coin, which on one side had Romulus and Remus sucking the wolf; and on the other, the word Roma, much defaced.

When the Romans drove from hence the powerful Cassibelinus, who is supposed to have been king of the Cassii, they plundered the town of Verulam; but the inhabitants living quietly under their government, they were rewarded with the privileges of citizens of Rome, and their town made a municipium, or city. This was one of the two Roman cities that were taken and sacked by the Britons, under the conduct of Boadicia, queen of the Iceni, in the reign of the emperor Nero, when a most dreadful slaughter was made of the Romans, and their allies. The other city destroyed by the Britons on this occasion, was Maldon, in Essex; but both these places were afterwards rebuilt, and flourished under the Romans.

In the fields adjoining to St. Albans, Garinus, an abbot of that place, founded, about the year 1190, an house or hospital for six poor persons, and leprous women. It was dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and called St. Mary de la Pray; which, in course of time, became so well endowed, that a princess, and several nuns of the order of St. Benedict, were maintained here. Cardinal Wolsey, commendatory abbot of St. Albans, procured, about the year 1528, a bull from pope Clement VIII. for the suppression of this nunnery, and annexing the revenues to the monastery of St. Albans; but on the sixth of June, in the 20th year of Henry VIII. he obtained a grant of it, together with all the lands belonging to that house, for himself. After the cardinal's attainder, the king exchanged it for other lands, with the abbey of St. Albans.

BANSTED.

This village is situated between Darking and Croydon in Surry, and is remarkable for producing a great quantity of walnuts; but much more for its downs, one of the most delightful spots in England, on account of the agreeable seats in that neighbourhood; for the extensive prospect of several counties on both sides the Thames, and even of the royal palaces of Windsor and Hampton Court; and for the fineness of the turf, covered with a short grass intermixed with thyme, and other fragrant herbs, that render the mutton of this tract, though small, remarkable for its sweetness. On these downs there is a four miles course for horse races, which is greatly frequented.

BARKING.

This is a large market town in Essex, situated about eleven miles from London, on a creek that leads to the Thames, from whence fish is sent up in boats to London, the town being chiefly inhabited by fishermen.

This parish has been so much enlarged by lands recovered from the Thames, and the river Rothering, which runs on the west side of the town, that it has two chapels of ease, one at Ilford, and another called New Chapel, on the side of Epping Forest; and the great and small tythes are computed at above 600*l.* per annum.

At a small distance from the town, in the way to Dagenham, stood a large old house, in which the gunpowder plot is said to have been first projected.

BARNET.

This town is situated in the road to St. Albans, eleven miles from London, on the top of a hill, whence it is called High Barnet, and also Chipping, or Cheaping Barnet, from king Henry the second's granting the monks of St. Albans the privilege of holding a market here.

In this town is an alms-house founded and endowed by James Ravenscroft, esq; for six widows. Likewise a free-school founded by queen Elizabeth, and endowed partly by that princess, and partly partly by alderman Owen of London, whose additional endowment is paid by the fishmongers company, who appoint twenty-four governors, by whom the masters and ushers are chosen to teach seven children gratis, and all the other children for five shillings a quarter. The church is a chapel of ease to the village of East Barnet.

Here is a famous market for corn and cattle, held on Wednesday; and six annual fairs, viz. the 8th, 9th, and 10th of April, for toys: and the 4th, 5th, and 6th of September, for English, Welsh, and Scotch cattle.

This place is remarkable for a decisive battle fought in its neighbourhood on Easter-day 1468, between the houses of York and Lancaster, in which the great earl of Warwick, styled the father up, and puller down of kings, was slain, together with many of the principal nobility, and ten thousand men. The place supposed to have been the field of battle is a green spot near Kick's End, between St. Albans and Hatfield roads, a little before they meet; and here, in the year 1740, a stone column was erected, on which is a long inscription, giving a particular account of that battle.

East Barnet is a pleasant village situate near Whetstone and Endfield Chace, and was formerly much frequented on account of its medicinal spring, which was discovered in a neighbouring common upwards of an hundred years ago. The church is a mean edifice; but the rectory is very beneficial.

Here is the fine seat of the lord Trevor, to which queen Elizabeth gave the name of Mount Pleasant.

Though the following place is within the bill of mortality, yet as it is neither a town or village, it could not with propriety be inserted in the last chapter.

BLACKHEATH

This is a very extensive plain situated to the south of Greenwich, and is said to have received its name from the colour of the soil. It was on this plain that Wat Tyler, the famous rebel in the reign of Richard II. mustered near an hundred thousand men. On the heath is an eminence called Shooter's-hill, from whence there is a most extensive and beautiful prospect; and on the top of this hill is a spring, which constantly overflows, and is never frozen in the severest weather. Some time since a plan was formed for building a superb town on this hill, and some of the houses actually finished; but the design was laid aside, on account of the ground being so full of springs, that no cellars could be formed, nor the foundations securely laid.

The only remarkable building in this place is the magnificent seat of Sir Gregory Page, bart. It is a noble building, with two handsome fronts; that to the south is ornamented with an Ionic portico. The hall is a very elegant room, adorned with handsome pillars, and other ornaments in a good taste. The dining-room is well proportioned, with a small recess for the side board; the sitting up, rich carving and gilding, on a white ground; chimney-piece of white marble polished, and very beautiful. This room opens into the gallery, which is sixty feet long, twenty broad, and twenty high; the ceiling, cornice, door cases, and all the ornaments very elegant gilt carving on white grounds. The crimson bed-chamber is very handsomely ornamented; and the bed is placed in a part separated from the rest of the room by pillars. This opens into the library, which is forty-five by twenty, and is supported by very handsome pillars. In short, the whole fitting up and furnishing this magnificent structure, is exceedingly superb. The rooms are hung with crimson, and silks and damasks; and the cornices, ceilings, door-cases, slab, sofa, and chair frames, all carved and gilt in a just taste. The chimney-pieces are very beautiful, being of white marble polished, and some of them elegantly decorated with wreaths and festoons of wrought marble.

Besides these beautiful ornaments, this house is likewise adorned with many capital pictures, a list whereof, for the satisfaction of the curious, is here subjoined.

BLECHINGLY.

This is a small, ancient parliamentary borough, situate twenty miles from London, in the county of Surry. It had a castle, which, with the manor, is or was some years since in possession of the family of Sir William Clayton. The bailiff, who returns its members, is chosen annually at the lord of the manor's court. The town stands on a hill, on the side of Holmsdale, with a fine prospect as far as the south downs, and Sussex; and from some ruins of the castle, which are still visible, though overgrown with a coppice, there is a prospect east into Kent, and west into Hampshire. Here is an almshouse for ten poor people, and a free school for twenty poor children. It has a handsome church, which had a spire, but in 1606 it was consumed by lightning, and all the bells melted.

This place sends two members to parliament, though it has no weekly market; and here are two annual fairs, viz. the twenty-second of June, and the second of November, for horses, bullocks and toys.

CARSHALTON.

This village, which is in Surry, is situated among innumerable springs, which altogether form a river in the very center of the place, and joining other springs that flow from Croydon and Beddington, make one stream called the Wandell.

Though this village is thus situated among springs, it is built upon firm chalk, and on one of

of the most beautiful spots on that side of London, on which account it has many fine houses belonging to the citizens of London, some of which are built with such grandeur and expence, that they might be rather taken for the seats of the nobility, than the country houses of citizens and merchants. Mr. Scawen intended to build a magnificent house here in a fine park which is walled round, and great quantity of stone and other materials were collected by him for the purpose; but the design was never carried into execution. Here also doctor Ratcliff built a very fine house, which afterwards belonged to Sir John Fellows, who added gardens and curious water-works. It at length passed into the hands of the lord Hardwick, who sold it to the late William Mitchell, esq; by whose family it is at this time possessed.

CASHIOBURY.

This is situated sixteen miles north of London, in the county of Hertford; and is said to have been the seat of the kings of Mercia, during the heptarchy, till Offa gave it to the monastery of St. Albans. Henry VIII. however bestowed it on Richard Morison, esq; from whom it passed to Arthur lord Capel, baron of Hadham, and from him came by inheritance to be the manor of the earls of Essex, who have here a noble seat erected in the form of an H, with a large park adorned with fine woods and walks. The gardens were planted and laid out by Le Notre in the reign of king Charles II. The front and one side are of brick and modern, but the other side is very antique.

CHERTSEY.

This town, which is situate in Surry, nineteen miles from London, has a bridge over the Thames to Shepperton in Middlesex; and its principal trade is in malt, which is sent in barges from hence to London. It gives name to a hundred, which has the particular privilege of being exempted from the jurisdiction of the high sheriff, who must direct his writ to the bailiff of it, who is appointed for life by letters patent from the exchequer. It is noted for the burial place of Henry V. whose bones were afterwards removed by Henry VII. to Windsor; and for the retreat of the celebrated poet Mr. Cowley from court to the exercises of a country life, the happiness of which he has beautifully described in one of his poems; as he has, in another, the base servility of a court life, and his hearty abhorrence of it, in that well known distich.

Were I to curse the man I hate,
Attendance and dependence be his fate.

Here is a market on Wednesdays, and four annual fairs, viz. the first Monday in Lent, for horses, cattle, and hops; the fourteenth of May, the sixth of August, and the twenty-fifth of September, for horses, cattle and toys.

At Coway Stakes, near this place, Julius Cæsar passed the Thames. There is a handsome free-school here, built by Sir William Perkins. Its market was granted by king James I.

CHESHUNT.

This village is situate about three miles to the south of Hoddesdon, in Hertfordshire, and is thought by some to be the Ducalium of Antoninus, which, in his Itinerary, he places fifteen miles from London, and which stands near the military way called Ermine-street.

In Kilsnoe-fields, west of Cheshunt, are the remains of a camp. The angle of the square, or rather oblong fortification, is still remaining, and the rampart and ditch are very visible for above an hundred yards.

There was formerly in this village a benedictine nunnery, dedicated to the Virgin Mary. It was founded about the year 1183, and afterwards augmented with the lands and tenements of the canons of Cathel, in the 24th of Henry III. But notwithstanding this augmentation of its revenues, it was valued, on the dissolution of religious houses, at no more than fourteen pounds one shilling per annum.

In the parish of Cheshunt is a small village called THEOBALDS, where formerly was built a magnificent seat by lord treasurer Burleigh; the gallery of which was painted with the genealogy of the kings of England, and from thence was a descent into the garden, which was encompassed with a ditch filled with water, and large enough to have the pleasure of rowing in a boat between the shrubs. It was adorned with a great variety of trees and plants, labyrinths made with much labour, a jet d'eau with its basin of white marble, and with columns and pyramids. In the summer-house, the lower part of which was built semicircularly, were the twelve Roman emperors in white marble, and a table of touchstone; the upper part of it was set round with leaden cisterns, into which water was conveyed through pipes.

This seat the lord Burleigh gave to his younger son Sir Robert Cecil, in whose time king James I. staying there for one night's refreshment, as he was coming to take possession of the crown of England, he was so delighted with the place that he gave him the manor of Hatfield Regis in exchange for it, and afterwards enlarged the park, and encompassed it with a wall ten miles round. This palace he often visited, in order to enjoy the pleasure of hunting in Enfield Chase and Epping Forest, and at last died there. In the civil wars it was however plundered and defaced; it being the place from whence king Charles I. set out to erect his standard at Nottingham: king Charles II. granted the manor to George Monk, duke of Albemarle; but it reverting again to the crown, for want of heirs male, king William III. gave it to William Bentinck, whom he created earl of Portland, from whom it descended to the duke his grandson: the great park, a part of which was in Hertfordshire, and a part in Middlesex, is now converted into farms.

Here are several houses belonging to persons of distinction; and in this neighbourhood Richard Cromwell, who had been protector, but abdicated, passed the last part of his life in a very private manner.

CHIPPING ONGAR.

This town is situated twenty miles from London, in the county of Essex, and was formerly the manor of Richard Lacy, who being protector of England, while Henry II. was absent in Normandy, he built a church and a castle here with other fortifications, the remains of which are still to be seen.

COBHAM.

Though this town is but small, yet it has some good inns, being situated in the high road to Portsmouth, about sixteen miles from London. It has two annual fairs, one on the seventeenth of March for toys; and the other on the eleventh of December, for horses and sheep.

Near Cobham are several fine seats, particularly that of Mr. Bridges, which is built in a very singular taste, something after the model of an Italian villa, but very plain on the outside. The apartments within are very commodious, and the principal rooms elegantly fitted up, and richly ornamented. The offices below are very convenient, and judiciously contrived to answer the purposes for which they were designed. But what chiefly strikes the beholder's eye, is a false story contrived on each side of the house, taken from the difference in the height of the side rooms from those principal apartments; and these are converted into long galleries, with a small apartment at one end, which affords a communication between them.

The house is situated on an eminence, so that it commands a prospect of the adjacent fields, which are kept in very exact order; and there is a declivity from the house to the river Mole, which passes by the side of the garden. It stands about a mile from the road, and is so much hid by the trees near it, as not be seen till the spectator rises on the heath beyond Cobham, where, in several parts of the road between that and Ripley are fine views of it.

There are in this neighbourhood two other elegant seats, one belonging to lord Ligonier, and the other to—Hamilton, esq. The gardens and ornamented park of the latter is said to be exceeded by few in England.

COLNBROOK, or COLEBROOK.

This town is situated in two counties, one part being in Middlesex, and the other in Buckinghamshire. It stands on four channels of the river Coln, over each of which it has a bridge, and is about eighteen miles from London. It is situated in the high road to Bath, and has several considerable inns by which it principally subsists.

Here is a charity school, and an ancient chapel, said to have been founded by king Edward III. Likewise a weekly market on Tuesday, and two annual fairs, viz. the fifth of April, and the first of May, both for horses, black cattle and sheep.

C R A Y F O R D.

This town, which is situate two miles to the west of Dartford, and about fourteen miles from London, received its name from its situation on a small river called the Cray, over which there was formerly a ford. It is an obscure town, and has not any thing remarkable, except a small market on Tuesday. But on the heath, and in the fields near the place, are several caverns, from ten to twenty fathoms deep, narrow at the top and wide at the bottom. It is supposed by some that these were dug by the ancient Britons, and used by them as granaries for securing their corn; but others suppose they were made by the Saxons, as receptacles for their wives and children, and effects, when they were at war with the Britons.

To the south of this town is Foot's Cray, a small place, remarkable for the elegant seat of Bouchier Cleeve, esq; called Foot's CRAY PLACE. It was built by himself after a design of Palladio of the Ionic order, and is very elegant. The hall is octagonal, and has a gallery, round which you are conveyed to the bedchambers. The situation is pleasant, and the prospect from the house very good. The edifice is built of stone, but the offices, which are on each side at some distance, are brick. The disposition of the rooms within the house appear to be very convenient, and the several apartments are elegantly finished and suitably furnished. The Chinese bed, and other furniture of this kind in the principal bedchamber, is perfectly beautiful. The gallery, which extends the whole length of the north front of the house is a very grand room, and is filled with pictures by the most eminent masters; and there are several other good pieces of this kind in the dining room and parlour; a list of all which is as follows:

Common Parlour.

Admittance to see the house is by tickets from Mr. Cleeve, every Thursday during the summer.

CROYDON.

This is a very large and populous town, situate on the edge of Banstead downs, about eleven miles from London, in the county of Surry. It is said that in this town was formerly a royal palace, which, with the manor, was given to the archbishops of Canterbury, who converted it to their use; but it is now greatly decayed. Archbishop Whitgift founded an hospital here, which is a handsome building, in the form of a college, and endowed with farms, for the maintenance of a warden, and twenty-eight men and women, poor decayed housekeepers of this town and Lambeth; and a school for ten boys and ten girls, who are all clothed and taught, with a house for the master, who must be a clergyman, endowed with twenty pounds a year for his salary.

This church, which is the largest and finest in the county, stands by the palace, and contains many remarkable monuments; particularly that of doctor Grindall, whose effigies lie on his tomb in his episcopal robes. Another of archbishop Sheldon, reckoned one of the finest in England; and one for Mr. Tyrrel, a grocer of London, who gave two hundred pounds to erect a market-house, besides forty pounds to beautify the church.

The town is encompassed with hills, well stored with wood, of which great quantities of charcoal are made, and sent to London. The market is chiefly for oats and meal, though there is a great sale of wheat and barley. Here are likewise two annual fairs for cattle; one held the fifth of July, and the other the second of October.

DARTFORD or DARENTFORD.

This town is so called from its situation on the river Darent, * which runs through it, and at a small distance falls into the Thames. It is situate in Kent, sixteen miles from London, in the high road to Canterbury and Dover, and, on that account, is remarkable for containing a great number of inns and other public houses. The market, which is on Saturdays, is chiefly for corn, and the carry on that manufacture: and on this river was also the first mill for slitting iron bars to make wire.

town has the honour of giving the title of viscount to the earl of Jersey.

In this town king Edward III. about the year 1355, founded and endowed a celebrated nunnery, which he dedicated to St. Mary and St. Margaret. The prioress and nuns were first of the order of St. Augustine, then of St. Dominic, and afterwards of St. Augustine again. At the dissolution they were a second time of the order of St. Dominic, but under the government of Black friars settled at Langley in Hertfordshire. It was endowed at the suppression with yearly revenues amounting to 380l 9s.

The church, which is large, and dedicated to the Trinity, has two church-yards, one round the edifice, and the other without the town, on the top of a hill, which is so high, that it overlooks the tower of the church.

D A T C H E T.

This is a pleasant village situated in Buckinghamshire, about eighteen miles from London. It is noted for its horse races, and has a bridge over the Thames erected in the reign of queen Anne.

In this parish is Ditton park, the house belonging to which is an ancient and venerable mansion, and was built by Sir Ralph Winwood, secretary of state to king James I. after which it came into the Montague family; but on the demise of the late duke the house and manor of Datchet came to the present earl of Cardigan. The former is built in the manner of a castle, surrounded by a large moat, in the middle of the park, which is well planted with timber. The apartments are large and beautifully painted; and in the picture gallery is a good collection of paintings, many of which are executed by the best artists.

E G H A M.

This town is situated on the bank of the Thames, almost opposite to Staines, and three miles on this side of Windsor. It has several good inns, a noble charity school, and an almshouse built and endowed by Baron Denham, surveyor of the works to king Charles II. for five poor old women, each of whom has an orchard. The parsonage house was formerly the seat of Sir John Denham, who, rebuilt it. This Sir John was father to the poet of that name, who made this spot his principal place of retirement.

E P S O M.

This is a very handsome and well built town in Surry, sixteen miles from London. It abounds with very genteel houses, which are principally the retreats of the merchants and citizens of London, and is a delightful place open to Banstead Downs. Its mineral waters which issue from a rising ground adjoining, were discovered in 1618, and soon became extremely famous; but though they are not impaired in virtue, they are far from being in the same repute as formerly; however, the salt made of them is valued all over Europe. The hall, galleries, and other public apartments, are now gone to decay, and there remains only one house on the spot, which is inhabited by a countryman and his wife, who carry the waters in bottles to the adjacent places. Horse races are annually held on the neighbouring downs.

There are many fine seats in the neighbourhood, particularly lord Guildford's, lord Baltimore's, the lady Fielding's, and the earl of Berkshire's. The town extends about a mile and a half in a semicircle, from the church to lord Guildford's seat at Durdam; and it has been observed that there are here so many fields, meadows, orchards, and gardens, that a stranger would be at a loss to know whether this was a town in a wood, or a wood in a town.

E R I T H.

This village is situate on the bank of the Thames, about fourteen miles from London, in the county of Kent. The village itself has not any thing remarkable; but on the brow of a hill, nearly adjoining is BELVEDERE HOUSE, the mansion of the late Sampson Gideon, esq. This house commands a vast extent of a fine country many miles beyond the Thames; which is about a mile and a half distant. The river and navigation add greatly to the beauty of the scene, which exhibits to the eye of the delighted spectator, as pleasing a landscape of the kind as imagination can form. The innumerable ships employed in the immense trade of London are beheld continually sailing up and down the river. On the other side are prospects not less beautiful, though of another kind.

The house is but small, though an addition has been made of a very noble room, this and two others are finely furnished with pictures, of which the following is a catalogue. The collection, though not numerous, is very valuable, it containing none but pieces which are originals by the greatest masters, and some of them very capital.

In the long Parlour.

View of Venice, by Canaletti.
Ditto, with the Doge marrying the sea, ditto.
Time bringing truth to light, a sketch, Rubens.
The Alchymist, Teniers.
Portrait of Sir John Gage, Holbein.
A landscape, G. Poussin.
Battle of the Amazons, Rottenhammer.
The unjust steward, Quintin Matsys.

In the Lobby.

Noah's ark, Velvet Brughel.
St. Catherine, Leonardo da Vinci.
Van Trump, Francis Hals.
Vulcan, or the element of fire, Bassan.
A picture of horses, its companion, Wouverman.
Two insides of churches, small, De Neef.
A Dutch woman and her three children, Sir Ant. More.
Rembrandt painting an old woman, himself.
A courtesan and her gallant, Giorgione.
The golden age, Velvet Brughel.

Snyders

Snyders with his wife and child, Rubens.
 Rebecca bringing presents to Laban, De la Hyre.
 Boors at cards, Teniers.
 The element of earth, Jai. Baffan.
 Marriage in Cana of Gallilee, P. Veronese.
 Two landscapes.
 The genealogy of Christ, Albert Durer.
 Beggar boys at cards, Salvator Rosa.
 Herod consulting the wisemen, Rembrandt.
 Marriage of St. Catharine, Old Palma.
 Two fine bas relievos in brass, one Bacchus and Ariadne, the other Ceres teaching Triptolemus the use of the plough, Soldani.

In the Saloon.

The conception, painted for an altar-piece, Murillo.
 The flight into Egypt, its companion, ditto.
 Vulcan, Venus, Cupid, and sundry figures, an emblematic subject, Tintoret.
 Mars and Venus, P. Veronese.
 Christ among the doctors, L. Giordano.
 Duke of Buckingham's three children, and a son of Rubens, himself.
 A landscape, Claude.
 Leopold's gallery, Teniers,
 Teniers's own gallery, its companion, ditto.

E S H E R.

This village is situated near Walton upon Thames, and is remarkable for containing two very elegant buildings; the first of which, called ESHER PLACE, was the seat of the late Henry Pelham, esq.

The house is a Gothic structure, built of a brownish red brick, with stone facings to the doors, windows, &c. It stands upon almost the lowest ground belonging to it, and has the river Mole gliding close by it, and through the grounds. This house was originally one of those built by Cardinal Wolsey; and here it is said, that Cardinal was first seized by order of Henry VIII. on his refusing to annul his marriage with queen Catharine, and which refusal brought on his fall. The late Mr. Pelham, however, rebuilt the whole, except the two towers in the body, which are the same that belonged to the old building.

The grand floor of the house is elegantly finished, and consists of six rooms. The great parlour is carved and gilt in a taste suitable to the stile of the house, with curious marble chimney-pieces and slabs. In this room are the portraits of Mr. Pelham, Sir Robert Walpole, afterwards earl of Orford, lord Townshend, duke of Rutland, the late duke of Devonshire, and the late duke of Grafton; a picture of lady Catharine Pelham and her son is over the chimney. In the drawing-room, over the chimney, is a picture of king Charles II. when only eleven years old, by Vandyke. The library is curiously finished, and there is a good collection of books in it.

There is a fine summer-house built upon a hill on the left hand as you enter, which commands the view of the house, park, and country round on both sides of the Thames for many miles.

The park or ground in which the house is situated, appears quite plain and unadorned; yet perhaps not a little art has been used to give it this natural and simple appearance, which is certainly very pleasing. But in one part of it there is a pretty wilderness laid out in walks, and planted with a variety of ever-green trees and plants, with a grotto in it, and seats in different places. The wood in the park is well disposed, and consists of fine oak, elm, and other trees; and the whole country round appears finely shaded with wood.

The other building with which this village is adorned is CLAREMONT, the seat of the late duke of Newcastle, but now in the possession of lord Clive.

The house was designed and built by the late Sir John Vanbrugh, in a whimsical stile of architecture. It was afterwards purchased of Sir John by his grace who made very considerable improvements. The structure though singular, does not appear to be irregular. It is built of brick, with a great deal of variety in it, and of considerable extent, but not much elevated. Among the improvements made by his grace was the addition of a grand room for the reception of company, when numerous, which makes the ends of the house not appear similar. There is a lawn in the front shaded on each side with trees, and the ground behind it rising gradually, shews the trees there also, so that the house appears to be embowered by them, except just in the front; and the white summer-house, with four little pinacles, one at each corner, built on the mount which gives name to the place, when viewed from before the front of the house, rises up finely from behind the trees, and altogether forms a very pleasing appearance.

The park in which it is situated is distinguished by its noble woods, lawns, walks, mounts, prospects, &c. And the summer-house, called the Belvedera, about a mile distance from the house, affords a very beautiful and extensive view of the adjacent countries.

E T O N.

This town is situated on the banks of the Thames, on the borders of Berkshire, and joined to Windsor by a wooden bridge. It is famous for its beautiful college, founded by Henry VI. in the nineteenth year of his reign for a provost, ten priests, four clerks, six choristers, twenty-five poor grammar-scholars, with a master to teach them, and twenty-five poor old men. Some of the endowments were taken away by Edward IV. and at the general dissolution, out of which it was particularly excepted, the annual revenue was valued at no more than eight hundred and eighty-six pounds twelve shillings. But this revenue has been since increased to five thousand pounds a year; and the college now consists of a provost and seven fellows, two schoolmasters, two conductors, an organist, seven clerks, ten choristers, and other officers. Seventy poor grammar scholars are instructed here; they are nominated by the king, and thence called King's scholars; these, when properly qualified, are elected on the first Tuesday in August, to King's college, in the university of Cambridge; where, after being students three years, they claim a fellowship: but as there is not always a vacancy at Cambridge, the scholars remain at Eaton till vacancies happen, and these vacancies they fill up according to seniority.

The school is divided into two parts, the upper and the lower, and each of these is subdivided into three classes. Children are admitted very young into the lower school; none enter the upper school till they can make latin verses, and have acquired some knowledge of the Greek. Besides the seventy scholars on the foundation, there are seldom less than three hundred others, for whose education the masters are paid, and who board at the masters houses. The master of each school has therefore four ushers. The building has large cloisters like the religious houses abroad, and the chapel is a noble pile of Gothic architecture.

The present school-room is a modern building, and the other parts of the college have been repaired and beautified at a great expence. There is a library for the use of the school, and the number of the books have been greatly increased by two other collections; one bequeathed by doctor Waddington, sometime bishop of Chester, valued at two thousand pounds; and the other by the late lord chief justice Reeves, to whom the collection had been bequeathed by Richard Tapham, esq; keeper of the records in the tower of London. The gardens are very large and pleasant, extending from the college almost to the Thames.

G A T T O N.

This village is situate under the side of a hill in the road to Ryegate, about eighteen miles from London in the county of Surry. It is a borough by prescription, and was formerly a large town, but now a mean village, with a small church, without fair or market; yet, ever since the 29th of Henry VI. has sent members to parliament, that are returned by its constable, who is annually chosen at a court held by the lord of the manor for that purpose.

This town is supposed to have been known to the Romans, by reason of their coins, and other antiquities that have been discovered here; and where the manor-house stands it is said there was once a castle. This place sends two members to parliament.

G R A V E S E N D.

This town is situated on the Thames, opposite to Tilbury Fort, and about five miles east from Dartford, in Kent. It is a large and populous town, but the streets are narrow and dirty, and the buildings mean. In the east part of it are the remains of an old chapel, supposed originally to have belonged to some religious house.

This town, and Milton, a small village to the east of Gravesend, was incorporated in the 10th year of queen Elizabeth, by the stile of the por-treve, jurats, and inhabitants of Gravesend and Milton; but the name of portreue is now changed into that of mayor.

In the road before the town all outward bound ships are obliged to anchor till they have been visited by the custom-house officers; and for this purpose a centinel at the block-house gives notice when any ship is coming down the river, by firing his musket. But the homeward bound all pass by without notice, unless to receive tide-waiters on board, if they are not supplied before. Most of the outward ships compleat their cargoes, and take in provisions here, which occasions the town to be generally very full of seamen.

In the reign of Richard II. the French and Spaniards coming up the Thames, burnt and plundered the town, and carried away most of the people. To compensate for this misfortune, the abbot of St. Mary le Grace on Tower-hill, to whom Richard II. had granted a manor belonging to Gravesend, called Parrock's, obtained a grant from the crown, that the inhabitants of this town and Milton should have the sole privilege of carrying passengers by water from hence to London, at four-pence the whole fare, or two-pence a head, which was confirmed by Henry VIII. but since that time the fare has been advanced to nine-pence per head. Coaches ply here at the coming in of the tilt boats, to carry passengers to Rochester.

In the year 1727, the whole town of Gravesend, together with its church, was consumed by fire: and the parliament, in order to assist the inhabitants in rebuilding their town and church, granted five thousand pounds by an act passed in 1731, and the church is accordingly considered as one of the fifty new ones, then ordered to be built at the expence of the public.

King Henry VIII. built two platforms, one in this town, and the other at Milton; they are mounted with heavy cannon, and intended as a defence to the mouth of the Thames.

In the year 1624, one Mr. Pinnock gave twenty-one dwelling-houses here, besides one for a master weaver, for the employment of the poor; and here is a charity school for twenty boys, who are clothed and educated.

The towns for several miles round Gravesend are supplied from hence with garden stuff, of which great quantities are also sent to London, where the asparagus of Gravesend is preferred to that from many other places.

Here are two weekly markets, the one on Wednesday, and the other on Saturday; likewise two annual fairs, viz. the twenty-third of April, and the twenty-fourth of October, for horses, black cattle, cloaths, toys, and various other commodities.

There are a great variety of romantic landscapes in this neighbourhood. The hills are wild, steep, almost covered with wood, and rise into bold variations, between the breaks of which vast prospects of the valley beneath, and of the Thames winding through it, are very frequently seen; and from the tops of some of them are seen the most extensive prospects of the whole country.

HAMPTON

HAMPTON COURT.

This royal palace is situated on the north bank of the river Thames, about two miles from Kingston. It was originally built by cardinal Wolsey, and given by him to king Henry VIII. who greatly enlarged it. King William pulled down the old apartments, and rebuilt them in the manner in which they now appear. The park and gardens are about three miles in circumference. On a pediment at the front of the palace on this side is a bas relief of the triumphs of Hercules over Envy; and facing it a large oval basin, answering to the form of this part of the garden, which is a large oval divided into gravel walks and parterres laid out in the old taste by those two eminent gardeners London and Wise.

As you enter the grand walk there are two large marble vases of exquisite workmanship; one said to be performed by Mr. Cibbet, and the other by a foreigner, as a trial of skill. They are beautifully adorned with bas relief; that on the right hand representing the triumphs of Bacchus, and that on the other, Amphitrite and the Nereids.

At the end of this walk, opposite a large canal which runs into the park, are two other large vases, the bas relief of one representing the judgment of Paris; and that of the other Meleager hunting the wild boar. In four of the parterres are four beautiful brass statues.

The first is a Gladiator from the original antique in the Borgheze palace at Rome. The second is a young Apollo. The third a Diana; and the fourth Saturn going to devour one of his children. All after fine antiques.

At the gates of the palace are four large brick piers adorned with the lion and unicorn, and several trophies of war well carved in stone. Passing through a long court-yard we come to the first portal, decorated by Wolsey with the heads of Trajan, Adrian, Tiberius and Vitellius. Through this portal we pass into a large quadrangle. This leads into a second, where is the astronomical clock made by the celebrated Tompion. On the left hand of this quadrangle is the great old hall, in which queen Caroline erected a theatre. In the front is a portal of brick decorated with four Cæsars heads. On the opposite side is a stone colonade of fourteen columns, that leads us to a great stair-case, which, with the ceiling is painted by Verrio. On the left side, at the top, are represented Apollo and the nine muses, at whose feet sits the God Pan with his unequal reeds, and a little below them the goddess Ceres, holding in one hand a wheat sheaf, and with the other pointing to loaves of bread. At her feet is Flora surrounded by her attendants, and holding in her right hand a chaplet of flowers. Near her are the two river Gods, Thame and Isis, with their urns; and in the middle is a large table decorated with flowers, on which is a quantity of rich plate.

On the ceiling are Jupiter and Juno, with Ganymede riding on Jupiter's eagle, and offering the cup. Juno's peacock is in the front. One of the Parcs, with her scissors in her hand, seems to wait for Jove's orders to cut the thread of life. These figures are covered with a fine canopy surrounded with the signs of the Zodiac, and by several Zephyrs, with flowers in their hands; and on one side of them is Fame with her two trumpets. Underneath is a beautiful figure of Venus riding on a swan, Mars addressing himself to her as a lover, and Cupid riding on another swan. On the right hand are Pluto and Proserpine, Coelus and Terra, Cybele crowned with a tower, and others. In the front are Neptune and Amphitrite, with two attendants who are serving them with fruit. Bacchus is leaning on a rich ewer, and, being accompanied by his attendants, places his left hand on the head of Silenus, who sits on an ass that is fallen down, he seeming to catch at a table, to which Diana above is pointing. The table is supported by eagles; on one side of it sits Romulus, the founder of Rome, with a wolf; and on the other side of it is Hercules leaning on his club. Peace in her right hand holds a laurel, and in her left a palm over the head of Æneas, who seems inviting the twelve Cæsars, among whom is Spuria the soothsayer, to a celestial banquet. Over their heads hovers the genius of Rome, with a flaming sword, and a bridle, the latter the emblem of government, and the former that of destruction.

Hence we pass into the guard chamber, which is very large and spacious, and contains arms for five thousand men, curiously placed in various forms. This leads us to the other rooms, which are all elegantly furnished with rich tapestry, and contain a great number of curious paintings executed by the best hands; an account of which is as follows:

In the king's presence chamber, on the left hand as you enter, is a fine picture 18 feet by 12, by Sir Godfrey Kneller. King William III. is in armour on a stately grey horse, trampling on trophies of war, by which lies a flaming torch. In the clouds Mercury and Peace support his helmet decorated with laurel, and a Cupid holds a scroll. At the bottom appears Neptune and his attendants by the side of a rock, welcoming the hero to shore; and at a distance is seen a fleet of ships, their sails swelled with the east wind. In the front Plenty with his cornucopia offers him an olive branch, and Flora presents flowers. Over the chimney is the marquis of Hamilton lord steward of the household to king Charles I. a whole length, by Van Somer; and over the doors are two pieces of architecture, by Rosso.

In the second presence chamber, over the chimney, is a whole length of Christiern IV. king of Denmark, by Van Somer. Over the three doors are pieces of ruins and landscapes, by Rosso. In this room are two fine marble tables, with two pier glasses, and two pair of gilt stands. The tapestry is ancient but very rich, the lights being all gold, and the shadows silk; the shadows are, Hercules and the Hydra, and Midas with his asses ears.

In the next room the tapestry represents part of the story of Abraham. Over the chimney is a whole length picture of Elizabeth queen of Bohemia, daughter of king James I. and over each of the two doors is a Madona by Domenico Feti.

In the fifth room the tapestry is ancient and richly wove with gold; the subject Abraham sending his servant to get a wife for Isaac. Over the chimney is an admirable whole length of king Charles I. by Vandyke; and over the doors two capital pictures; the one, David with Goliath's head, by Fetti; the other, the holy family, by Correggio.

In the king's state bed chamber the ceiling is painted by Verrio, and represents Endymion lying with his head in the lap of Morpheus, and Diana admiring him as he sleeps. Over two doors are two flower pieces, by Baptiste; and over the chimney is a whole length of the dutchess of York, by Van Somer. The tapestry of this room represents the history of Joshua, about which are eight silver sconces chased with the judgment of Solomon. The bed, which is of crimson velvet, is laced with gold, and on the top are plumes of white feathers.

In the king's private bedchamber, the bed is of crimson damask, and the room hung with tapestry, the subject of which is Solbay fight.

The king's dressing-room is hung with straw-coloured India damask, as are likewise the chairs, stools, and screen. The ceiling is painted by Verrio, and represents Mars sleeping in Venus's lap, with several cupids stealing away his armour, sword and spear, and others are binding his legs and arms with fetters of roses. Over the doors are flower pieces by Baptiste.

In the king's writing closet, over each door is a flower piece by Baptiste; and over the chimney a picture of great variety of birds by Bougdane.

Queen Mary's closet is hung with needle-work, said to be wrought by her own hand. The chairs and screen are likewise said to be her work. Over the chimney piece is an old painting, representing Jupiter's throne, near which is the thunder, and his eagle in the clouds, by Raphael.

The queen's gallery is seventy feet long, and twenty-five wide, and is hung with seven pieces of tapestry, representing the history of Alexander the Great, from Le Brun's paintings.

The ceiling of the queen's state bed-chamber is painted by Sir James Thornhill, and represents Aurora rising out of the ocean in her golden chariot, drawn by four white horses. The bed is of crimson damask; and besides other furniture the room is adorned with a glass lustre, with silver sockets. The pictures in this room are,

King James I. whole length, by Van Somer.

Queen Anne his consort, ditto.

Princess Elizabeth their daughter, ditto.

Henry prince of Wales, whole length, Vandyke.

George I.

George II.

Queen Caroline.

Frederick prince of Wales.

The queen's drawing-room is hung with green damask, on which are placed nine pictures, representing the triumph of Julius Cæsar, painted in water-colours upon canvas, by Andrea Man-tegna. These were formerly all in one piece. The ceiling of this room is painted by Verrio; in the center of which is the late queen Anne, under the character of Justice, holding the scales in one hand, and a sword in the other. She is dressed in a purple robe lined with ermine, and over her head is a crown supported by Neptune and Britannia.

In the queen's state audience room are, the duke, dutchess, and marchioness of Brunwick their daughter; the dutchess of Lenox, and Margaret queen of Scots, all at full length, by Holbein. The tapestry in this room represents the children of Israel carrying the twelve stones to the river Jordan.

In the prince of Wales's presence chamber over the doors are Guzman and Gundamor two Spanish ambassadors, and Madam Chatillon the French admiral's lady. Over the chimney Lewis XIII. with a walking stick in his hand, and a dog by his side; all by Holbein. The tapestry is wrought with the story of Tobit and Tobias.

In the prince's drawing-room, over the chimney is the duke of Wirtemberg; and over the doors the wife of Philip II. king of Spain, and count Mansfield general of the Spaniards in the low countries, whole lengths, all by Holbein. The tapestry of this room represents Elymas the sorcerer struck with blindness.

In the prince's bedchamber are four pictures, viz. Over the chimney a whole length of the duke of Lunenburg, grandfather to king George I. Over the doors Philip II. king of Spain; the consort of Christiern IV. king of Denmark, and a whole length of the prince of Parma, governor of the Netherlands; all by Holbein.

In the private dining-room are four pictures of the defeat of the Spanish Armada, by Vandervelde; and over the chimney a fine one by Vandyke of the lord Effingham Howard, lord high admiral of England.

In the admiral's gallery are pictures of the following celebrated admirals, viz.

Sir George Rooke.

Sir Cloudefley Shovel.

Sir John Leake.

Lord Torrington.

Admiral Churchill.

Sir Stafford Fairborne.

Sir John Jennings.

Sir Thomas Hopson.

Admiral Beaumont.

Sir Thomas Dilks.

Admiral Bembo.

Admiral Whetstone.

Admiral Withart.

Amiral Graydon.

Admiral Munden.

All these are painted by Dahl, and Sir Godfrey Kneller.

In the room of beauties nine ladies are placed in the following order:

Lady Peterborough.

Lady Ranelagh.

Lady

Lady Middleton.
Miss Pitt.
The dutchess of St. Albans;
Lady Essex.
Lady Dorset.
Queen Mary.
The dutchess of Grafton.

Queen Mary was painted by Wissing, and all the rest by Sir Godfrey Kneller.

In the Cartoon gallery were placed the celebrated cartoons of Raphael; but they are now removed to the queen's palace, in which they have been already mentioned.

Over the chimney piece in this gallery is a fine bas relief in white marble of Venus drawn in her chariot, and attended by several Cupids.

We now come to the queen's stair-case, where the ceiling is painted by Vick. Here is king Charles II. and Catharine his queen, with the duke of Buckingham representing Science in the habit of Mercury, while Envy is struck down by naked boys.

From this we descend into a new quadrangle, in the center of which is a round basin, and four large lamps on pedestals of iron work; and on the right hand over the windows are the twelve labours of Hercules in Fresco.

The whole palace consists of three quadrangles. The first and second are Gothic, but in the latter is a most beautiful colonade of the Ionic order, the columns in couples, built by Sir Christopher Wren. In the third court are the royal apartments, magnificently built of brick and stone by king William III.

Nearly adjoining to the entrance of the palace is a fine wooden bridge over the Thames, finished a few years since, and has been of very considerable advantage to this part of the country.

In this neighbourhood are likewise several very elegant seats belonging to the nobility and gentry.

H A R R O W on the H I L L.

This place is so called from its being situated on the highest hill in the county of Middlesex, about fifteen miles north west of London; on the top of which stands the church with a very high spire.

The parish is remarkable for a free-school founded by Mr. John Lyons in the reign of queen Elizabeth; and on the fourth of August in each year a select number of the scholars, dressed in the habit of archers, attend on the hill, and shoot at a mark for a silver arrow.

H E R T F O R D or H A R T F O R D.

This town is pleasantly situated in a sweet air and dry valley on the river Lea. It is built in the figure of a roman Y, and has a castle placed between the two horns, in which is the sessions-house for the county. An elegant town hall has been lately erected; and here is also a county goal.

Hertford had formerly five churches, which are now reduced to two, All Saints, and St. Andrew's. The former is situated on the south side of the town, and has a tall spire, covered with lead, and eight good bells, besides an organ, and a handsome gallery for the mayor and aldermen of the borough, and for the governors of Christ-church hospital in London, who have erected a convenient house in this town for the reception of sick and supernumerary children: they have also built a large gallery in the church, in which two hundred of their children may be accommodated. St. Andrew's is only remarkable for giving its name to one of the streets. Here is a free grammar school, founded by Richard Hale, esq; in the reign of king James I. and endowed with forty pounds a year: the corporation are governors of it, but the master is appointed by the heirs or representatives of Mr. Hale. The house is a handsome structure, and was rebuilt some years ago. Here are also three charity-schools, one erected by the inhabitants for forty boys, who are clothed and taught by subscription; another for twenty-five children, and a third for twenty children. Both the latter are supported by private contributions.

This town was a place of some note in the time of the ancient Britons. The east Saxon king's often keep their courts here, and upon the first division of the kingdom into counties, it was made the county town. It sent members to parliament in the reign of Edward I. but after the seventh of Henry V. on the petition of the bailiff and burgesses, to be excused on account of their poverty, that privilege was discontinued till the twenty second of James I.

In the time of Henry VII. the standard of weights and measures was fixed here, and queen Mary made this a corporation, by the name of bailiffs and burgesses; and by her charter, the number of burgesses was to have been sixteen.

In the twenty-fifth and thirty-fifth years of queen Elizabeth, Michaelmas term was held here, on account of the plague, which then raged in London; and that princess granted the town a new charter, by the stile of a bailiff, eleven capital burgesses, and sixteen assistants.

King James I. granted another charter, with the stile of mayor, burgesses and commonalty, to have ten capital burgesses, and sixteen assistants, and the mayor to be chosen out of the burgesses, by both the burgesses and assistants; but at present, the town is governed by a mayor, high steward, who is generally a nobleman, a recorder, nine aldermen, a town clerk, chamberlain, ten capital burgesses, and sixteen assistants, together with two serjeants at mace.

Here was formerly a priory of Benedictine monks, subordinate to the abbey of St. Albans, erected about the latter end of the reign of William the Conqueror, by the bishop of Limosie, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary. Its annual revenues at the dissolution amounted to seventy-two pounds, fourteen shillings and two-pence.

This town has the honour of giving the title of earl to the duke of Somerset, and of sending two members to parliament. The principal commodities of its market are wool, wheat, and malt; and it is said to send 5000 quarters of malt, weekly to London by the river Lea.

Here are likewise four annual fairs, viz. on the Saturday fortnight before Easter, the twelfth of May, the fifth of July, and the eighth of November, all for the sale of horses, black cattle and sheep.

HATFIELD.

This town is situated on the great northern road, about twenty miles from London, in the county of Hertford; and is likewise called Bishop's Hatfield, from its belonging to the bishops of Ely. Here was once a royal palace, from whence both king Edward VI. and queen Elizabeth were conducted to the throne. King Edward was educated here, and queen Elizabeth purchased the manor of the bishops of Ely. Here Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, held a synod against the Eutychian opinions; and here are still two charity schools.

The church, which is a rectory, is in the gift of the earl of Salisbury; and is computed to be worth eight hundred pounds per annum.

This town, besides a weekly market on Thursday, has two annual fairs, one on the twenty-third of April, and the other on the eighteenth of October.

The most remarkable building with which this town is adorned is the seat of the earl of Salisbury, built by the great lord Burleigh, and called Hatfield house. It is a beautiful antique building situated on an eminence at the entrance of the town, and commands a most delightful prospect. The park and gardens, in which is a vineyard, are watered by the river Lea.

HODDESDON.

This town, which is a great thoroughfare, is situate on the river Lea, about nineteen miles from London, in the same county with the former. It is very small, though it had once a considerable market for all sorts of grain; but this, for some years past, has been discontinued.

Queen Elizabeth granted, by charter, a free grammar school to this town, and endowed it with certain privileges. An almshouse was also founded here in the reign of Henry VI. by Richard Rich, sheriff of London. There are still the remains of an ancient chapel, belonging to an hospital formerly founded here for persons afflicted with the leprosy.

HOUNSLOW.

This village is situated about twelve miles north of London, on the edge of a heath of the same name. It belongs to two parishes, the north side of the street to Heston, and the south to Isleworth.

In this place was anciently a convent of mendicant friars, who by their institution were to beg alms for the ransom of captives taken by the infidels. On its dissolution by king Henry VIII. that prince gave it to the lord Windsor, who afterwards sold it to Mr. Auditor Roan.

Here are a chapel and a charity school; and though this town has not any weekly market, yet it has two annual fairs, viz. Trinity Monday, and the Monday after Michaelmas-day, for horses, black cattle and sheep.

KINGSTON.

This town is situated on the banks of the Thames about twelve miles from London, in the county of Surry. It received its name from having been the residence of several of our Saxon kings, some of whom were crowned on a stage erected in the market place. The town is large and populous, and in the reigns of Edward II. and III. sent members to parliament.

The church is spacious, and decorated with the pictures of the Saxon kings who were crowned here; together with that of king John, who gave the inhabitants their first charter.

Here is also a wooden bridge of twenty arches over the Thames; a free school erected and endowed by queen Elizabeth; and a charity school for thirty boys who are all clothed.

The summer assizes for the county of Surry are generally held here; and on the top of the hall is a gallery, which overlooks the town.

A house near this town, now called Hircomb's place, was once the seat of the famous earl of Warwick, stiled the setter up and the puller down of kings. Besides the bridge already mentioned, here is another of brick over a stream that flows from a spring about four miles above the town, and which, within the distance of a bow shot from its source, forms a brook sufficient to drive two mills. The market in this town is very considerable for corn, and the trade to London, &c. pretty large.

Here is a market, on Saturday, and three annual fairs, viz. Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, in Whitsun-week, for horses and toys; the second, third, and fourth of August, for fruit and pedlars ware; and the fifteenth of November, for horses, cattle and toys.

LEATHERHEAD.

This town is pleasantly situated on a rising bank about four miles to the south west of Epsom, in the county of Surry. It had formerly a market, but that has been discontinued upwards of an hundred years.

Here is a bridge over the river Mole, which having sunk into the earth near Mickelham, at the foot of Box-hill, rises again near this town, and runs through Cobham to the Thames at Moulsey.

At a small distance from this town is Leith-hill, admired for affording one of the noblest prospects in all Europe; of which Mr. Dennis, in his "letters familiar, moral and critical," gives the following lively description: "In a late journey (says he) which I took into the Wild of Sussex, I passed over an hill, which shewed me a more transporting sight than ever the country had shewn me before, either in England or Italy. The prospects which in Italy pleased me most, were “ were that of the Valdarno from the Apennines;

 “ of Rome and the Mediterranean from the moun“ tains of Viterbo; of Rome at forty, and the “ Mediterranean at fifty miles distance from it;
 “ and that of the Campagne of Rome from Ti“ voli and Fiescati; from which two places you “ see every foot of that famous Campagne even “ from the bottom of Tivoli and Fiescati to the “ very foot of the mountain of Viterbo, without “ any thing to intercept your sight. But from “ an hill which I passed in my late journey “ into Suffex, I had a prospect more extensive “ than any of these, and which surpassed them
 “ at once in rural charms, in pomp, and in mag“ nificence. The hill which I speak of, is called “ Leith-hill, and is about five miles southward “ from Darking, about six from Box-hill, and “ near twelve from Epsom. It juts itself out “ about two miles beyond that range of hills
 “ which terminate the north downs to the south.
 “ When I saw from one of these hills, at about “ two miles distance, that side of Leith-hill “ which faces the northern downs, it appeared “ the beautifullest prospect I had ever seen: but “ after we had conquered the hill itself, I saw “ a sight that would transport a stoic; a sight
 “ that looked like enchantment and vision.
 “ Beneath us lay open to our view all the wilds “ of Surry and Suffex, and a great part of that “ of Kent, admirably diversified in every part of “ them with woods, and fields of corn and pas“ tures, every where adorned with stately rows of “ trees.

“ This beautiful vale is about thirty miles in “ breadth, and about sixty in length, and is ter“ minated to the south by the majestic range of “ the southern hills, and the sea: and it is no “ easy matter to decide, whether these hills, which “ appear at thirty, forty, fifty miles distance,
 “ with their tops in the sky, seem more awful
 “ and venerable, or the delicious vale between “ you and them more inviting. About noon, in “ a serene day, you may at thirty miles distance, “ see the very water of the sea through a chasm
 “ of the mountains. And that which above all “ makes it a noble and a wonderful prospect, is,
 “ that at the same time that, at thirty miles “ distance you behold the very water of the sea;
 “ at the same time that you behold to the south,
 “ the most delicious rural prospect in the world;
 “ at that very time, by a little turn of your head
 “ towards the north, you look full over Box-hill,
 “ and see the country beyond it, between that “ and London; and, over the very stomacher of “ it, see St. Paul's at twenty-five miles distance, “ and London beneath it, and Highgate and “ Hampstead beyond it.”

Not far from this is Box-hill, so called from a great number of box trees planted on the south side of it by the earl of Arundel, in the reign of king Charles I. but the north side is covered with yew. On the summit is a large warren, from whence there is a most delightful prospect.

M I M S.

There are two villages of this name, viz. North

Mims and South Mims. The former is situated in Hertfordshire, on the east side of Colney; about two miles from Hatfield. In this neighbourhood is the seat of the late Sir Joseph Jekyll, master of the rolls, in right of his lady, who was heir to her brother the great lord Somers. The body of that nobleman lies interred in the chancel of the church, without any inscription. This seat now belongs to the duke of Leeds who is lord of the manor.

South Mims is situated two miles from the former, in the most northern corner of Middlesex. Here is an almshouse built and endowed for six poor people, by James Hickson, esq; who died in 1689, when he gave by his will to fifteen poor people of this parish, two shifts, one pair of hose, and a pair of shoes annually. For the payment of these, and other benefactions, he left several estates in this parish to the Brewers company in London.

M O U L S E Y.

There are two towns of this name, viz. East Moulsey and West Moulsey, both of which are thus denominated from the river Mole, which runs between them into the Thames.

East Moulsey is situated opposite to Hampton-court, and was granted by king Charles II. to Sir James Clarke, grandfather to the present lord of the manor, who had the ferry from thence to Hampton-court, in the room of which he erected a handsome bridge, where a very high toll is taken of all passengers, carriages, &c.

West Moulsey is situated about a mile and a half west from Kingston; and there is here a ferry to Hampton town, which likewise belongs to the same gentleman.

M U S W E L L H I L L.

This place which is situated in Middlesex, received its name from a spring or well on the hill, near a house built by alderman Roe, which afterwards came to the earl of Bath. Adjoining to this well, which was esteemed holy, was a chapel with an image of our lady of Muswell, to which great numbers went in pilgrimage. In the reign of queen Elizabeth both the manor and chapel were sold to Mr. William Roe, in whose family they continued, till Sir Thomas Roe, the ambassador, sold them in the last century. Some few years ago the manor-house was converted into a place of public entertainment.

N O R T H A L L.

This village is situated on the north side of Enfield Chase, three miles from Barnet, and is said to be corruptly so called from Northaw, or the North Grove, here being a wood that belonged to the monastery of St. Albans.

A noble house was built here in the reign of queen Elizabeth by Henry Dudley earl of Warwick; after whose death it came to several possessors, and being sold to William Laman, it descended to his grandson, who gave the rent of the wells to the poor of the parish. King James I. also also gave 40l. per annum to the town in lieu of the ground he had taken out of the common to lay into his park at Theobalds.

P E T E R S H A M.

This village is situated a little to the south of Richmond-hill, near the New Park, in Surry. Here once stood a delightful seat built by the earl of Rochester, lord high treasurer in the reign of king James II. The building, which was extremely beautiful, was destroyed by fire in the year 1720, in so sudden a manner, that the family who were then all at home, had scarcely time to save their lives. Nor was the house, though furnished in the most exquisite manner, both within and without, the greatest loss sustained: the noble furniture, the curious collection of paintings, and the inestimable library of the first earl of Clarendon, lord high chancellor of England, were entirely consumed; and, among other valuable pieces, several manuscripts relating to those times, and to the transactions in which the king his master, and himself, was engaged both at home and abroad; besides other curious collections made by that noble writer in various parts of the world.

After the demolition of this noble structure the earl of Harrington erected another seat on the site thereof after a design of the earl of Burlington.

The front next the court is very plain, and the entrance to the house not very elegant; but the south front next the garden is bold and regular, and the apartments on that side, chiefly designed for state, are extremely handsome. The gardens which were before crowded with plantations, are now laid open in lawns of grass. The kitchen garden, before situated on the east side of the house, is removed out of sight, and the ground converted to an open slope of grass, leading up to a terrace of great length, from which is a prospect of the river Thames, the town of Twickenham, and of all the fine seats in that part of the country. On the other side of the terrace is a plantation on a rising ground; and on the summit of the hill a fine pleasure house, which on every side commands a prospect of the country for a very considerable distance.

Near this village is the New Park, which is esteemed one of the best and most extensive in England. It was made in the reign of king Charles I. and inclosed with a brick wall said to be eleven miles in compass. In this part there is a little hill cast up, called king Henry's mount, from which is a prospect of six counties, with a distant view of the city of London, and of Windsor castle.

The new lodge in this park, built by the late Sir Robert Walpole, earl of Orford, is a very elegant edifice. It is built of stone in a square form, with wings on each side of brick. It stands on a rising ground, and commands a very good prospect of the park, especially of that fine piece of water which is in it, and which might be enlarged and brought across the vista that is in the front of the house through a wood.

This park is the largest of any within the environs of London, except that of Windsor, and by far the finest; for though it has little more than a wild variety of natural beauties to shew, yet these are such as cannot fail to please those who are as much delighted with views in their rudest appearance, as in all the elegance of art and design.

R E Y G A T E.

This is a large market town in Surry, situated in the valley of Holmsdale, and surrounded on each side with hills. It is an ancient borough, and had a castle, built by the Saxons, on the east side of the town, some ruins of which are still to be seen, particularly a long vault with a room at the end, large enough to hold five hundred persons, where the barons who took up arms against king John are said to have had their private meetings. The market-house was once a chapel dedicated to Thomas Becker.

There is a large house on the south side of the town, which was formerly a priory. It belongs to the late Mr. Parsons's family, and is beautified with plantations, and a large piece of water. It has two rooms, each fifty feet long, and of a proportionable breadth; but the ceilings are much too low. The house and gardens are on every side surrounded with hills, so as to render the prospect extremely delightful.

The late celebrated lord Shaftsbury had a house in this town, to which he retired to exclude himself from company. It is now in the possession of a private gentleman, who has laid out and planted a small spot of ground, in so many parts, as to comprise whatever can be supposed in the most noble seats. It may properly be called a model, and is stiled by the inhabitants of Reygate, "The world in one acre."

R I C K M A N S W O R T H.

This town is thus denominated from its situation on a neck of land, almost surrounded by a nameless river, which falls into the Colne, and forms, at its influx, a considerable pool of water. It stands low, in a black, moorish, cold soil, about twenty miles from London, in the county of Hertford.

This town is governed by two constables, and two headboroughs. It has a handsome church, and a charity school for twenty boys and ten girls; also two almshouses, one for five widows and the other for four. There are several mills on the neighbouring streams, where great quantities of wheat are ground.

Here is a weekly market on Saturday, and three annual fairs, viz. the twentieth of July, and the fourth of November, for horses, black cattle, sheep and hogs; and the Saturday before the third Monday in September, for hiring of servants.

In the neighbourhood of this town there is a warren hill which has an echo that repeats twelve times to a trumpet.

RUMFORD

RUMFORD.

This is a considerable market town, situated about twelve miles from London, in the county of Essex. It is a great thoroughfare between this city and Harwich, and most towns of note in Suffolk and Norfolk. It is governed by a bailiff and wardens, who, though not incorporated, are empowered by patent to hold a court every week, for the trial of civil and criminal causes.

Here is a charity school for fifty boys and twenty girls; and a church, but it is only a chancel to Horn church, a neighbouring village. Here is a weekly market on Wednesday, and an annual fair for horses, black cattle and sheep.

The lands of Horn church near Rumford, with some other revenues in the neighbourhood, being given to the great hospital de Monte Jovis, in Savoy, a cell for a prior or master, and poor brethren, subordinate to that foreign house, was settled here, and dedicated to St. Nicholas and St. Barnard. This house was, in the time of Richard II. by leave of the pope and king, bought by William of Wickham, bishop of Winchester, for his new college at Oxford.

SEVENOAK.

This town is said to have received its name from seven very large oaks, which grew near it when it was first built. It is a market town situated near the river Dart or Darent, in the road to Tunbridge, and is a corporation, governed by a warden and assistants.

Here is an hospital for maintaining poor old people, and a school for educating poor children, built and endowed by Sir William Sevenoak, who was Lord-mayor of London in 1418; and said to have been a foundling, brought up by some person of this town, whence he took his name. John Potkyn, who lived in the reign of Henry VIII. was a great benefactor to this school, and the revenue being augmented by queen Elizabeth, it was thence called queen Elizabeth's free-school. It was rebuilt in 1727; and the stile of the corporation is the wardens and assistants of the town and parish of Sevenoak, and of queen Elizabeth's free-school there.

Besides the above hospital, there is another still more ancient, dedicated to St. John the Baptist, in the gift of the archbishop of Canterbury. Also a charity school for fifteen boys.

It was in this parish that the rebel, Jack Cade, in the year 1450, defeated and killed Sir Humphrey Stafford, his brother William, and several other persons of note, sent against him by Henry VI.

There are several very handsome seats in this neighbourhood, particularly one called Knowl Place, the seat of the duke of Dorset, situated in the middle of a most delightful park.

STAINES.

This is a very populous town, situated on the Thames, about nineteen miles from London, in the county of Middlesex. It received its name from the Saxon word Stana or Stone, because there anciently stood a bounding stone in this place, to denote the extent of the city of London's jurisdiction upon the river.

It has a bridge over the Thames, and is governed by two constables, and four headboroughs appointed by his majesty's steward, on account of its being a lordship belonging to the crown. The church stands alone, at almost half a mile distance from the town. Here is a market on Friday, and two annual fairs, viz. the 11th of May, and the 29th of September, for horses, black cattle, and sheep.

TILBURY.

This is a very ancient town in Essex, situated near the Thames by level unhealthy marshes called the three hundreds. Here the four provincial ways made by the Romans crossed each other; and in the year 630 this was the see of a bishop named Ceadda, who converted the east Saxons. In the reigns of Edward I. Edward II. and Edward III. it was held of the crown by the family of the Tilburies, and from them probably received its name.

The principal part of the marshes which surround the town, are rented by the farmers, salef and grazing butchers of London, who generally stock them with Lincolnshire and Leicestershire weathers, which they buy in Smithfield in September and October, when the graziers sell off their stocks, and feed here till Christmas or Candlemas; and though they are not made much fatter here than when bought in, yet very considerable advantage accrues by the difference of the price of mutton between Michaelmas, when cheapest, and Candlemas, when dearest; and this is what the butchers call, by way of excellence, right marsh mutton.

Adjoining to the river Thames, and at the end of the marshes, stands TILBURY FORT, which may be justly looked upon as the key of the city of London. It is a regular fortification. The design of it was a pentagon, but the water-bastion, as it would have been called, was never built.

The plan of this building was laid out by Sir Martin Beckman, chief engineer to king Charles II. who also designed the works at Sheerness. The esplanade of the fort is very large, and the bastions the largest of any in England. The foundation is laid upon piles driven down two an end of each other, so far, till they were assured they were below the channel of the river, and that the piles, which were pointed with iron, entered into the solid chalk rock, adjoining to the hills on the other side.

On the land side the works are compleat; and the bastions are faced with brick. There is a double ditch or moat, the innermost of which is one hundred and eighty feet broad, with a good counterscarpe, and a covered way marked out, with ravelins and tenailles. There are also two small redoubts of brick; but the chief strength on this side the fort consists in being able to lay the whole level under water, and by that means to make it impossible for an enemy to carry on approaches that way.

On the river side is a very strong curtain, with a noble gate called the water-gate in the middle, and the ditch is palisadoed. Before this curtain is a platform in the place of a counterscarp, on which are planted one hundred and six cannon, carrying from twenty-four to forty-six pounds each, besides smaller ones planted between them; and the bastions and curtains are also planted with guns.

At the place where the water-bastion was designed to be built, and which, by the plan, should run wholly out into the river, so as to flank the two curtains on each side, stands an high tower, which, it was said was built in queen Elizabeth's time, and was called the Blockhouse.

U X B R I D G E.

This town is situated in the high road to Oxford, about eighteen miles from London, in the county of Middlesex. Notwithstanding it is entirely independent, and is governed by two bailiffs, two constables and two headboroughs, yet it is only a hamlet to Great Hillington.

The river Colne runs through this town in two streams, well supplied with trout, eels, and other fish; and over the main stream is a stone bridge that leads into Buckinghamshire. The church, or rather chapel, was built in the reign of Henry VI.

This town has the honour of giving the title of earl to the noble family of Pager. It has many good inns, and is particularly distinguished by the whiteness of the bread, especially their rolls. There are many corn mills at a small distance, and a considerable number of waggon loads of meal are brought from thence every week to London.

W A L T O N.

This village is situated on the banks of the Thames, opposite to Shepperton, in the county of Surry. It is said that Middlesex once joined it till about three hundred years ago the old current of the Thames was changed by an inundation, and a church destroyed by the force of the water.

Here is a very curious bridge over the Thames, erected at the expence of Samuel Decker, esq; who applying to parliament for that purpose, obtained in the year 1747, an act to empower him to build a bridge there, and the same was compleated in August 1750. It consists of only four stone piers, between which are three large truss arches of beams and joists of wood, strongly bound together with mortises, iron pins, and cramps; under these three arches the water constantly runs; besides which are five other arches of brick work on each side, to render the ascent and descent the more easy. The center arch, when viewed by the river side, affords an agreeable prospect of the country, beautifully diversified with wood and water, which is seen through it to a considerable distance. The extensive compass of this great arch to a person below occasions a very uncommon sensation of awe and surprize; and he is still farther astonished when he proceeds to take notice that all the timbers are in a falling position; for there is not one upright piece to be discovered, and at the same time considers the very small dimensions of the piers by which the whole is supported.

When you have proceeded beyond the brick work, in passing over the bridge, the vacant interstices between the timbers yield at every step a variety of prospects, which, at the center, are seen at still greater advantage. But though each side is well secured by the timber and rails, to the height of eight feet, yet as it affords only a parapet of wide lattice work, and the apertures seem even to the eye large enough to admit the passage of any person to go through, yet those not accustomed to such views cannot approach the side without being sensibly alarmed. The openings indeed are purposely left to admit a free passage for the air, in order to keep the timbers the more sound, and that the least decay may be the more easily perceived and amended.

The nobility and gentry in this neighbourhood find a very agreeable benefit from this admirable bridge, especially as the ferries are dilatory, dangerous, and at times impassable; and its being erected has caused the roads thereabouts, in both counties, especially on the Surry side, to be greatly improved.

W A L T H A M A B B E Y.

This is a small market town situated on the banks of the river Lea, which is here divided into divers channels, forming several small islands, about thirteen miles from London, in the county of Essex.

In this town was a monastery founded about the year 1062, by Harold, earl of Kent, for a dean and eleven secular canons, who were by king Henry II. changed into an abbot and regulars of the order of St. Augustin, and their number increased to twenty-four. It was dedicated to the Holy Cross, and its yearly revenue, at the general dissolution amounted to nine hundred pounds four shillings and three pence.

Harold, the founder of the abbey, was killed in the great battle in Sussex, fought with William the Conqueror; and his mother having begged the body of that prince, it was interred in this abbey. In the reign of queen Elizabeth, as some workmen were digging here, they found his coffin, covered with a flat grave stone, on which was only this short inscription, HAROLD INFELIX!

This antique building is now a gentleman's seat; and the gardens belonging to it were some years ago greatly admired; but since the taste for inclosed gardens has been condemned, they have been but little frequented, except by curious persons to see the tulip tree, which grows on a grass plot near the house, and is one of the finest and most flourishing of the species in England, producing annually, in the month of July, a prodigious quantity of flowers.

Besides

Besides a weekly market on Tuesday this town has three annual fairs, viz. the fourteenth of May, and the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth of September, for horses, cows, and swine.

WALTHAM CROSS.

This is a market town situated on the west side of the river Lea, in the road to Ware, about twelve miles from London, in the county of Middlesex. It receives its distinguishing epithet from the cross built there by Edward I. in honour of his beloved queen Eleanor, whose corps rested here in its way from Lincolnshire to London. Round the pillars are placed the effigies of that princess, with the arms of her consort, and those of her own, viz. England, Castile, Leon, and Poitou, which, though greatly defaced, are still in part remaining.

WARE.

This is a considerable market town, situated in a valley on the east side of the river Lea, in Hertfordshire. It is said to have derived its name from a sort of dam, anciently made to stop the current of the stream, and called Wier, or Wear; a conjecture that seems to be confirmed; by the great abundance of water here, which has obliged the inhabitants to make weirs and sluices, to preserve the town and adjacent meadows from inundations.

This town was founded in the year 914, by order of Edward I. and began to be of some note in the reign of king John, when the high road to the north, which before went through Hertford, was, by the interest of Sayer de Quincy, then lord of the manor, turned through this town. It consists of one street, about a mile in length, with several back streets and lanes, well inhabited. The church is large, built in the form of a cross, and has a handsome gallery, erected by the governors of Christ's-hospital in London, who send many of the children of that hospital here for education. Besides a charity school here are seven almshouses well endowed.

The church, which is dedicated to St. Mary, together with all the tithes belonging to it, and two carucates of land, were given, about the year 1081, by Hugo de Grenemaisail, lord of the manor of Ware, to the monks of St. Ebrulf, at Utica, in Normandy; whereupon it became a cell to that abbey, and in course of time, was so well endowed, that when Edward III. during his wars with France, seized the alien priories, this was farmed at two hundred pounds a year. After the suppression of these foreign houses, this was given, in the third year of Henry V. to the monks of Skene. Henry VI. annexed it for some time to the abbey of St. Mary, near Leicester; but it was afterwards restored to Skene, and at the dissolution, given by Henry VIII. to Trinity college in Cambridge. In the north part of the town there was also a house of Grey, or Franciscan friars; but how long it continued, is not known.

Here is a weekly market on Tuesday, remarkable for corn and malt, five thousand quarters of the latter being frequently sent in a week to London, by the barges, which generally go with coals, grocery, &c. Besides which, there are two annual fairs, viz. the last Tuesday in April, and the Tuesday before St. Matthew's day, for horses, black cattle, and sheep.

At one of the inns in this town, there is a famous bed, formerly used by travellers from London, and other places: it is of a square form, each side twelve feet in length, and is said to contain forty persons.

Not far from Ware, in a place called Lemon Field, three Roman wine vessels were dug up in the year 1729. They were made of a pale reddish earth, and in the form of the Roman amphora, with two handles, and pointed at the bottom, for the purpose of fixing them in the ground. They were eighteen inches below the surface, and full of earth and chalk stones of the neighbouring soil. Many human bones have been dug up hereabouts; but though the ground around them was black, it did not appear that the bodies had been burnt; they seemed, by the shallowness of their burial, to have been the relics of a battle.

WATFORD.

This town is situated on the spot where was formerly a ford over the river Colne, seventeen miles from London, in Hertfordshire; and the pretorian or consular highway, made by the Romans in this county, called Watling-street, crosses the Colne near it, and passes on to Verulam, near St. Albans.

It consists of one long street, which is extremely dirty in the winter, and the waters of the river, at the entrance of the town, are often so much swelled by floods, as to be impassable. Here is a charity school for forty boys, who are both taught and clothed; and a handsome free-school, built in 1709, by Mrs. Elizabeth Fuller. Likewise several almshouses, and other funds for the poor.

Besides a weekly market on Tuesday, here are also two annual fairs, viz. Trinity Monday and Tuesday, for horses, black cattle, and sheep.

WEYBRIDGE.

This is a very pleasant village situated in Surry, about four miles from Hampton-Court, and owes its name to a bridge formerly erected here over the river Wey.

In the neighbourhood of this village are several fine seats, particularly those of the earls of Portmore and Lincoln. The latter is called OATLANDS, and is a very handsome building situate in the middle of a fine park. The other is known by the name of HAM FARM, is a very magnificent structure, regularly built of brick, with a fine lawn before the garden front. The grounds with which it is encircled consist of about five hundred acres, one hundred and thirty of which are laid out for pleasure, besides a paddock of about sixty acres.

This

This delightful seat has the command of two navigable rivers; the Thames, which comes with a fine bending course by the side of the terrace, and the Weye, which runs directly through the grounds, and joins the Thames at the terrace. Over the Weye is a swing bridge, which may be turned aside at pleasure, to let boats and other vessels pass. The Weye is navigable to Guildford, and is now extended from thence to Godalmin. What is called the Virginia water runs from Windsor great park, and flows a little higher up through the grounds of the late Mr. Southcote. The terrace next the Thames is remarkably beautiful; and though it lies on a flat, there are some good views from it, as well as from some other parts of the garden.

WINDSOR.

This a pleasant and well-inhabited town situate on the banks of the Thames, amidst the most beautiful vallies, in the county of Berks. It is governed by a mayor and thirty brethren, thirteen of whom are stiled benchers, and ten of these brethren have the title of aldermen, out of whom the mayor is chosen annually.

The church is a spacious antient structure, seated on the east side of the High-street, and dedicated to St. John the Baptist. In the same street is likewise the town-house, or Guildhall, a neat regular edifice built in the year 1686, and adorned with columns and arches of Portland stone.

The hall, or the room in which the mayor and corporation meet for the dispatch of the business of the borough, is spacious, and well adapted to the purpose; and is adorned with the portraits of Charles I. Charles II. James II. William III. and queen Mary, queen Anne, George, prince of Denmark, archbishop Laud, Theodore Rande, esq; the earl of Nottingham, lord admiral in the year 1688, governor of Windsor Castle, and high steward of the borough, &c. The hall is at present under great improvements, at the expence of the nobility and gentry of the place, who make use of it during the summer for subscription assemblies; and in the winter, for a weekly card assembly. In 1707, the corporation, from their regard to queen Anne, who constantly resided at Windsor, during the summer season, erected in a niche, at the north end of this structure, the statue of that princess, vested in her royal robes, with the globe and sceptre in her hands. And in a niche on the south side is the statue of her majesty's royal consort, prince George of Denmark, in a Roman military habit. In the area, under the hall, is kept a weekly market on Saturdays, which is plentifully supplied with all kinds of provisions.

From the delightful situation of this town, many gentlemen of fortune and family constantly reside there, and in its neighbourhood; but its greatest boast is in its royal castle, which, for upwards of seven hundred years, has been the residence of the kings of England, and the seat of the most noble order of the garter.

It is situated upon a high hill, which rises by a gentle ascent, and enjoys a most delightful profpect around it; in the front is a wide and extensive vale, adorned with corn fields and meadows, with groves on either side, and the calm smooth water of the Thames running through it. On the declivity of the hill is a fine terrace faced with a rampart of free stone, 1870 feet in length. This may justly be said to be one of the noblest walks in Europe, both with respect to the strength and grandeur of the building, and the fine and extensive prospect over the Thames, of the adjacent country on every side, where, from the variety of villas scattered about, nature and art seem to vie with each other.

From this terrace you enter a beautiful park, which surrounds the building, and is called the little or house park, to distinguish it from another adjoining, which is of a much greater extent. This little park is four miles in circumference, and surrounded by a brick wall. The turf is of a most beautiful green, and it is adorned with many shady walks, especially that called queen Elizabeth's, which, on the summer evenings, is frequented by the best company. It is well stocked with deer and other game, and the keepers lodge at the farther end is a delightful situation.

This beautiful palace was first built by William the Conqueror soon after his being established on the throne of this kingdom. It was afterwards greatly improved by king Henry I. who added many new buildings, and surrounded the whole with a strong wall: and the succeeding princes, on account of its pleasant situation, and its being a strong fortress and place of defence, made it their constant residence.

In this castle Henry II. held a parliament in the year 1170; and here king John lodged during the contest between him and the barons. However, in disputes between his son and successor, king Henry III. and his barons, this castle was in 1263 delivered up by treaty. King Edward I. and II. resided here, more on account of its delightful situation, than its strength; and had many children born here; among whom was the heroic Edward III. who had an extraordinary affection for this his native place, and in the year 1360, caused the whole castle to be entirely taken down, except the three towers at the west end of the lower ward; and rebuilding the present stately castle, made it the seat of the most noble order of the garter.

The better to effect this work, several persons were appointed to provide stone, lead, timber, iron, &c. and to impress carriages to convey them to Windsor. They were also to press hewers of stone, carpenters, and other artificers; to survey the works and men; to encourage those that did their duty; and to compel the idle and slothful. The whole had been carried on several years, when, in the thirty-third year of his reign, the office of surveyor of this castle was conferred on William of Wickham, afterwards bishop of Winchester, with power to dispose of all the workmen, to purchase materials, and to provide masons, and other artificers; who when he had finished this great work, caused to be cut on one of the towers this doubtful sentence;

This made Wickham.

Which

Which was represented to the king, as if that bishop had the presumption to assume the honour of erecting this royal castle; but the prelate defeated the design of his enemies; by assuring his royal master, that he had not the least intention to injure the honour of his sovereign, but that this was only an acknowledgement, that the building had made him great in the favour of his prince, and was the cause of his advancement: an interpretation which satisfied that king, and prevented his falling under his displeasure.

Other considerable additions were made to this noble palace in succeeding times. King Henry VII. added the stately fabric adjoining to the king's lodgings in the upper ward. Henry VIII. rebuilt the great gate in the lower ward leading to the town, king Edward IV. began, and queen Mary perfected, the bringing of water from Black-Moor-Park, in the parish of Wingfield, into a fountain of curious workmanship, in the middle of the upper court. Queen Elizabeth made the terrace walk on the north side of the castle; and king Charles I. built the gate at the east end of the terrace leading into the park. King Charles II. entirely repaired it; the face of of the upper-court was changed, and brought into its present beauty; the windows were enlarged and made regular; and the royal apartments were completely furnished, and adorned with beautiful paintings. And lastly, queen Anne made several additions to it, particularly the flight of steps on the east side.

This stately and venerable castle is divided into two courts or wards, with a large round tower between them called the middle ward, it being formerly separated from the lower ward by a strong wall and draw-bridge. The whole contains about twelve acres of land, and has many towers and batteries for its defence.

In the upper ward is a spacious square, bounded on the west side of the round tower; on the north by the royal apartments, St. George's hall, and the chapel royal; and on the east and south sides by the apartments of the prince of Wales, the royal family, and the great officers of state. In the center of this square is an equestrian statue in copper of king Charles II. in a roman habit, and placed on a marble pedestal, on the south side of which are represented in basso relievo, a variety of figures expressive of navigation. On the east side is the royal cypher, surrounded with the garter, and crowned with other ornaments. On the north side are variety of fruits; and on the west is a shield, in which is a latin inscription to this effect. "Tobias Rustat humbly gave and dedicated this effigy to his most gracious master Charles II. the best of kings, in the year of our Lord MDCLXXX."

The round tower, which forms the west side of this upper court, contains the governor's apartments. It is built in the form of an amphitheatre, on the highest part of the mount. The ascent to the lodgings was formerly by the flight of an hundred steps of oak, so contrived, that a person on horseback might ascend or descend with pleasure; but the present entrance is by a flight of an hundred and forty-seven steps of purplebeck stone. Here you pass through a handsome court, in the middle of which is a reservoir of water, erected in the reign of Charles II. to receive the drains from the upper leads and out of-fices.

From this court you proceed to the guard-chamber, in which is a neat and well disposed collection of arms, as matchlocks, the first ever made; whole, half, and quarter pikes, with bandoleers of various figures. Round the cornice are a number of breast-plates, with helmets over them, and several drums in proper order.

Over the chimney is carved in lime wood, an oval of the star and garter, crowned and encompassed with daggers and pistols. The pillars of the door leading to the dining room are composed of pikes, on the top of which are two coats of mail, probably those of John king of France, and David king of Scotland, who were prisoners here, they being both inlaid with gold, the former with Fleur-de-lisses, and the latter with thistles: there are besides the horse armour, gauntlets and other accoutrements belonging to these coats of mail. On the stair-case, leading to the dining-room, stands the figure of a yeoman of the guard, painted in his proper dress, as if in waiting. Here are four pillars of pikes ornamented with bandoleers, carbines, and matchlocks. In the centre is a beautiful engraved horse shield, encompassed with daggers and pistols; as also several of king James's and king William's pieces, ranged in beautiful order.

The great dining room is very neatly furnished, and the tapestry, which is disposed in six compartments, represents the well known story of Hero and Leander.

The dressing room is adorned with many curious prints and drawings, particularly.

Four views of his grace the duke of Mountagu, the present governor's seat at Blackheath.

A siege of the Romans, drawn with the pen.

The earl of Pembroke's family.

Rembrandt's mother.

Lady Dorothy Boyle.

Cleopatra.

A Turk by candle light.

The bedchamber is very neatly furnished; and in it are six elbow chairs, curiously studded with ivory. The bed is of chimts complete, and the tapestry is richly wrought with gold and silver.

The other rooms in this part not having any thing very curious, we shall pass them over.

The curtain contains seventeen partholes, in each of which is placed a piece of cannon, and on the leads of the tower is placed the royal standard, which is fourteen yards long, and eight broad; and is hoisted on all state holidays. The union, which is nine yards by six, is always hoisted when the governor is present. Against the wall is this inscription:

"A list of the counties to be seen on the top
"of this round tower. Middlesex, Essex,
"Hertford, Bucks, Berks, Oxford, Wilts,
"Hants, Surry, Sussex, Kent, Bedford."

The lower court is larger than the upper, and divided into two parts by St. George's chapel, which stands in the middle. On the north or inner side are the houses and apartments of the dean and canons, minor canons, clerks, and other officers; and on the south and west sides of the outer part, are the houses of the poor knights of Windfor.

The apartment belonging to the dean is large and commodious; and in the great hall are hung up the arms of the sovereign and knight's companions of the garter. In an apartment called the garter-room, the knights meet and robe on the morning of installation, and proceed from thence to chapel. In this room is an ancient screen, on which are properly blazoned the arms of king Edward III. and the several sovereigns and knights companions from the foundation, to the present time.

The inner cloisters contain the houses of several prebends; and at the lower end is the library belonging to the college, the inside of which is neat, though not elegant. It is well furnished with ecclesiastical writers, and books of polite literature, and some time ago received a considerable addition from the late earl of Ranelagh, who bequeathed his valuable library to the college.

The houses of the minor canons, which adjoin to these, are built in the form of a horse-shoe, in allusion to one of the badges of Henry VII. or his predecessor king Edward IV. and are commonly called the Horse-shoe Cloysters.

There are also in this court several towers belonging to the officers of the crown, and the order of the garter, namely to the bishop of Winchester, prelate; the bishop of Salisbury, Chancellor, and Garter, king at arms. Here is also the stone tower, guard-chamber, and a court of record, held under the governor or constable.

The houses of the poor knights consist of thirteen on the south side, called the royal foundation: the other five are on the west end of the court; and are called, Sir Peter la Mair's Foundation; those who belong to it, have a salary or stipend to enable them to repair their houses themselves, which those of the foundation have not. The charitable intention of king Edward III. the royal founder, was to provide only for such as were weak in body, and in low circumstances, having not enough to live in so genteel a manner as became a military profession. Hence queen Elizabeth's statutes observe, that in case there should happen to fall to any of the alms knights, lands, rents, &c. to the yearly rent of twenty pounds, then such knight should be immediately removed from the college, and another alms knight put in his room. But of late years little regard has been paid to these regulations. These eighteen poor knights have a pension of eighteen pounds a year, and annually a gown or furcoat of scarlet cloth, and a mantle of blue or purple cloth, on the left sleeve of which is embroidered the cross of St. George in a plain escutcheon.

The chapel of St. George, as mentioned before, is situated in the middle of the lower court. It is a fine piece of Gothic architecture, and was first erected by king Edward III. in the year 1337, soon after the foundation of the college, for the order of the garter, and dedicated to St. George, the patron of England; but however noble the first design might be, king Edward IV. not finding it entirely completed, enlarged the structure, and designed the present building, together with the houses of the dean and canons, situated on the sides of the north and west sides of the chapel: the work was afterwards carried on by Henry VII. who finished the body of the chapel; and Sir Reginald Bray, knight of the garter, and the favourite of that king, assisted in ornamenting the chapel and completing the roof.

The architecture of the inside has always been esteemed for its neatness and great beauty; and in particular, the stone roof is reckoned an excellent piece of workmanship. It is an ellipsis supported by Gothic pillars, whose ribs and groins sustain the whole ceiling, every part of which has some different device well finished, as the arms of Edward the Confessor, Edward III. Henry VI. Edward IV. Henry VII. and Henry VIII. also the arms of England and France quarterly, the cross of St. George, the rose, portcullis, lion rampant, unicorn, &c.

In a chapel in the south isle is represented in ancient painting, the history of John the Baptist; and in the same isle are painted on large pannels of oak, neatly carved, and decorated with the several devices peculiar to each prince, the portraits at full length, of prince Edward, son to Henry VI. Edward IV. Edward V. and Henry VII.

In the north isle is a chapel dedicated to St. Stephen, wherein the history of that saint is painted on the pannels, and well preserved. In the first of these pannels St. Stephen is represented preaching to the people; in the second, he is before Herod's tribunal; in the third, he is stoning; and in the fourth, he is represented dead. At the east end of this isle is the chapter-house of the college, in which is a portrait at full length, by a masterly hand, of the victorious Edward III. in his robes of state, holding in his right hand a sword, and bearing the crowns of France and Scotland, in token of the many victories he gained over these nations.

On each side of the choir are the stalls of the sovereign and knights companions of the most noble order of the garter, with the helmet, mantling, crest, and sword, of each knight set up over his stall on a canopy of ancient carving curiously wrought; and over the canopy is affixed the banner or arms of each knight properly blazon'd on silk; and on the back of the stalls are the titles of the knights, with their arms neatly engraved and blazoned on copper. The sovereign's stall is on the right hand of the entrance into the choir, and is covered with purple velvet and cloth of gold, and has a canopy and complete furniture of the same valuable materials; his banner is likewise of velvet, and his mantling of cloth of gold. The prince's stall is on the left, and has no distinction from those of the rest of the knight's companions, the whole society, according to the statutes of the institution, being companions and colleagues equal in honour and power.

The

The altar-piece was, soon after the restoration, adorned with cloth of gold and purple damask by king Charles II. but on removing the wainscot of one of the chapels in 1707, a fine painting of the Lord's Supper was found, which being approved of by Sir James Thornhill, Verrio, and other eminent masters, it was repaired and placed on the altar-piece.

Near the altar is the Queen's gallery, for the accommodation of the ladies at an installation.

In a vault under the marble pavement of this choir, are interred the bodies of Henry VIII. and Jane Seymour his queen, king Charles I. and a daughter of queen Anne. In the south isle, near the door of the choir, is buried Henry VI. and the arch near which he was interred was sumptuously decorated by Henry VIII. with the royal ensigns and other devices, but they are now much defaced by time.

In this chapel is also a monument of Edward, earl of Lincoln, lord high admiral of England in the reign of queen Elizabeth, erected by his lady, who is also interred with him. The monument is of alabaster, with pillars of porphyry.

Another, with a neat screen of brass work, is erected to the memory of Charles Somerset, earl of Worcester, and knight of the garter, who died in 1526, and his lady, daughter to William earl of Huntingdon.

A stately monument of white marble erected to the memory of Henry Somerset, duke of Beaufort, and knight of the garter, who died in 1699. There are here also the tombs of Sir George Manners, lord Roos; that of the lord Hastings, chamberlain to Edward IV. and several others.

This chapel was made use of by king James II. for the service of popery; and mass being publickly performed there, it has ever since been neglected, and suffered to go to ruin.

Having thus described the outer parts of this antique building, we shall now proceed to the royal apartments, which, as has been already observed, are situate on the north side of the upper court, and are called the Star Buildings, from their having the star and garter in gold on the outside next the terrace.

The entrance into these apartments is through a handsome vestibule, supported by columns of Ionic order, with some antique busts in several niches; and in a niche, at the foot of the stair-case, is a Roman slave picking a thorn out of his foot.

The stair-case consists of three flights of stone steps, containing twelve in each flight, secured on the right-hand with twisted iron balustrades. Here, within a dome, is represented the story of Phæton petitioning Apollo to permit him to drive the chariot of the sun. In the ceiling, under the dome, are the representations of the four elements, one in each corner.

Fire is represented by a woman sitting on a pile, with a flaming censor in her hand, and by her is a phoenix and a salamander.

Earth is crowned with a chaplet of corn, and holds in one hand a wheat-sheaf, and in the other a cornucopia; by her are two little boys, with plumbs and cherries; and at her feet are strewed melons, peaches, and other fruit, with cabbages, carrots, &c.

Air is represented by a woman, with her left hand on a peacock's back, whose tail is extended; a parakeet is by the peacock in a flying posture, and on her right hand is perched a King's Fisher; little zephyrs are playing over her head, with a variety of birds.

Water is represented by a Neriad holding a fish in her lap, with a dolphin, cod, eels, and other fish under her feet, and around her are little cupids, with their wings dropping wet, having each a little fish to play with.

In the different parts of the ceiling are the winds supporting the clouds; and in the front is Aurora with her nymphs in waiting, giving water to her horses. On the cornice are two signs of the Zodiac supporting a golden urn of flowers. On the right hand of the above figure is Aries, or the ram, with one of the winds; and on the left Libra, or the Balance, with a blue band of stars round his body, and scales in his hand.

Beneath the cornice are twelve azure columns, painted, of the Corinthian order; and on each hand, in large compartments, are the transformation of Phæton's sisters into Poplar trees, with this inscription, MAGNIS TAMEN EXCIDIT AUSIS; also the transformation of Cynus into a swan. Between each pillar is a niche, in which is represented Geography, Comedy, Tragedy, Epic Poetry, Sculpture, Painting, Music, and the Mathematics; all which are painted in umber, and heightened with gold; so that they appear to the eye like brass statues.

Over the door is a bust of Venus in black marble; and on the front side of the stair-case, is an oval which gives a view to the back stair-case, which is adorned with the story of Meleager killing the wild boar of Ætolia, and giving the head to his mistress Atalanta.

The painting of the whole stair-case was designed and executed by Sir James Thornhill, in the reigns of queen Anne and king George I.

Having ascended the stair-case the first room you enter is

The Queen's Guard-chamber.

This room is completely furnished with guns, pistols, bayonets, pikes, swords, &c. beautifully ranged and disposed into various forms, as the star and garter, the royal cypher, a draskello, and other ornaments.

The ceiling is adorned with Britannia in the person of queen Catharine of Portugal, consort of Charles II. seated on a globe, bearing the arms of England and Portugal, the four quarters of the earth presenting her their respective offerings.

Europe, as a lady richly dressed, sits between two cornucopias, the one full of corn, and the other of grapes, holding a temple in her right hand, and with her left pointing to scepters and crowns placed among trophies of arms, with a horse and a book, on which is perched an owl; by her lies several musical instruments, and a painters pallet, with pencils.

Asia

Asia is represented as a lady in a rich embroidered dress, wearing on her head a garland of fruit and flowers: several branches of pepper, cassia and olives, are in her right hand, and in her left a smoking censor; and on one side of her is a camel kneeling.

Africa is represented as a negro woman, with her hair frizled; she is almost naked, and has an elephant's head for a crest, with a necklace of coral, and pendants of the same; on one side of her is a lion, and on the other a viper and a large serpent.

America is represented by a woman of a tawny aspect, who is almost naked: she has a veil folded over her shoulders, and an artificial band of feathers round her body; in her hand she holds a bow, and by her is a quiver, with a human head pierced through with an arrow; and on the ground is a lizard.

In different parts of the ceiling are Mars, Minerva, Venus, and other heathen deities; and on the outer part are the signs of the zodiac.

On the coving over the door is Minerva, on the east side Achilles, on the south Juno, with a peacock, and on the west, Venus with her doves.

Over the chimney is George prince of Denmark on horseback, by Dahl, and a view of shipping by Vandevelde.

The Queen's Presence-chamber.

The tapestry of this room represents the history of the beheading of St. Paul, and the persecution of the primitive christians. The ceiling is adorned with the figure of queen Catharine, attended by Religion, Prudence, Fortitude, and other virtues; she is under a curtain spread by Time, and supported by Zephyrs, with Fame founding the happiness of Britain. Below, Justice is driving away Sedition, Envy, and other evil geni.

The paintings in this room are,

Judith and Holofernes, by Guido Reni.
A Magdalen, by Sir Peter Lely.
A Prometheus, by young Palma.

The Queen's Audience-chamber.

The ceiling of this room is adorned with the representation of Britannia in the person of queen Catharine, seated in a triumphal carr, drawn by swans, to the temple of Virtue, attended by Ceres, Pomona, Flora, &c. with other decorations heightened with gold. The canopy is of fine English velvet, set up by queen Anne; and the tapestry was made at Coblenz in Germany, and presented to king Henry VIII. The pictures in this room are,

Judith and Holofernes, by Guido Reni.
St. Stephen stoned, by Rotterman.
A Magdalen expiring by moon-light, by Caracci.

On the ceiling of this room king Charles II. is represented giving freedom to Europe by the figures of Perseus and Andromeda. On the shield of Perseus is inscribed Perseus Britannicus, and over the head of Andromeda is wrote Europa Liberata, and Mars, attended by the celestial deities, offers the olive branch.

On the coving of this room is the story of Perseus and Andromeda, the four seasons, and the signs of the Zodiac, the whole heightened with gold. The tapestry, which was made at Brussels, and set up by king Charles II. represents the seasons of the year; and the room is adorned with the following pictures:

The Roman Charity, after Tintoret.
Duns Scotus, by Spagnoletto.
A Madona, by Titian.
Fame, by Palmegiani
The arts and Sciences, by the same.
Pan and Syrinx, by Stanick.

The Queen's Drawing Room.

The tapestry of this room represents the twelve months of the year; and the ceiling is painted with the assembly of the gods and goddesses, the whole intermixed with cupids, flowers, &c. and heightened with gold. The pictures are,

Lot and his two daughters, after Angelo.
Lady Digby, the wife of Sir Kenelm Digby, by Vandyke.
A Spanish family, copied from Titian.
A Dutch family, in the character of Mark Anthony and Cleopatra, by De Bray.
A sleeping Venus, by Poussin.
A flower piece, by Verelst.

The Queen's Bed-chamber.

The bed of state is rich flowered velvet made in Spital-fields, by order of queen Anne; and the tapestry, which represents the harvest season, was also made at London, by Poyntz. The ceiling is painted with the story of Diana and Endymion; and the room is adorned with the following pictures:

Judith and Holofernes, by Guido.
Herod's cruelty, by Giulio Romans.
The Holy Family, by Raphael.

The Room of Beauties.

This room is thus called from its containing a collection of portraits of the most celebrated beauties in the reign of king Charles II. They are fourteen in number, and are as follow.

The lady Ossory—The dutchess of Somerset—The dutchess of Cleveland—Lady Gramont—The countess of Northumberland—The dutchess of Richmond—Lady Byron—Mrs. Middleton—Lady Denham's sister—Lady Denham—Lady Rochester—Lady Sunderland—Mrs. Dawson—Mrs. Knot.

These are all original paintings drawn to great perfection by Sir Peter Lely.

The Queen's Dressing-room.

In this room are the following portraits :

Queen Henrietta Maria, wife to king Charles I.
Queen Mary when a child; and Queen Catharine, all by Vandyke.

The dutchess of York, mother to queen Mary, and queen Anne, by Sir Peter Lely.

There is a closet in this room, wherein are several paintings, and in particular a portrait of the countess of Desmond, who is said to have lived to within a few days of an hundred and fifty years of age; also a portrait of Erasmus, and other learned men.

In this closet is likewise the banner of France annually delivered on the second of August by the duke of Marlborough, by which he holds Blenheim-house, built at Woodstock in Oxfordshire in the reign of queen Anne, as a national reward to that great general for his many glorious victories over the French.

This gallery is richly ornamented with the following paintings :

King James I. and his queen, whole lengths, by Vansomer.

Rome in flames, by Guilo Romano.

A Roman family, by Titian.

The Holy Family, after Raphael.

Judith and Holofernes, by Tintoret.

A night piece by Skalkin.

The pool of Bethesda, by Tintoret.

A portrait of Charles VI. emperor of Germany, by Sir Godfrey Kneller.

The wise men making offerings to Christ, by Paulo Veronese.

Two usurers, an admired piece, by the famous blacksmith of Antwerp.

Perseus and Andromeda, by Schiavon.

Aretina and Titian, by Titian.

The duke of Gloucester, a whole length by Sir Godfrey Kneller.

Prince George of Denmark, a whole length by Dahl.

King Henry VIII. by Hans Holbein.

Vandanelli, an Italian statuary, by Correggio.

The founders of the different orders in the Romish church, by Titian and Rembrant.

A rural piece in low life, by Bassano.

A fowl piece, by Varelst.

The battle of Spurs near Terevaen in France, in 1513, by Hans Holbein.

Two views of Windsor castle, by Wosterman.

Two Italian markets, by Michael Angelo.

In this room is a curious amber cabinet, presented by the king of Prussia to queen Caroline. And here likewise is queen Caroline's china closet, filled with a great variety of curious china elegantly disposed, and the whole room is finely gilt and ornamented. Over the chimney are the pictures of prince Arthur and his two sisters, the children of king Henry VII. by Holbein. In this closet is also a fine amber cabinet, presented to queen Anne, by doctor Robinson, bishop of London, and plenipotentiary at the congress of Utrecht.

The King's Closet.

Among the curiosities in this room is a large frame of needlework, said to be wrought by Mary queen of Scots, while a prisoner in Fotheringay castle. She herself is represented supplicating for justice before the Virgin Mary, with her son, afterwards king James I. standing by her. In a scroll is worked, Sapientiam amavi et exquisivi a Juventute mea, that is, I have loved and searched after wisdom from my youth. Behind the queen are Wisdom with a serpent, and Justice with a sword. This piece lay a considerable time in the wardrobe, and was at length ordered to be put up by queen Anne.

The ceiling of this room is painted with the story of Jupiter and Leda; and over the chimney are three marble busts. The paintings are,

A Magdalen, by Carracci.

A sleeping Cupid, by Correggio.

Contemplations, by Carracci.

Titian's daughter, by herself.

A German lady, by Raphael.

The King's Dressing-room.

The ceiling of this room is painted with the story of Jupiter descending to Danaë, in a shower of gold. The paintings are,

George Villars, duke of Buckingham.

King Charles II.

Two children of Henry VII.

A naked Venus asleep, by Sir Peter Lely.

The birth of Jupiter, by Giulio Romano.

The King's Bed-chamber.

This room is hung with tapestry representing the story of Hero and Leander. The bed of state, which was set up in the reign of king Charles II. is of fine blue cloth, richly embroidered with gold and silver. And on the ceiling that prince is represented in the robes of the garter, under a canopy supported by Time, Jupiter and Neptune, with a wreath of laurel over his head, and he is attended by Europe, Asia, Africa and America paying their obedience to him. The paintings in this room are,

King Charles II. in armour, when a boy, by Vandyke.

St. Paul stoned at Lystra, by Paul Veronese.

The King's Drawing room.

The ceiling of this room is finely painted with an allegorical representation of king Charles II. riding in a triumphal cart, drawn by the horses of the sun, attended by Fame, Peace, and the Polite Arts. Hercules is driving away Rebellion, Sedition and Ignorance. Britannia and Neptune, properly attended, are paying obedience to the monarch as he passes; the whole is a lively representation sensation of the restoration of that monarch, and the introduction of arts and sciences in these kingdoms. In the other parts of the ceiling are painted the labours of Hercules, with festoons of fruit and flowers, the whole beautifully decorated in gold and stone colour. The paintings are,

- A Venetian lady, by Titian.
- A Magdalen, by Carlo Dolci.
- Herodias's daughter, by the same.
- The marquis of Hamilton, after Vandyke, by Hanneman.
- A converted chinese, the capital piece of Sir Godfrey Kneller.

The King's Public Dining-room.

The carving of this room is very beautiful, representing a great variety of fowl, fish and fruit done to the greatest perfection on lime wood, by Mr. Gibbons, a famous statuary and carver in the reign of king Charles II. On the ceiling is painted the banquet of the gods, with a great variety of fish and fowl, on the several parts of the coving, finely heightened with gold. The pictures in this room are,

- King George II. and queen Caroline.
- Hercules and Omphale.
- Cephalus and Procris.
- The birth of Venus.
- Venus and Adonis; the four last by Genaris.
- A naval triumph of king Charles II. by Verrio.
- The marriage of St. Catharine, by Dawkers.
- Nymphs and Satyrs, by Rubens and Snyders.
- Hunting the wild boar, by Snyders.
- A picture of still life, by Girardo.
- The taking of the bears, by Snyders.
- A night piece, being a family singing by candle light, by Quistin.
- A Bohemian family, by de Brie.
- Divine love, by an unknown hand.
- Lacy, a famous commedian in the time of king Charles II. in three characters, by Wright.
- Many of the paintings in this room are best seen at noon by the reflection of the sun.

The King's audience Chamber.

This room is hung with tapestry representing some religious ceremonies of the Jews. The canopy, which is said to be the richest ever made, is of green velvet, embroidered with gold. On the ceiling is represented the establishment of the church of England on the restoration of king Charles II. in the characters of England, Scotland and Ireland, attended by Faith, Hope and Charity. Religion triumphs over Superstition and Hypocrisy, who are driven by Cupids from before the face of the church, all which are represented in their proper attitudes, and highly finished. The pictures are,

- Our Saviour before Pilate, by Michael Angelo.
- The Apostles at the Sepulchre, by Schiavone.
- Peter, James and John, by Michael Angelo.
- The dutchess of Richmond, by Vandyke.

The King's Presence-chamber.

The tapestry of this room contains the history of queen Atheliah; and on the ceiling is painted Mercury with a portrait of king Charles II. which he shews with transport to the four quarters of the world, who are introduced by Neptune. Fame declares the glory of the prince, and Time drives away Sedition, Envy, and their companions. Over the canopy Justice is represented in stone colours shewing the arms of Britain to Thames and his river nymphs, with the star of Venus, and this label, Sydus Carolinum. At the lower end of the chamber is Venus, in a marine carr, drawn by Tritons and Sea Nymphs; and the whole is beautifully finished in stone colour and gold.

The room is likewise adorned with the following portraits.

Henry duke of Gloucester, brother to king Charles II.

The countess of Dorset, his governess, both by Vandyke.

Father Paul, by Tintoret.

The King's Guard-chamber.

This is a spacious and noble room, in which is a large magazine of arms, consisting of some thousands of pikes, pistols, guns, coats of mail, swords, halberts, bayonets, and drums, disposed in a most curious manner in colonades, pillars, circles, shields, and other devices by Mr. Hatris, formerly master gunner of this castle.—The person who invented this beautiful arrangement of arms, likewise placed those in the great armoury in the Tower of London.

The ceiling is finely painted in water colours. In one circle is Mars and Minerva, and in the other Peace and Plenty. In the dome is also a representation of Mars, and over the chimney-piece is a picture of Charles XI. king of Sweden, on horseback, as big as the life, by Wyck.

At an installation, the knights of the garter dine here in great state in the absence of the sovereign.

St. George's Hall.

This hall is particularly set apart to the honour of the most illustrious order of the garter, and is perhaps one of the noblest rooms in Europe, both with regard to the building and the painting, which is here performed in the most grand taste. In a large oval in the centre of the ceiling, king Charles II. is represented in the habit of the order; attended by England, Scotland, and Ireland; Religion and Plenty hold the crown of these kingdoms over his head; Mars and Mercury, with the emblems of war and peace, stand on each side. In the same oval regal government is represented, upheld by Religion and Eternity, with Justice attended by Fortitude, Temperance and Prudence, beating down Rebellion and Faction. Towards the throne is represented in an octagon, St. George's cross incircled with the garter, within a star or glory supported by Cupids, with the motto, and besides other embellishments relating to the order, the Muses are represented attending in full concert.

HONI

HONI SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE :

On the back of the state, or sovereign's throne, is a large drapery, on which is painted St. George encountering the dragon, as large as the life; and on the lower border of the drapery is inscribed, in allusion to king William III. who is painted in the habit of the order, sitting under a royal canopy, by Sir Godfrey Kneller. To the throne is an ascent by five steps of fine marble, to which the painter has added five more, which are done with such perfection as to deceive the sight, and induce the spectator to think them equally real.

VENIENDO RESTITUIT REM :

This noble room is an hundred and eight feet in length, and the whole north side is taken up with the triumph of Edward the Black Prince, after the manner of the Romans. At the upper part of the hall is Edward III. that prince's father, the conqueror of France and Scotland, and the founder of the order of the garter, seated on a throne, receiving the king's of France and Scotland prisoners: the Black Prince is seated in the middle of the procession, crowned with laurel, and carried by slaves, preceded by captives, and attended by the emblems of Victory, Liberty, and other insignia of the Romans, with the banners of France and Scotland displayed. The painter has given a loose to his fancy, by closing the procession with the fiction of the countess of Salisbury, in the person of a fine lady, making garlands for the prince, and the representation of the Merry Wives of Windsor.

At the lower end of the hall is a noble music gallery, supported by slaves, larger than the life, in proper attitudes, said to represent a father and his three sons taken prisoners by the Black Prince in his wars abroad. Over this gallery, on the lower compartment of the ceiling, is the collar of the order of the garter fully displayed. The painting of this room was done by Verro, and is highly finished, and heightened with gold.

St. George's or the King's chapel.

On the ceiling of this chapel is finely represented Our Lord's ascension: and the altar-piece is adorned with a noble painting of the Last Supper. The north side of the chapel is ornamented with the representation of our Saviour's raising Lazarus from the dead, his curing the sick of the palsy, and other miracles, beautifully painted by Verro; and in a group of spectators, the painter has introduced his own effigy, with those of Sir Godfrey Kneller, and Mr. Cooper, who assisted him in these paintings. The east end of this chapel is taken up with the closet belonging to his majesty and the royal family. The canopy, curtains, and furniture, are of crimson velvet, fringed with gold; and the carved work of this chapel, which is well worthy the attention of the curious, is done by that famous artist Gibbons, in lime-tree, representing a great variety of pelicans, doves, palms, and other allusions to scripture history, with the star and garter, and other ornaments finished to great perfection.

From St. George's chapel you are conducted to the Queen's Guard-chamber, the first room you entered: for this is the last of the state apartments at present shown to the public, the others being only open when the court resides at Windsor. They consist of many beautiful chambers, adorned with the paintings of the greatest masters.

In passing from hence, the stranger usually looks into the inner or horn-court, so called from a pair of stag horns of a very extraordinary size, taken in the forest, and set up in that court, which is painted in bronze and stone colour. On one side is represented a Roman battle, and on the opposite side a sea-fight, with the images of Jupiter, Neptune, Mercury and Pallas; and in the gallery is a representation of king David playing before the ark.

From this court a flight of stone steps lead to the King's Guard-chamber; and in the cavity under these steps, and fronting this court, is a figure of Hercules also in stone colours. On a dome over the steps, is painted the battle of the Gods; and on the sides of the stair-case is a representation of the four ages of the world, and two battles of the Greeks and Romans in fresco.

Having thus described the castle both within and without, it may not be improper to give some account of the installation of the knights of the garter, this being the seat of that most illustrious order.

The order of the garter was instituted by Edward III. in the year 1349, for the improvement of military honour, and the reward of virtue. It is called the order of St. George, the patron of England, under whose banner the English always went out to war, and St. George's cross was made the ensign of the order. At the same time the garter was appointed to be worn by the knights on the left leg, as a principal mark of distinction, not from any regard to a lady's garter, but as a tie or band of association in honour and military virtue, to bind the knights companions strictly to himself and each other, in friendship and true agreement, and as an ensign or badge of unity and combination, to promote the honour of God, and the glory and interest of their prince and sovereign.

At that time king Edward being engaged in prosecuting by arms, his right to the crown of France, caused the French motto Honi soit qui mal y pense, to be wrought in gold letters round the garter, declaring thereby the equity of his intention, and at the same time retorting shame and defiance upon him who should dare to think ill of the just enterprize in which he had engaged for the support of his right to the crown.

The installation of a knight of this most noble order consists of many ceremonies established by the royal founder, and the succeeding sovereigns of the order, the care of which is committed to

Garter

Garter king at arms, a principal officer, appointed to support and maintain the dignity of this noble order of knighthood.

On the morning of the installation the knights commissioners, whom the sovereign has appointed to install the persons who are to be invested with this dignity, assemble in the great chamber, at the dean of Windsor's lodgings, robed in the full habit of the order, where Garter and the officers of the order likewise attend in their robes; but the knights elect appear there only in their under habits with their caps and feathers in their hands.

From hence the knights walk two and two in procession to St. George's chapel, preceded by the poor knights, prebends, heralds, pursuivants, and other officers of the order, in their several habits; where, being arrived, the knights elect rest themselves in chairs behind the altar, and are respectively introduced into the chapter-house, where the knights commissioners (Garter and the other officers attending) invest them with the surcoat or upper habit of the order, whilst the register reads the following admonition: "Take this robe of crimson to the increase of your honour, and in token or sign of the most noble order you have received, wherewith you being defended, may be bold, not only strong to fight, but also to offer yourself to shed your blood for Christ's faith, and the liberties of the church, and the just and necessary defence of them that are oppressed and needy." Then Garter presents the crimson velvet girdle to the commissioners, who buckle it on, and also girds on the sword and hanger.

This being done the procession of each knight elect separately is made into the choir, attended by the lords commissioners, and other companions of the order, and preceded by the poor knights, prebends, &c. as before, Garter in the middle carrying on a crimson velvet cushion the mantle, hood, garter, collar, and George, having the register on his right hand, who carries the New Testament, and the oath fairly written on parchment, and the black rod on his left.

On entering the choir, after reverence made to the altar, and the sovereign's stall, the knights are conducted to their several stalls, under their respective banners, and other ensigns of honour. One of the officers of the order then holding the New Testament open, the knight elect places his right hand upon it, and the register reads the oath, which is expressed in these terms: "You being chosen to be one of the honourable company of this noble order of the Garter, shall promise and swear by the Holy Evangelists by you here touched, that wittingly you shall not break any statute of the said order, or any articles in them contained, the same being agreeable, and not repugnant to the laws of Almighty God, and the laws of this realm, as far forth as to you belongeth and appertaineth: so help you God, and his holy word."

After the oath is taken the commissioners invest the knight with the mantle of the order, during which the register reads the admonition, "Receive this robe, &c." Garter then presents to the commissioners the hood, and they put it over the knight's right shoulder, bringing the tippets across his breast, and tucking them under the belt.

This being done, Garter presents to them the Great Collar and George, which they hang over the mantle and hood, while the register reads the following admonition: "Wear this collar about thy neck, adorned with the image of the Blessed Martyr and soldier of Christ, St. George; by whose imitation provoked, thou mayest so pass over both prosperous and adverse encounters, that having stoutly vanquished thy enemies, both of body and soul, thou mayest not only receive the praises of this transient combat, but be crowned with the palm of eternal victory."

Garter then presents the statute book, which the commissioners deliver to the knight, after which they place his cap and feathers on his head, and seat him in his stall. This being done, the officers of the order retire, and stand before their seats; while the knight thus installed rises, and bows first towards the altar, and then to the sovereign's stall.

Prayers now begin, and the obit service is read in remembrance of their pious predecessors; and when these words in the prayer are pronounced, Let your light so shine, &c. the poor knights come from their seats, make their reverences, and walk up near the altar, where they place themselves as before, and are followed by the pursuivants and the officers of arms.

The solemnity of the installation being thus over, and prayers ended, the grand procession of the knights is made from the choir in their full habits of the order, with their caps frequently adorned with diamonds and plumes of feathers on their heads, round the body of the church; from whence they pass out at the south door, preceded by his majesty's music in the following order:

The poor knights of Windsor.

The choir of St. George's chapel.

The canons or prebends of Windsor.

The heralds and pursuivants at arms.

The dean of Windsor, register of the order, with Garter king at arms on his right hand, and on his left the black rod of the order.

The knights companions according to their stalls, their trains supported by the choristers of St. George's chapel.

The procession is thus continued in great state through the courts of the castle into St. George's hall. The knights then rest themselves in the royal apartments, while a sumptuous banquet, if the sovereign be present, is served up in this magnificent room, or, in the king's absence, in the great guard-chamber next adjoining, into which the knights are introduced, and dine with great state in the habits of the order, the officers and music attending.

At the second course, Garter, with the officers at arms, proceeds from the lower end of the room to the place where the new installed knights are seated, but instantly stand up uncovered while Garter proclaims the stile and title of each knight, either in English or French; and then all the officers

Officers of arms crying Largesse, make their obeisances, and retire.

The day is concluded with a ball for the ladies in the royal apartments.

Having thus described the town of Windsor, the little park and castle, and given some account of the order of the knights of the garter, we are naturally led to mention the great park, which is fourteen miles in circumference, and is well stocked with deer and other game. This park lies on the south side of the town, and opens by a very noble road, the sides of which are planted with trees to the summit of a delightful hill, at near three miles distance; leading to the Ranger's lodge, the residence of his late royal highness the duke of Cumberland, who greatly improved the natural beauties of this delightful park, by large plantations of trees, extensive lawns, and spacious canals, which has rendered this villa an habitation worthy of a prince.

The two first rooms of this lodge are neatly hung with plain paper, ornamented with prints, among which are views of the improvements made by his royal highness in the park.

Over the chimney-piece in the dining-room is his royal highness's collection of breeding mares; and there is here a curious table of petrified water.

In the passage is the crossing of the Rhine, Marshal Saxe, three curious fancy peices, by Hoare, a fine drawing of St. Paul's, Cleopatra, Rubens's family, &c.

In a room called the black hall is the genealogy of the Brunswick family, a peice of feather-work flowers, four views of Gibraltar, Windsor castle in straw-work; and his late majesty in needle-work.

In the dressing-room are two pagodas under glasses, several curious pieces of his highnesses turning, and six different views of Cranbourn lodge and park.

In the bed-chamber is the portrait of James, late earl of Waldegrave; four views of the lodge, and the battle of Culloden. The bed is of green damask and gold.

The Belvidere on Shrubs hill, is a triangular building, that has a tower at each corner, one of which is a stair-case, the other a library, and the third a china closet. The middle room is richly gilt, and adorned with a beautiful chandelier of Chelsea porcelain. It is encompassed by a fine plantation of trees, that forms a most delightful rural scene. The noble piece of water in the valley underneath, was formed at a great expence, and from a small stream or current; is rendered capable of carrying barges and boats of pleasure. Over this water his late royal highness caused a bridge to be erected of most curious architecture, and on a bold and noble plan, it consisting of one single arch, one hundred and sixty-five feet wide in the clear, which is five feet wider than the boasted Rialto at Venice.

Near this bridge is what is called the Chinese Island, near Mill-gate, where there is another bridge of a curious construction; it having arches three ways. The building is elegant and striking. The middle room is of scarlet and green, richly ornamented with gold. The pannels of the doors are of looking-glass, which has a pretty effect, and the room is also adorned with a curious glass chandelier. The right hand room forms a kitchen; and the left is a small room hung with white sattin, painted, in which is a settee of the same. Here a curious bracket, which supports a table against the window, forms a spreading tree, with birds, beneath which sit on a branch, a Chinese man and woman; and over the chimney is a fine set of china. This piece of water is a great ornament to the park, it being so large; that with its several branches, it measures five miles round. It terminates in another small bridge, and a large cascade, at the head of which is a grotto.

In the neighbourhood of Windsor are many very elegant buildings belonging to the nobility and gentry; two of which being frequently visited for their curious contents, we shall here describe. The first of these is the agreeable seat and gardens of the honourable James Bateman, esq; situate on the banks of the river.

In the hall, which is hung with a large collection of foreign prints, is a curious Chinese lantern; and over the chimney are swords, daggers and lances, brought from China. Adjoining to the hall is a small library in the Chinese taste; which, by means of glasses, gives a double reflection.

On the stair-case are the arms of the barons who signed Magna Charta. And the window is painted with several history pieces from the Old Testament; as the building of Noah's Ark, &c. with the effigies of all the prophets and apostles.

In the parlour is a large handsome jar, said to have been brought from Rome, and that it boasts an antiquity of three hundred years before the birth of Christ. Here is likewise a curious India bird cage and firescreen; and over the chimney is a representation of two Egyptian mummies. The pictures in this room are, Louis le Grand—Louis Quinze—Belisarius—Our Saviour and his disciples at Emmaus—Cardinal Fleury, &c.

In the drawing-room is another jar of the same nature with the former, and brought from the same place. The glasses and cabinets are very curious; the chairs are flowers in needlework. Here are curious silver flowers under glasses, and a set of tea equipage in gold, complete. The other remarkables in this room are; a cock curiously cut in paper—A large medal of Leda and the swan—Ditto of Clemens IX.—And several smaller medals—The Holy Virgin—Hendrick.

The dressing-room is very elegantly furnished, the windows are so contrived as to shew the company on their heads. In this room, among several foreign medals, carved in box, is a small brass figure, on a gilt pedestal; on the side of which is this inscription: "Found at Bath, in a stone coffin with bones, in digging a foundation." In the corner of this room is a Roman chapel in miniature, in which is the history of Our Saviour's life carved in ivory. Here is a curious shrine; a piece of the cross; a bone of St. Patrick, &c. &c. The holy vessels are all of pure gold, richly chased. Here are also several curious crucifixes both of silver and gold. The Holy Virgin in solid silver. All the figures, utensils, &c. are richly set with precious stones; and the chapel itself beautifully carved and gilt.

In the monk rooms are two curious antique beds, and the rooms are hung with the pictures of several monks. In one room is a large antique metal basin; in the other, a delft-dish full of serpents, snakes, &c.

Over the chimney, in Mr. Bateman's bed-chamber, are the twelve apostles (Judas excepted); a set of Chinese pictures, representing the breeding of silk worms; a neat cabinet; two Dutch figures and a small library. By the side of the bed is a small ivory crucifix, of a different mark from any other in the house.

The best bedchamber is very handsomely furnished, and contains a beautiful inlaid pearl cross, a fine shell urn, a curious cabinet, and a large gilt statue of Saturn devouring a young child.

On a slab in the wrought room stands a large inlaid pearl cross; and over the chimney are four very curious antique figures.

In the garden, under the piazzas, or cloisters, hangs a large collection of paintings, from William the Conqueror, to king James—Carducamus, bishop of Bangor—Several scripture pieces—A genealogical piece—The famous blacksmith of Antwerp's wife—Sir Thomas More—and several of our celebrated painters and poets.

The dining-room is situate in the garden, and is an octagon building. Here is a neat chandelier, and a curious stove grate and furniture. Over the door is the picture of lord Bateman; and on the outside is carved Jacob's ladder, and the descent of Christ. Over the chimney are the pictures of Lady Harvey—Lord Ilchester—Lord Foley—Lord Holland.

In the china closet is a large and valuable collection of china, both ornamental and useful, in the Chinese taste. Likewise a curious china lanthorn.

Adjoining to this closet is an ancient tomb of Carducamus, bishop of Bangor: over which is the following inscription:

"Thys ys the true effygie of Carducamus byshop of Bangor descended of an auintient brytysh stocke. A prelate of syngular pietye and rare lernyng in all scyences especyally in Theologie who contemplating the vanyty of worldlye greetnesse and the weight of the pastoral care retygn'd his byshopryche by pyrmysyon of pope Gregory IX. and became an humble monk in the abbey of Door dedycating hys whole substance to Godde and hymself to divine contemplatons leaveing behynd hym a precyous work a buke of Homilys entytled a looking glais for Chrystens he dyed at Door in the Ides of April.

"MDCLII."

On an altar lies the book called the looking glais for christians. Here is a fine human skull and bones in a glais case; a crozier, mitre, &c. And here is the pitcher in which it is said Rachael gave water to Jacob.

Farther on in the garden is a building, called Brien's cave; in a niche in the back thereof, is an ancient cast iron figure of Brien Boiroimbe; beneath, is this inscription in gold characters:

"The most renowned Brien Boiroimbe, governed the isle in peate: through his reign the Irish were a brave wealthy people, and wars and discord ceased."

On the right is a painting, representing Brien Boiroimbe mortally wounded in his tent, with Donough, his son, commander of the army. And on the left is a painting, representing the bishop of Inis Cathy, chaplain to Brien Boiroimbe, administering to him the last sacraments.

Adjoining is a view of the abbey of Swords, with this inscription:

"The great irish monarch, Brien Boiroimbe, commanded in twenty-nine battles against the Danes, and in all of them was victorious. The reputation he had acquired in the field of battle was to be equalled by few in any age, to be excelled by none. He commanded in more battles than Julius Cæsar, and distinguished himself in all of them with an amazing intrepidity. It may be said of him, that he was a prodigy of goodness, understanding and greatness. To consider his piety, it would seem that he had spent all his life in a cloister; to examine the productions of his genius, those that have read his works would be inclined to believe, that his whole time had been occupied in learning and the sciences; to view him as a general and monarch, he appears to have studied nothing but the art of war and politics, the conquest of his enemies, and the ease and prosperity of his subjects."

Underneath is the funeral procession to the abbey of Swords, with this inscription:

"The most renowned Brien Boiroimbe was slain 1034 years after the birth of Christ."

Directly opposite to this is a painting, representing the ruin of the chapel and great gate of Swords, on which are the following words:

"The institutes of Brien Boiroimbe, so wholesome for the support of virtue, were kept with so much reverence and regard, that a young lady of consummate beauty, adorned with jewels and a ring of gold, travelled alone on foot, from north to south, and no attempt was made upon her honour, or to divest her of the cloaths she wore."

Underneath is a painting of the battle of Cluantar, with this inscription:

"In the most dreadful battle of Cluantar, was slain the valiant monarch of the island, after a life of eighty-eight years."

Towards

Towards the end of the garden is the effigy of a favourite spaniel, lying on a cushion upon a pedestal; on the front of which are the following lines:

The female who within this tomb is laid;
Departed hence, nor widow, wife nor maid.
Titles she boasted not, nor gentle kin;
But sense and beauty, and her name was Pinne.
Obscure, she liv'd an easy chearful life,
Refus'd no friendship, and provok'd no strife
With those she lik'd not, now-and-then too loud,
And ev'n with those she did, too often proud.
No Christian she, Mahometan or Jew,
But to the god of Epicurus true;
For she ne'er bore a pain she could avoid;
And ev'ry pleasure she could seize enjoy'd.
By no law, rule, or principle e'er sway'd,
But what her appetite or passions made.
She drank when thirsty, eat when hunger mov'd,
Rested when weary, and when tender lov'd.
She to no tyrant, own'd herself a slave,
But to her friend her willing service gave;
And tho' four legs this female had, 'tis true,
I know of few so good that have but two.

On the east side of Windsor is the large and elegant seat of the duke of St. Alban's. The gardens extend to the park, and the paintings in the house are exceeding curious. The marble hall is adorned with fruit pieces, by Bogdeni, and several other capital painters.

In the breakfast room is a curious clock presented to the duke of St. Albans by king Charles II. It is fixed on the head of an Ethiopian, who holds a bow in his hand, and by his side is a quiver of arrows. The face of the clock represents a landscape, with a fountain; and in the sky are placed three figures, to denote the quarters of the hour; and under, in a hole, is the hour figure. This was designed for a night clock. Over the doors of this room are the pictures of lady Mary Vere, and Quinſtin, the blacksmith of Antwerp, with his wife and child, by Rubens. The other paintings are, St. Evremond, by Sir Godfrey Kneller—Mr. Francis Villiers—A contemplation piece—Henrietta Maria, wife to Charles I. by Vandyke—Noah's ark, by Bassan—Hortence Mancini, dutchess of Mazarine—Messalini—King Charles I.

The duke's dressing room is adorned with the following pictures: The entrance into Rome, and the castle of St. Angelo, both by Candeletto—Portrait of the dutchess of Mazarine, by Sir Godfrey Kneller—A curious piece of still life by Candeletto—Several Dutch pieces and ship-ping.

Over the doors belonging to her grace's dressing room, are the pictures of Mary countess of Exeter, daughter to Milway dutchess of Northumberland, by Sir Peter Lely—Lady Diana—Lady Mary Vere—Mrs. Elinor Gwin.

The duke and dutchess's bedchamber is hung with tapestry made in Spital-fields by Chabanex, and represents the hay harvest and a Dutch wake. The bed is of yellow damask, and the paintings are, four flower pieces, by young Baptiſt.

In the gallery is a head of Our Saviour, the Ascension, the Wife Men's offering, and the Virgin Mary, on agate; Oliver Cromwell, lord Digby, &c. and three pieces of birds, by Bogdeni.

In the public dining room are three views of Venice, and a view of the inside of the pantheon at Rome.

The great stair-case is painted with stories from Ovid.

The great drawing room is hung with tapestry, the subject of which is the history of king Nebuchadnezzar, and Joseph interpreting Pharaoh's dreams. Over the chimney is the picture of king William, and over the doors are Mrs. Loftus, with Mustapha and Charles Wife, two Turkish children taken prisoners by the first duke of St. Albans, at the battle of Belgrade. When they arrived at years of discretion his grace gave them the choice of returning home or staying there; on which Mustapha returned, and the other, who was baptized by the name of Charles Wife, died a poor knight of Windsor.

In the dining room is a large collection of prints, and a curious clock, that goes a year without winding up, and shews the name of the month and the day of the week. On the face of the clock is this inscription: "The long hand is 365 days in going round, and points to the days of the month; the short hand, with the figure of the sun, shews how many minutes (computed from the cypher, under 69) a true sun-dial is faster or slower than this clock, the sun daily varying from equal time."

In the bedchamber, the bed is of crimson damask, and the room is adorned with curious India japan, with a cabinet inlaid with pearl.

In the flower-room is a curious India cabinet. Here are likewise eight flower pieces by Baptiſt, which cost a hundred guineas each.

The chimney-piece in the dressing room is carved round by Gibbons; and over it is the duke of St. Albans in armour, by Sir Godfrey Kneller. Over the door are the pictures of James lord Beaucherk, and Diana Vere, dutchess of St. Albans, by Sir Godfrey Kneller.

The paintings in the waiting room are, Henry Frederick, prince of Wales, the eldest son to king James I.—George Fitzroy, duke of Northumberland—The queen of Lewis XIV. with his picture in her hand.

In the billiard-room, over the two doors, are the pictures of Henry Fitzroy, duke of Grafton—John Wilmot, earl of Rochester—James Scot, duke of Monmouth—John Sheffield, earl Mulgrave, afterwards duke of Buckingham—Thomas Butler, earl of Ossory—Henry Jermin, earl of St. Albans—Charles Stewart, duke of Richmond and Lenox—Aubrey de Vere, earl of Oxford—George Villiers, duke of Buckingham—James Stewart, duke of York—Prince Rupert William Henry Nassau, prince of Orange—The last eleven are in the full robes of the garter—Dr. Gregory Hascard, dean of Windsor, in his mantle—Henrietta Churchill, dutchess of Marlborough, and wife to Francis, earl of Godolphin—Charles II. in his robes of the garter—Jane Shore and fair Rosamond.

Over

Over the two chimney pieces are the pictures of Charles I.—Charles prince of Wales—Henry Maria—James duke of York.

Adjoining to Windsor is the village of Taplow, where the fineness of the situation has caused many gentlemen of fortune to fix their residence. The manor-house on the summit of the hill is an ancient noble structure that enjoys a delightful prospect over the country and the river Thames, which runs underneath. This house lately belonged to the right honourable the earl of Inchiquin, who resided here during the life of his late royal highness Frederick prince of Wales, his majesty's father; but on the decease of that prince, his lordship removed to Cliefdon in the neighbourhood.

Cliefdon-house was erected by George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, in the reign of Charles II. and came by marriage to the late earl of Orkney, who made several considerable improvements in the house and gardens, which were also improved and enlarged by the late prince of Wales; so that wherever the eye is turned, the sight is struck with agreeable avenues, porterras, and beautiful lawns, with an extensive view of the Thames, and the fine well cultivated country on its banks.

The house is a stately edifice, and the rooms spacious and noble. On the front of the house is raised a noble terrace, said to be higher even than that of Windsor castle; however, it is certain, that the prospect from thence is no less beautiful and extensive. The rooms are noble and spacious; and the grand chamber is adorned with tapestry hangings, representing the battles of the great duke of Marlborough, finely expressed, by order of the late earl of Orkney.

W O K I N G.

This town is situate on the river Wey, twenty miles from London, in the county of Surry. A neat market house was built here in the year 1665, at the charge of James Zouch, esq. Its first fair, which is but a small one, was procured by Edmond, duke of Somerset, from Henry VI. the other from king Charles II. by Mr. Zouch. 'Tis a private country town; out of any great road, so that it is little heard of; but there are the remains of the walls of a royal house, which was the residence of a branch of the family of Plantagenet, viz. the old countess of Richmond, mother to Henry VII. In the church-yard here it has been remarked, that so long as there is any thing left of a corpse, besides bones, a kind of plant grows from it, about the thickness of a bull rush, with a top like the head of asparagus, which comes near the surface, but never above it. The outside is black, but the inside red, and, when the corpse is quite consumed, the plant dies away. But the same observation has been made in other church-yards where the soil is a light red sand, as it is in this.

[Though the two following places are not within the compass of this chapter, yet as they are remarkable in themselves, and contain many very superb buildings, we presume a description of them in this place will not be either improper or unentertaining to the reader.]

C A M B R I D G E.

The town of Cambridge is situated on the river Cam, which divides it into two parts that are again joined by a stone bridge. It is fifty-two miles distant from London, and though dirty and ill built, yet it has fourteen parish churches. There is a public conduit in the market-place which was built by Hobson the carrier, who in the time of James I. acquired a very considerable estate. A new building, called the Shire-house, was lately erected contiguous to the old town-hall, at the expence of the county.

In this town there are two charity schools, in which three hundred children are taught and fifty clothed. These schools are supported by a subscription of two hundred and thirty pounds per annum, an estate of thirty pounds a year, which was left them for ever by William Warte's, and by money at the sacrament in some of the college chapels; which has been appropriated for that purpose.

This town is governed by a mayor, high steward, recorder, thirteen aldermen, a common-council of twenty-four, a town clerk and other officers.

The university of Cambridge consists of sixteen colleges, four of which are distinguished by the name of halls, though the privileges of both are in every respect the same. It is a corporation, consisting of about fifteen hundred persons; and is governed by a chancellor, a high steward, two proctors, and two taxers; all of whom are chosen by the university.

The chancellor is always a peer of the realm, and generally continues in his office for life, by the tacit consent of the university, though a new choice may be made every three years. As the chancellor is a person of such high rank, it is not expected or intended that he should execute the office; but he has not the power of appointing his substitute: a vice chancellor is chosen annually on the third of November, by the university; he is always the head of some college, the heads of each college returning two of their body, of which the university elects one. The high steward is chosen by the senate, and holds his place by patent from the university. The proctors and taxers are also chosen every year, from the several colleges and halls by turns.

The public schools, of which there is one to every college, are in a building of brick and rough stone, erected on the four sides of a quadrangular court. Every college has also its particular library, in which, except that of King's college, the scholars are not obliged to study, as in the libraries at Oxford, but may borrow the books, and study in their chambers. Besides the particular libraries of the several colleges, there is the university library, which contains the collections of the archbishops, Parker, Grindal, and Pancroft; and of doctor Thomas Moore, bishop of Ely; consisting of thirty thousand volumes, lumes, which was purchased for seven thousand pounds, and presented to the university by his late majesty king George I.

Each college has also its particular chapel, where the masters, fellows, and scholars, meet every morning and evening, for the public worship of God; though on Sundays and Holidays, when there is a sermon, they attend at St. Mary's church.

The names of the colleges, with their respective descriptions, are as follow:

1. King's College. This was founded in the year 1451 by Henry VII. It was at first but small, being built by that prince, for a rector, and twelve scholars only. Near it was a little hostel for grammarians, built by William Bingham, which was granted by the founder to king Henry, for the enlargement of his college: whereupon he united these two; and having enlarged them, by uniting the church of St. John Zachary, founded a college for a provost, seventy fellows and scholars, and three chaplains. The chapel belonging to this college is deservedly esteemed one of the finest buildings of its kind in the world: it is three hundred and four feet long, seventy-three broad, and ninety-four feet high on the outside; yet it is supported wholly by the symmetry of its parts, having no pillar within to sustain the roof, which, as well as the sides, is of free-stone. It has twelve large windows on each side, finely painted; and the choir is adorned with excellent carving. It constitutes one side of a large square; for the royal founder designed that the college should be quadrangle, all of equal beauty; but the civil wars, in which he was so involved with the house of York, prevented his accomplishing this noble design. What has been added to this college within these few years past, is a great ornament to it. This new building, which is of stone, runs from the west end of the chapel, a little detached from it, to the southward; forms another side of the square, and contains spacious chambers and apartments, being two hundred and thirty-six feet in length, and forty-six in breadth. The new senate-hall makes the angle parallel to the chapel. This college has a master, fifty fellows, and twenty scholars.

In digging the foundation of the new buildings of this college, the workmen found a great number of broad pieces of gold, of the coin of king Henry V. exceeding fair. As soon as it was known, the college obtained a considerable number of them, which they made presents of to their particular factors, and divided among themselves and the fellows of the college; but it was supposed that many of them was secreted by the labourers; for this coin which before was very scarce, could afterwards be obtained with the greatest ease.

2. Queen's College. This was founded by queen Margaret of Anjou, wife to king Henry VI. in the year 1448; but the troublesome times which followed prevented her completing this fabric. The first master of it, Andrew Ducket, procured great sums of money from different persons towards finishing this work; and so far prevailed with queen Elizabeth, wife to Edward IV. that she perfected the work her professed enemy had begun. The reverend Mr. Ferdinando Smithes, senior fellow of Queen's College, who died in November 1725, gave fifteen hundred pounds to the same, to be appropriated to the use of three batchelors of art, till the time of their taking their master's degree. This is one of the pleasantest colleges in the university; it has the most convenient lodgings, delightful gardens, orchards, and walks; and was the residence of the celebrated Erasmus of Rotterdam, who chose this college for his last retreat. It maintains a master, nineteen fellows, and forty-four scholars.

3. Christ's College. This was founded by the Lady Margaret, countess of Richmond, mother to Henry VII. in the year 1506, upon the same spot of ground where God's house formerly stood. She settled there a master and twelve fellows, &c. which number, in the time of king Edward VI. being complained of, as favouring of superstition; by alluding to Our Saviour and his twelve disciples; that prince added a thirteenth fellowship, and increased the number of Scholars. This college has been, within these few years past, adorned with an elegant new building; and now maintains a master, fifteen fellows, and fifty scholars.

4. St. John's College. This was also by the above countess, about the year 1560, upon the same spot where Nighel, or Neal, second bishop of Ely, in the year 1134, founded an hospital for canons regular, which, by Hugh de Balsam, was converted into a priory dedicated to St. John, and by the executors of the said countess, into a college, under the name of the same saint; but she dying before it was finished, the work was retarded for some time: it was, however, carried on by her executors; and in the beginning of the reign of king James I. was greatly enlarged. The building at present consists of three spacious courts: it has a noble library, which has, of late years, been greatly augmented by the accession of that of doctor Gunning, late bishop of Ely, who bequeathed the same to it. This college, which is pleasantly situated by the river, is no less remarkable for its beautiful groves and gardens, than for the number of its students, and the strict and regular discipline of them. There are at present a master, fifty four fellows and one hundred scholars.

5. Peter-House. This is a large quadrangular building, well contrived, and adorned with porticos. It has a master, twenty-two fellows, and forty-two scholars; and was founded by Hugh Balsam, bishop of Ely, anno 1257, when only prior of Ely. The scholars at first had no other conveniences than chambers, which exempted them from the high rates imposed on them by the townsmen for lodgings. The endowment was settled by the same Hugh, when bishop, anno 1248, for a master and fourteen fellows; which number might be increased or diminished according to the improvement or diminution of their revenues.

6. Pembroke Hall. This was founded in the year 1347, by the lady Mary St. Paul, countess of Pembroke, third wife to Audomare domare de Valentia, earl of Pembroke, who having been unhappily slain at a tilting on his wedding day, she entirely sequestered herself from all worldly enjoyments, and, amongst other pious acts, built this college, which has been since much augmented by the benefactions of others. It has a master, five fellows, and thirteen scholars.

7. Clare Hall was founded in the year 1340, by Richard Badow, chancellor of the university, with the assistance of the lady Elizabeth Clare, countess of Ulster. He had before built an house called University Hall, wherein the scholars lived; at their own expence, for sixteen years, till it was accidentally destroyed by fire. The founder finding the charge of rebuilding would exceed his abilities, sought the kind assistance of the aforesaid lady, through whose liberality it was not only rebuilt, but endowed.

This hall has been lately new built, and is now one of the neatest and most uniform structures in the university: it is a square of building three stories high; the materials are free-stone, and the work is Doric: it reaches quite to the banks of the river Cam, which runs through the garden; and the court is entered by a lofty gatehouse, adorned with two rows of pillars. There is another building contiguous to the college, the upper story of which is the library, and the lower the chapel. To this college belongs a meadow on the other side of the river, which communicates with it by a bridge. It has a master, eighteen fellows, and sixty-three scholars.

8. Jesus College. This was founded in the year 1499, by John Alcocke, bishop of Ely, out of an old nunnery dedicated to St. Radegund, given him by king Henry VII. and pope Julius II. on account of the scandalous incontinence of the nuns; in order to be by him converted to this use: and this prelate established in it a master, six fellows, and six scholars; but their numbers have since been greatly increased by considerable benefactions. It maintains at present a master, sixteen fellows, and thirty-one scholars.

9. Catharine Hall. This was founded in the year 1459, by Robert Woodlark, third provost of King's College; and the hall was built over-against the Carmelites house, for one master and three fellows. The numbers have been since greatly increased, as well as the revenues; for it at present maintains a master, six fellows, and thirty-six scholars. A great part of it has been lately new built, and may now be said to be a beautiful and regular fabric.

10. Gonvil and Caius College. In the year 1348 Edmund Gonvil founded an hall, called after his name, upon the place where are now the orchard and tennis-court of Bennet College; but within five years after it was removed into the place where it now stands, by bishop Bateman, founder of Trinity-hall. In the year 1607 John Caius, doctor of physic, improved this hall into a new college, since chiefly called by his name; and it has, of late years, received considerable embellishments. It has twenty-six fellows, and seventy-four scholars.

11. Trinity Hall. This was founded about the year 1353, by William Bateman, bishop of Norwich. it was built upon a place which once belonged to the monks of Ely, and was a house for students before the time of bishop Bateman, who, by exchange for the advowson of certain rectories, got it into his own possession. He was a great master of civil and canon law; whereupon the master, two fellows, and three scholars, the number appointed by him at the first foundation, were obliged to follow those two studies. It has been since much augmented by benefactors, and the number of its members are proportionably increased.

The building of this hall is but irregular, yet it has convenient lodgings for the master and fellows, and pleasant gardens, inclosed by walls of brick; and maintains twelve fellows, and fourteen scholars.

12. Corpus Christi, or Benedict College. This was founded by the society of friars in Corpus Christi, in the year 1346. This arose out of two guilds or fraternities, one of Corpus Christi, and the other of the Blessed Virgin; which, after a long emulation being united into one body, by a joint interest built this college, which took its name from the adjoining church of St. Benedict. Their greatest modern benefactor was doctor Matthew Parker, once master of the college, and afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, who by his prudent management, recovered several rights of the college; and, besides two fellowships, and five scholarships, gave a great number of excellent MSS. to their library, which were mostly collected out of the remains of the old abbey libraries, colleges, and cathedrals, and chiefly relate to the history of England.

It is a long square of buildings, containing two courts, and two rows of lodgings. It has a chapel and library under the same roof; and maintains a master twelve fellows, and forty scholars.

13. Emanuel College was founded in the year 1584, the 26th of Elizabeth, by Sir William Mildmay, who was chancellor and treasurer of the exchequer to that princess; where there had been formerly a convent of dominicans, instituted in the year 1280, and the sixth of Edward I. by Alice, then countess of Oxford. This college he dedicated to Emanuel, and placed in it a master, three fellows, and four scholars. Here is a very neat chapel, built chiefly by the bounty of doctor William Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury, who left to the library, at his decease, a very valuable collection of books. This college maintains a master, fourteen fellows, and sixty scholars.

14. Trinity College. This was founded in the year 1546, by king Henry VIII. who converted three ancient halls, called St. Michael's, King's, and Physwick's halls, into this stately college, which he dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and endowed it for the maintenance of a provost, sixty fellows, forty scholars, and ten almoner orators; reserving to himself and his successors the right of appointing the warden.

The college, or house of St. Michael the Archangel, was founded in 1324, by Henry or Hervy Stanton, canon of St. Peter's at York, and chancellor chancellor of the exchequer to king Edward II. This place was in all respects a college, and the fellows of it took their degrees in the public schools of this university.

King's hall was completed and endowed by Edward III. in the year 1376, and the fiftieth year of his reign; and the fellows of this hall also took their degrees in the university, as fellows of a college.

Physwick Hostel, or Hall was the dwelling-house of William Physwick, esq; beadle of the university, who, in the year 1393, gave it to Gonvil-hall, and converted it into a little college, to receive such scholars belonging to Gonvil-hall, as that house could not conveniently contain.

The above halls being formed into a college, queen Mary presented it with a revenue of three hundred and seventy-six pounds ten shillings; and in the reign of queen Elizabeth, Nevill, dean of Canterbury, the eighth master of this college expended three thousand pounds in repairing, or rather rebuilding it, which he did with such magnificence and splendor, that for spaciousness, beauty, and uniformity, it is hardly to be equalled. It has lately been much improved by the addition of a library. This building is of free-stone, supported by two rows of pillars, and said to be one of the most noble and elegant structures of the kind in the world. This college is rendered famous on account of several great men it has educated; the most illustrious of which were, the lord Bacon, Sir Isaac Newton, doctor Barrow, Mr. Ray, and doctor Bentley. In this college are maintained three royal professors, sixty fellows and ninety-one scholars.

15. Magdalen College was founded in the year 1542, by Thomas Audley, lord chancellor of England, who endowed it with lands belonging to the priory of the Holy Trinity of London, and called it the college of St. Mary Magdalen. It was at first only a hall, consisting of three houses; but in the year 1519, the eleventh of Henry VIII. Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, purchased these houses, in which the monks of several neighbouring abbies had been used to study; from whence it was formerly called Monks-hall; and converted them to the use of the university, by the name of Buckingham hall. It has been remarked, that the founder's name is contained in the word M-audley-n, which is the orthography of Magdalen, according to the vulgar pronunciation. A fellowship of a considerable value has lately been founded at this college, which is appropriated to gentlemen of the county of Norfolk, and called the Travelling Norfolk Fellowship. To the library of this college were left a valuable collection of pamphlets, by —Pepys, esq; and likewise a great number of papers relating to the navy and admiralty; and with them he bequeathed the presses, which are carefully preserved to this day.

This college was considerably enlarged, and its revenue increased by Sir Christopher Wrey, who was some time afterwards lord chief justice of England. A new building was begun some years ago, to be added to this college, but was never finished. It stands on the north west side of the river, separated from all the rest; and now maintains a master, thirteen fellows and thirteen scholars.

16. Sidney Sussex College. This was founded in the year 1589, the thirty-first of Elizabeth, pursuant to the will of the lady Frances Sidney, countess of Sussex, who bequeathed five thousand pounds for the building and endowing this college, for the maintenance of a master, ten fellows, and twenty scholars, to be called by the name it now bears.

In consequence of this will, a college was soon after built by the countess's executors, upon the spot where a monastery of Franciscans, commonly called Grey-friars, built by king Edward I. had formerly flourished; but the generous gift of this lady was insufficient to fulfil her good intentions; the deficiency, however, was so far supplied by the liberality of her executors, Henry Grey, earl of Kent, and John lord Harington, that it immediately received a master, eight fellows, and twenty scholars. Sir Francis Clerk was afterwards a great benefactor to this college; he not only made a considerable addition to the building, but likewise augmented the scholarships, by founding four fellowships, and eight scholarships more; and Sir John Brereton left it, by will, two thousand pounds. It now maintains a master, twelve fellows, and twenty-eight scholars.

There are four hundred and six fellows, and six hundred and sixty scholars, besides which, there are two hundred and thirty-six inferior officers and servants of various kinds; these are all maintained upon the foundation. The whole number of students belonging to the university, are not, however here included: there are two sorts of students, called pensioners, the greater, and the less; the greater pensioners are in general the young nobility, and are called fellow commoners; because, though they are scholars, they dine with the fellows: the less, called commoners, are dieted with the scholars, but both live at their own expence. There are also a considerable number of poor scholars, called Sizar, who wait upon the fellows, scholars, and pensioners of both ranks, by whom they are in a great degree maintained; but the number of these it is impossible to ascertain, being in a state of perpetual fluctuation.

By a special grant of Henry VI. the university has the privilege of printing books of every kind at their own press.

Originally the schools of this university were in private houses, hired from ten years to ten years for that purpose, by the university; in which time they might not be put to any other use. Afterwards public schools were built at the charge of the university, in or near the place where they now stand; but the present fabric, as it is now built of brick and rough stone, was erected partly at the expence of the university, and partly by the contributions of several benefactors.

The university library was first built by Rotherham, archbishop of York, who, with Tostal bishop of Durham, furnished it with choice books, few whereof are to be found at present: but it contained, nevertheless, about fourteen thousand books, when his late majesty king George

George I. was graciously pleased, in the beginning of his reign, to purchase the large and curious library of doctor John More, bishop of Ely, who died on the thirtieth of July, 1714; and, as a mark of his royal favour, to bestow it upon this university.

Great additions and alterations have been lately made in the library, for the better disposition of this valuable royal present, which consisted of upwards of thirty thousand volumes, and cost the king six thousand guineas. And we cannot but observe, in this place, that the late lord viscount Townshend, having understood that the university, to shew their gratitude, and do honour to the memory of his late majesty king George I. intended to erect a statue of that monarch, was pleased to offer to cause the same to be carved, and set up in the said library at his own expence; which generous tender was received by the university in the manner it deserved, and with circumstances equally to their own and his lordship's honour. And in the month of October 1739, in pursuance thereof, a fine marble statue of this great prince was accordingly erected in the senate-hall of King's college: on which are the following inscriptions, viz.

On the front:

GEORGIO
Optimo principi,
Magnæ Britanniæ regi,
Ob insignia ejus in hanc academiam

His majesty not contented with having given this noble instance of his royal bounty to the university of Cambridge, in the year 1724, was graciously pleased to confer another mark of his favour upon them, and which extended to the university of Oxford; in creating a new establishment in a most useful branch of learning, which was much wanted, and for which, till that time, there had been no provision: this was to appoint two persons, not under the degree of master of arts, or bachelor of laws, skilled in modern history, and in the knowledge of modern languages to be nominated King's Professors of Modern History, one for the university of Cambridge, and the other for that of Oxford; who are obliged to read lectures in the public schools, at particular times; each of which professors to have a stipend of four hundred pounds per annum, out of which each professor is obliged to maintain, with sufficient salaries, two persons at least, well qualified to teach and instruct in writing and speaking the said languages, gratis, twenty scholars of each university, to be nominated by the king, each of which is obliged to learn two, at least, of the said languages.

The same beneficent king, was also pleased to appoint twelve persons, chosen out of each of the universities, to be preachers in the royal chapel of Whitehall, at stated times, with handsome salaries; and declared, that he would cause a particular regard to be had to the members of the two universities, in the dispositions of those benefices which fell into the royal gift.

Within these few years past there have been several other benefactors to this university, particularly the two following.

Doctor John Woodward, who died on the twenty-fifth of April 1728, left to the university of Cambridge a sum of money for erecting a professorship for natural philosophy, with a provision of one hundred and fifty pounds per annum for the support and maintenance of the same for ever.

He

He likewise bequeathed to the said university his collection of fossils, and other natural curiosities; and such a part of his library, moreover, as was necessary to illustrate his said collection.

On the death of Mrs. Addenbroke, (March 1720) widow of an eminent physician of that name, the sum of about four thousand pounds devolved to this university; which, by the doctor's will, were to be applied to the building and furnishing a physical hospital in Cambridge, in which poor diseased people were to be admitted for cure, gratis. The master and fellows of Catharine-hall were appointed trustees of this charity.

On the south side of the senate-house, opposite to the statue of George I. is another noble statue of George II. erected by the late duke of Newcastle, then chancellor of the university. On the front of the pedestal is the following inscription:

GEORGIO SECUNDO
Patrono suo, optime merenti,
Semper venerando;
Quod volenti populo,
Institissimè humanissime,
In pace, & in bello.
Feliciter imperavit;
Quod academiam Cantabrigiensē

Hanc statuam
Ætæurnum faxit Deus, monumentum,
Grati animi in regem,
Pietatis in patriam,
Amoris in academium,
Suis sumptibus, poni curavit,
THOMAS HOLLES
Dux de Newcastle.
Academix Cancellarius,
A.D. M.DCC.LXVI.

Cambridge was a fortified town in the time of the Saxons; and being afterwards seized by the Danes, they kept a garrison there till the year 921, when they were driven out by Edward the elder. Towards the end of the eleventh century, William the Conqueror built a castle here, which is said to have been a large, strong, and stately building; some traces of it are still to be seen, and the gate, which remains entire, is now the county goal. In the succeeding reign of William Rufus, the town was burnt by Roger de Montgomery, to revenge a supposed injury he had received from the king; but Henry I. the successor of Rufus, rebuilt it, and made it a corporation. During the civil contentions, called the Barons Wars, which happened in the twelfth century, it was often ravaged by outlaws, who took refuge in the isle of Ely; but king Henry III. about the year 1219, secured it against these incursions, by a deep trench, which in Camden's time was called the King's-ditch; but houses having been since built on both sides of it, the name was at length forgotten.

In the reign of Richard II. near the end of the fourteenth century, during the insurrection of Wat Tyler and Jack Straw, a rebellious rabble entered this town, and burnt the records of the university in the market-place. The round church in this town is thought to have been a synagogue of the Jews, who having been invited hither by the Conqueror and his successors, settled here, and were very numerous for many generations, and inhabited all that part of the town which is now called the Jewry.

Cambridge sends four members to parliament, two for the town, and two for the university. It has two weekly markets, on Wednesday and Saturday; and an annual fair on the twenty-fourth of June, for horses, wood and earthen ware.

O X F O R D.

The city of Oxford is finely situated at the conflux of the Thames and Cherwell, fifty-five miles from London. It stands on a rising ground, the ascent of which is so gradual, as hardly to be perceived, and in the midst of a most beautiful extent of meadows to the south, east and west, and of corn fields to the north. The vales on the east are watered by the river Cherwell, and those of the west and south by the main stream, and several branches of the Isis. The landscape is bounded on every side, the north excepted, by a range of hills covered with woods. The opening to the north admits a free current of fresh air, and entirely removes all the inconveniences which would otherwise arise from the noxious vapours of a watery situation. From some of the surrounding hills, the traveller is surprized with an unparalleled prospect of plenty; of numerous spires, domes and turrets, with the combined charms verdure, water and trees. The soil is a fine gravel; and on the whole the situation is more agreeable than healthy.

The government of Oxford is vested in a mayor, a high steward, a recorder, four aldermen, eight assistants, two bailiffs, a town clerk, two chamberlains, all that have served the office of bailiff and chamberlain, and twenty-four common-council-men. The mayor for the time being officiates at the coronation of our kings, in the buttery, and receives a large gilt bowl and cover for his fee.

The magistracy of this city is subject to the chancellor or vice chancellor of the university, in all affairs of moment, even those relating to the city; and the vice-chancellor administers annually an oath to the magistrates and sheriffs, that they will maintain the privileges of the university. The mayor, and sixty-two of the chief citizens also pay each one penny every year on the tenth of February, at the church of St. Mary, in lieu of a heavy fine laid on the city in the reign of Edward III. when sixty-two of the students were murdered by the inhabitants.

The private buildings of this city are neat, and the public ones sumptuous. The streets are spacious, clean and regular, and well supplied with water by an engine erected on the river Isis.

Besides the cathedral here are fourteen parish churches, viz. St. Clement's—St. John's—St. Thomas's—St. Giles's—Holiwell's—St. Peter's in the East—St. Mary Magdalen's—St. Michael's—St. Peter's in the Bailey—St. Ebb's—St. Aldate's, or St Old's—St. Martin's or Carfax—All Saints—St. Mary's. Only four of these churches are worthy of observation, viz. St. Mary's, All Saints, St. Peters, and St. John's.

The church of St. Mary, in which the public sermons of the university are preached on Sundays and holidays, is situated about the middle of the north side of the High-street. It was rebuilt in the reign of Henry VII. as it appears at present. It consists of three isles, with a spacious choir or chancel, which is separated from the nave by an organ, with its gallery, originally made by Father Smith, and since improved by Mr. John Byfield. The pulpit is placed in the centre of the middle isle. At the west end of the same isle is situated the vice-chancellor's throne, at the foot of which are seated the two proctors. The seats which descend on either side, are appointed for the doctors and heads of houses, and those beneath for the young noblemen. The area consists of benches for the masters of arts. On the west end, with a return to the north and south, are galleries for the under-graduates and bachelors of arts. The tower, with its spire, is a noble and beautiful fabric, one hundred and eighty feet in height, and richly ornamented with pinnacles, niches and statues, which it is said were added by King, the first bishop of Oxford, in the reign of Henry VIII. It contains six remarkably large bells, by which the proper notice is given for scholastic exercises, convocations and congregations. On the south side is a portal, of more modern structure, erected by doctor Morgan, chaplain to archbishop Laud, in the year 1637.

The church of All Saints, which is likewise situated in the High street, is an elegant modern structure, much in the stile of many of the new churches in London. It is beautified both within and without, with Corinthian pilasters, and finished with an attic story and balustrade. There is one pillar in the church which is seventy-two feet long, forty-two wide, and fifty in height. The ceiling, altar, pulpit, &c. are finely executed; and the steeple is remarkable, in the modern taste.

St. Peter in the East, which stands near the High-street, was partly built by St. Grymbald eight hundred years ago; and is said to be the first church of stone that appeared in this part of England. The tower and east end are curious pieces of antiquity. This was formerly the university church; and even at present, in order to ascertain their original claim, the university attend their sermons in it every Sunday in the afternoon during lent.

The church of St. John, which is also a chapel to Merton college, is an august Gothic edifice, with a tower, in which are eight bells. Its choir, or inner chapel is the longest of any in the university, that of New college excepted. It had once an organ, yet without any regular institution for choir service, before the present stalls and wainscot were put up. The painted glass of the east window is very elegant and of a modern hand. The anti-chapel is proportionally spacious, and was originally much larger; for if we examine the outside of the church, towards the west, we may perceive the arches filled up, which once stood within, and made part of the nave. Near the altar are the monuments of Sir Thomas Bodly, and Sir Henry Saville. On the right hand of the choir door is that of the late warden, doctor Wintle, and his sister, which is neatly executed; and not far from the north door of the anti-chapel, is a bust and inscription to the memory of Anthony Wood. This church, as we are informed by a manuscript of Wood's, was built about the year 1424, but it does not appear by what benefactor.

In the centre of the city is a curious structure, called Carfax conduit, erected by Otho Nicholson in the reign of James I.

The town-hall, situated in Fish-street is a neat and commodious structure, erected partly at the expence of the late Thomas Rowney, esq; sometime representative and high steward of this city.

Here is a stone bridge over the Cherwell, called Magdanel-bridge, six hundred feet in length, and consisting of twenty arches. In the western suburb is another bridge, called High-bridge, over a branch of the Thames; and near it is another very fine stone bridge now building over the same stream, for the convenience of a new road now making there. Besides these, there is another bridge over the Thames, at the extremity of Fish-street, and called Folly-bridge. It is also of stone, and consists of three principal arches. On the centre of this bridge is an ancient tower, called Friar Bacon's study, under which is the road to Abingdon.

Adjoining to the city is an hospital, elegantly built of hewn stone, upon the plan of the county hospital at Gloucester. This edifice was erected by the trustees of doctor Radcliffe's benefaction, out of the surplus money remaining after defraying the expence of his library. The ground was given by Thomas Rowney, esq; abovementioned. The building was begun in May 1759, and prosecuted with remarkable expedition. It is now finished, and calculated to hold seventy patients.

Among the various public buildings which claim our attention in this place (exclusive of the colleges and halls) is one called the New, or Radclivian library, from its founder doctor John Radcliffe, a physician of great eminence, who left forty thousand pounds to build a library for the use of the university, with a salary of one hundred and fifty pounds a year to a librarian, and the like sum towards furnishing the library with new books. In consequence of this legacy, the first stone of the building was laid the seventeenth of May 1737, and the library was opened with great solemnity on the thirteenth of April, 1745, by the name of the New, or Radcliffian library.

This beautiful building is situated in the centre of a large square, formed by St. Mary's church, the public schools, and two colleges, one called Brazen Nose, and the other All Souls. It is a very sumptuous pile of building, erected upon arcades, which, circularly disposed, enclose a spacious doorn in the centre. From hence we pass by a well executed flight of spiral steps into the library itself. This room, which is a complete pattern of elegance and majesty, rises into a capacious cious dome, ornamented with fine compartments of stucco. The pavement is of two colours, and made of a peculiar species of stone brought from Hartz Forest in Germany. The room is enclosed by a circular series of arches, beautified with festoons, and supported by pilasters of the Ionic order. Behind these arches are formed two circular galleries, above and below, where the books are disposed in elegant cabinets. The compartments of the ceiling, in the upper gallery, are finely stuccoed. Over the door, at the entrance, is a statue of the founder, doctor Radcliff, by Rysbrac, which is most advantageously viewed from the point opposite to it, in the last mentioned gallery. Over the entrance of one of the galleries is a good bust of Gibbes, the architect. In a word, the finishing and decorations of this attic edifice are all in the most elegant taste.

The schools form a magnificent quadrangle. The principal front on the outside is about one hundred and seventy-five feet in length; in the centre of which is a noble tower, whose highest apartments are appointed for astronomical observations, and other philosophical experiments. Three sides of the upper story of the quadrangle are one entire room, called the picture gallery, the north side of which is one hundred and twenty-nine feet six inches; the east side one hundred and fifty-eight feet six inches; and the breadth twenty-four feet six inches. This is chiefly furnished with valuable portraits of founders and benefactors, and of other eminent men; also with cabinets of medals, and cases of books. It was wainscoted by the munificence of doctor Butler, the late president of Magdalen college, and the late duke of Beaufort.

Under the picture gallery are the schools of the several sciences, in one of which are placed the Arundelian marbles, and in another that inestimable collection of statues, &c. lately presented to the university by the countess of Pomfret. The first stone of the schools was laid the thirtieth of March 1613, and the building was carried on at the combined expence of many benefactors.

The Bodleian or public library is a part or member of the last-mentioned edifice. It consists of three spacious and lofty rooms, disposed in the form of the roman H. The middle room was erected by Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, over the divinity school, about the year 1440, and by him furnished with books, all which have been since lost. The gallery on the west side was raised at the expence of the university, under the chancellorship of archbishop Laud, together with the convocation house beneath. The vestibule, or first gallery, with the proscholium under it, was built by Sir Thomas Bodley, who furnished the whole with a collection made with prodigious care and expence. He likewise assigned an estate for the maintenance of a librarian, &c. and the support of a public fund for the library, adding a body of statutes, for the regulation of his new institution. By these services he justly deserved the name of the founder of the library.

The original stock has been greatly enriched by the accession of many valuable collections of manuscripts, particularly Greek and Oriental; besides large additions of choice and useful books, from various donations. The principal benefactors have been the earl of Pembroke, archbishop Laud, Sir Thomas Roe, Sir Kenelm Digby, general Fairfax, doctor Marshall, doctor Barlow, doctor Rawlinson, Mr. St. Amand, &c.

The divinity school stands under the same roof with the Bodleian library. It was begun at the expence of the university in the year 1427, and afterwards completed, with its superstructure, by duke Humphrey. Its ceiling is a most finished piece of Gothic masonry, both in design and execution; and, on the whole, it is probably the most Gothic room in this kingdom. At the end of it is the convocation house, which is a spacious room, commodiously furnished, and handsomely decorated.

Directly opposite to the divinity school is the theatre, a beautiful structure erected from a design of Sir Christopher Wren, in the year 1669, at the expence of archbishop Sheldon, at that time chancellor, who having bestowed fifteen thousand pounds in building it, endowed it with two thousand pounds to purchase lands for its perpetual repair.

The front of this building is adorned with Corinthian pillars, and two statues of archbishop Sheldon, and the duke of Ormond, with other decorations. At the entrance of the theatre the spectator is strongly and suddenly struck with the ideas of majesty and beauty: but this room exhibits the most august appearance when properly filled. It is equally disposed to contain, and shew to advantage, a large and solemn assembly. The vice-chancellor, with the two proctors, are seated in the centre of the semi-circular part; on each hand are the young noblemen and doctors; the masters of arts in the area: the rest of the university, and strangers of both sexes, are placed in the galleries. The roof is flat, and not being supported either by columns or arch-work, rests on the side walls, which are at the distance of eighty feet one way, and seventy the other. The roof is covered with an allegorical painting, which consists of a great number of figures. The first of these is Theology, with her book of seven seals imploring the assistance of Truth for the unfolding of it. On the left hand is the Mosaic law veiled, with the table of stone, to which she points with her iron rod. On her right hand is the Gospel, with the cross in one hand, and a chalice in the other.

In the same division, over the Mosaic law, is History holding up her pen, as dedicating it to Truth, and an attending Genius, with several fragments of old writings, from which she collects her history into her book. On the other side near the Gospel, is Divine Poesy, with her harp of David's fashion.

In the triangle on the right hand of the Gospel, is also Logic, in a posture of arguing; and on the left hand of the Mosaic law is Music, with her antic lyre, having a pen in her hand, and a paper of music notes on her knee, with a Genius on her right hand playing on a flute, being the emblem of ancient music. On the left (but within the the partition for phycic) Dramatic Poesy, with a vizard, representing Comedy, a bloody dagger for Tragedy, and the reed pipe for Pastoral.

In the square on the right side of the circle, is Law, with her ruling sceptre, accompanied with records, patents and evidences, on the one side, and on the other with Rhetoric. By these is an attending Genius, with the scales of Justice, and a figure with a palm branch, the emblem of reward for virtuous actions; And the Roman Fates, the marks of power and punishment.

Printing, with a case of letters in one hand, and a form ready set in the other, and by her several sheets hanging as a drying.

On the left side the circle, opposite to Theology, in three squares, are the Mathematical Sciences, (depending on Demonstration, as the other on Faith) in the first of which is Astronomy with the celestial globe, Geography with the terrestrial, together with three attending Genii, having Arithmetic in the square on one hand, with a paper of figures; Optics with the perspective glass; Geometry with a pair of compasses in her left; and a table with geometrical figures in it, in her right hand. And in the square on the other hand, Architecture embracing the capital of a column, with compasses, and the Norma or square lying by her, and a workman holding another square in one hand, and a plumb line in the other.

In the midst of these squares and triangles (as descending from above) is the figure of Truth sitting as on a cloud, in one hand holding a palm-branch (the emblem of victory) in the other the sun, whose brightness enlightens the whole circle of figures, and is so bright, that it seems to hide the face of herself to the spectators below.

Over the entrance of the front of the Theatre, are three figures tumbling down; the first, Envy, with her snaky hairs, squint eyes, hag's breast, pale venomous complexion, strong, but ugly limbs, and riveled skin, frighted from above by the sight of the shield of Pallas, with the Gorgon's head in it, against which she opposes her snaky tresses, but her fall is so precipitous, that she has no command of her arms.

Then Rapine, with her fiery eyes, grinning teeth, sharp twangs, her hands imbrued with blood, holding a bloody dagger in one hand, in the other a burning flambeaux; with these instruments threatening the destruction of Learning, and all its habitations, but is prevented by an Herculan Genius, or Power.

Next that is represented brutish, scoffing Ignorance, endeavouring to vilify and contemn what she understands not, which is charmed by a Mercurial Genius with his Caduceus.

The allegorical pictures on the ceiling, above explained, were done by Streater, serjeant painter to king Charles II. but the colours as well as the canvas, having been greatly injured by Time, the work was cleaned and repaired in 1762, by Mr. Kettle, an ingenious portrait painter of London; at which time the whole inside was all decorated with new gilding, painting, and other ornaments, at the expence of one thousand pounds; so that this is now universally allowed to be the most superb and splendid room in Europe.

This room is also furnished with three admirable full length portraits, of archbishop Sheldon, the duke of Ormond, and Sir Christopher Wren.

To the west of the theatre stands the Ashmolean Museum, so called from its founder, Elias Ashmole, esq; Windsor Herald in the reign of Charles II. This munificent patron of learning, in the year 1677, made an offer to bestow upon the university all the rarities he had purchased from the two Tradescants, successively phycic gardeners at Lambeth; together with his own collection of coins, manuscripts, &c. on condition that they should build a fabric for their reception. The building was accordingly erected, and finished in the year 1682, under the conduct of Sir Christopher Wren. It is not inferior to any modern edifice in point of symmetry and elegance. Its front towards the street is about sixty feet in length. The eastern portico is remarkably well finished in the Corinthian order, and adorned with variety of characteristical embellishments. This piece of architecture is deservedly reckoned equal to any in the university; though, like many others, it is so much crowded by the neighbouring buildings, that the spectator cannot view it to proper advantage.

Agreeable to his promise, Ashmole presented to the university a large and valuable collection of natural bodies, together with his coins and manuscripts; he also bequeathed at his death three gold chains, one of philigrain work, consisting of sixty links, weighing twenty-two ounces, with a medal of the duke of Brandenburg; the other a collar of S's, with a medal of the king of Denmark; and the third a chain of equal weight and value, with a medal of the emperor Joseph; all which he had received as honorary presents on occasion of his book concerning the order of the garter.

Since the first foundation of this museum, it has been greatly enriched by several ample and valuable benefactions. The chief natural curiosities are, a large collection of bodies, horns, bones, &c. of animals, preserved dry, or in spirits; numerous specimens of minerals and metals; shells, especially those of doctor Martin Lister, together with his ores, fossils, &c.

It likewise contains a small, but well chosen collection of exotic plants, sent from the East Indies by James Pound, M. B. But it has been chiefly indebted to the care and munificence of its two first keepers, doctor Robert Plott, and Mr. Edward Lhwyd; the former of which gave all the natural bodies mentioned in histories of the counties of Stafford and Oxon, and the latter the large collections he had made in his travels through the greatest part of England, Wales, and Ireland. A catalogue of many of these was published by himself, elegantly adorned with copperplates, in the year 1699, under the title of Lithophylacii Britannici Ichnographia. To these valuable treasures a great addition has lately been made by the reverend William Borlase, who presented to the university all the specimens of crystals, stals, mundicks, coppers, tins, &c. described in his Natural History of Cornwall; which present he also accompanied with his manuscript copy of the history, and the original drawings.

Amongst the curiosities of nature must be reckoned the large magnet given to the Museum by the right honourable the countess of Westmoreland, the lady of our late chancellor. It is of an oval shape, its longer diameter eighteen inches, its shorter twelve, and supports a weight of one hundred and forty-five pounds. It is enclosed in an elegant case of mahogany, made at his lordship's expence, and may justly be deemed one of the greatest ornaments, as well as rarities of this place.

Here is also a good collection of antiquities; such as urns, statues, sacrificial vessels and utensils; likewise many Grecian, Roman, and Saxon coins, the gift of the founder, and Thomas Brathwaite, esq.

Amongst the works of art, a model of a ship given by doctor Clark, and a picture representing our Saviour going to his crucifixion, made of feathers, deserve particular notice; also a very ancient piece of St. Cuthbert, made by order of king Alfred, and worn, as is supposed, by that monarch.—This structure is also decorated with a great number of very curious paintings, executed by the best hands.

Besides the room in which the curiosities are deposited, there are three small libraries; the first called by the name of Ashmole's study, containing his printed books and manuscripts chiefly relating to matters of heraldry and antiquity; in which also are the manuscripts of Sir William Dugdale, author of the Monasticon, &c.

The second is that of doctor Lister, consisting of printed books in physic, and the best editions of the classics, in which also are preserved the copper plates belonging to the History of Shells, published by that author.

The last is that of Anthony Wood, containing the valuable manuscript collections of that learned and laborious antiquarian.

In the room on the first floor, lectures are read in experimental philosophy. Underneath is an elaboratory for courses of chemistry and anatomy.

The care and direction of the Museum is vested in six visitors, viz. the vice-chancellor, the dean of Christ-church, the principal of Brazen Nose, the king's professor of physic, and the two proctors for the time being. These have the nomination of the head keeper, and meet annually on Trinity Monday, to inspect the state of the collection, and to pass the accounts. Ashmole designed to have endowed his foundation with ample revenues, and has in his statutes expressed the sums appointed for this purpose, namely fifty pounds per annum for the head keeper, fifteen pounds to the librarian, and five pounds for an assistant; but this generous intention was never put into execution; so that the profits at present arise only from the gratuities given by strangers for the exhibition of the curiosities, which fall greatly short of the original design.

Nearly adjoining to the Theatre is the Clarendon Printing-house, a very handsome building, erected in the year 1711, by the profits that arose from the sale of lord Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, the copy of which had been presented to the university by his sons, the lords Clarendon and Rochester. It is a magnificent structure, consisting of two stories, and is one hundred and fifteen feet in length. The street front has a noble Doric portico, whose columns equal the height of the first story. The back front is adorned with three quarter columns of the same dimensions, and a statue of the earl of Clarendon. Over the top of the building are statues of the nine Muses. On the right hand are two rooms where bibles and books of common prayer are printed; and over these are large and elegant apartments, containing several excellent pictures, with a kitchen and other domestic accommodations, under the whole. The left side consists of rooms for the university press, together with one well executed apartment, adorned with an excellent portrait of queen Anne, by Kneller; appointed for the meetings of the heads of houses, and delegates.

To the south of Magdalen college is the physic garden, the grand entrance to which is of the Doric order, and ornamented with rustic work. It is moreover adorned with a bust of the founder, lord Danby, a statue of Charles I. and another of Charles II. On the face of the Corona and the frieze is the following inscription: "Gloriæ Dei optimi maximi honori Caroli I. regis in usum academici et reipublicæ Henricus comes Danby, anno 1632." The same inscription is on the garden front.

The garden, which is five acres in circumference, is surrounded by a noble wall, with other portraits in the rustic style, at proper distances. The ground is divided into four quarters. On the right and left, at our entrance, are two neat and convenient green-houses, stocked with a valuable collection of exotics. The quarters are filled with a compleat series of such plants as grow naturally, disposed in their respective classes. Without the walls on the east, is an admirable hot house, where various plants, brought from the warmer climates, are raised. Of these the chief are, the pine-apple, the plantain, the coffee-shrub, the caper-tree, the cinnamon, the creeping Cereus, &c.

This garden was instituted by the earl of Danby, above-mentioned, in the year 1632; who having replenished it with plants for the use of students in botany, settled an annual revenue for its support. It has been since much improved by doctor Sherrard, who erected the edifice which is seen on the left, at entering the garden, and furnished it with an useful collection of botanical books. He likewise assigned three thousand pounds for the maintenance of a professor of botany; for whose lodgings some apartments in the building just mentioned have been appointed.

Having thus described the principal public buildings in this city, we shall now proceed to the several colleges and halls, which constitute the university of Oxford. The first of these is University College. This is allowed to be the most ancient college in Oxford; and some writers assert that it was a mansion for scholars long before the time of king Alfred, (who is supposed to have founded it) and that St. John de Beverley, who died in 721, received his education here.

In the reign of king Edward, this college or hall was sacked and burnt, together with the city, by the Danes; and they were scarcely rebuilt, when king Harold, who succeeded to the crown in 1036, being much incensed against this place, for the murder of some of his friends, in a tumult, banished the scholars from their studies. By an edict of Edward the Confessor, the scholars were however restored to their ancient pensions and habitations; but William the Conqueror being desirous to abolish the English tongue, and therefore unwilling to have the doctrines of the church any longer preached in it, was vigorously opposed by the clergy and scholars of Oxford, upon which he retracted the stipends originally granted them, and the scholars were thus reduced to live on charitable contributions, till the college was a second time endowed.

According to some writers, this college, at the time of the conquest, was let out to the scholars by the citizens, into whose possession it is supposed to have come during the Danish wars; but this circumstance is by no means probable, since the edict of Edward the Confessor restored the scholars to their ancient privileges. However, it is certain, that for some time before the reign of Henry III. the scholars rented the college of the citizens. By what means it became the property of the city, does not appear; but such was the city's right to this college, that it had power to sell it, and it was actually bought of the city by William, archdeacon of Durham, who died in 1249; and by his last will and testament, bequeathed it to the students, and endowed it with three hundred and ten marks, for the maintenance of ten or twelve scholars.

The front of this building is extended upwards of two hundred and sixty feet along the south side of the High-street. In it, at due distances, are two stately portals, with a tower over each. That on the west leads into the old court, which is a handsome Gothic quadrangle, of one hundred feet square. Over the gate at the entrance, on the outside, is a statue of queen Anne, and within another of James II. Over the eastern entrance, on the outside, is also an admirable statue of queen Mary, wife of William III. On the south of the western quadrangle are the chapel and hall. The statue of St. Cuthbert is over the gate of the chapel, and that of Alfred at the entrance of the hall. The altar window was given by doctor Radcliffe, as appears by its inscription, in the year 1687. The roof of the chapel is a well-wrought frame of Norway oak. The hall has been lately fitted up in a very beautiful Gothic style, at the expence of many generous contributions, and is a most complete room of the kind.

From this court, through a narrow passage on the east, you are led into another area of three sides. It is opened to a garden on the south. The east, and part of the north side, is taken up by the lodgings of the master, which are commodious and extensive. In a nich over the gate on the north, is a statue of doctor Radcliffe.

A society being thus established, many other benefactors afterwards appeared, who improved the revenues and buildings. Of these the most considerable are, Walter Skirlow, bishop of Durham, who founded three fellowships. Henry Piercy earl of Northumberland, in the year 1443, added the same number; and Sir Simon Bennet, in the reign of Charles I. established four fellowships, and four scholarships.

The present magnificent building was begun to be erected in the year 1624, by the benefaction of Charles Greenwood, formerly fellow, and was soon carried on by Sir Simon Bennet, above-mentioned. Nor were succeeding patrons wanting to continue so noble a work, till it was finally completed by doctor John Radcliffe, who erected the whole eastern quadrangle entirely at his own expence. He likewise settled on the college six hundred pounds a year for two travelling fellowships.

The present society consists of a master, twelve fellows seventeen scholars, with many other students, amounting in the whole to near seventy.

Baliol College. The foundation of this college was projected by Sir John Baliol of Bernard castle in Yorkshire, knight, father of John Baliol, king of Scotland, who settled some yearly exhibitions upon certain poor scholars, till he could provide a house and other accommodations for them; but dying in 1269, his widow, Devorgilla, having been requested by him to complete his design, hired of the university a house in a street, then called Horse-manger-street, but now Canditch, in which she placed her exhibitioners, consisting of a principal and sixteen fellows, and prescribed statutes for their government in 1282. Afterwards in 1284, she purchased another tenement, called St. Mary's-hall, which she rebuilt, and to which the society was removed by her charter, giving it the name of Baliol College.

This college has a handsome Gothic gateway, that leads into the first court, part of which is finished in the style in which it is intended to rebuild the whole college. On the north is the chapel, which was erected about the reign of Henry VIII. It is adorned with some beautiful pieces of painted glass, particularly the east window which represents the passion, resurrection, and ascension of Our Saviour; and for which Nicholas Wadham offered two hundred pounds.

This hall is handsomely wainscotted. In the master's lodgings is a spacious old apartment, whose beautiful bow window projects on the west side of the court, and which was formerly the college chapel. In the library which was finished about the year 1477, are many curious manuscripts. Besides this court, there is an area to the north west, consisting of irregular and detached lodgings. But an elegant front is now building by this court, a benefaction of three thousand pounds having been lately received for that purpose.

The principal benefactors are, Philip Somerville, Thomas Stanhope, Peter Blundell, lady Periam with several others.

John Warner, bishop of Rochester, in the year year 1666, founded four exhibitions for natives of Scotland, whose benefaction was since enlarged by John Snell, esq.

Here is one master, twelve fellows, and eighteen exhibitioners. The whole number of the society amounts to about fifty.

Merton College. Walter de Merton, lord high chancellor of England in the reign of Henry III. and afterwards bishop of Rochester, first founded and endowed a college of twenty poor scholars, and two or three chaplains, at Malden, near Kingston in Surry, in the year 1261; but because the liberal arts were taught only in the universities, and he was not willing that his students should be ignorant in them, he translated this society to a building he erected for them in St. John's-street at Oxford in 1267, prescribed a body of statutes for them in 1274, and gave the college the name of "Domus Scholarium de Merton."

This college is separated from that of Corpus Christi, towards the west by a small grove of elms. The most striking object in the first court is the east window of the chapel, the construction of which is a fine piece of Gothic workmanship. From this court, by a flight of steps, you enter the hall, which is large and lofty, but has nothing particularly remarkable, except the wainscot over the high table, which appears by a date engraved upon it, in figures of an antique form, to have been erected in the year 1554.

The new or second quadrangle was erected in the year 1610, from whose apartments on the south, there is a beautiful prospect over the meadows. The terrace formed on the city wall, in the garden of this college, is no less finely situated for a delightful view; and the gardens in general have a pleasing variety.

Among the various benefactors to this society, the most remarkable are, Henry Sever and Richard Fitz-James, formerly wardens; and doctor John Wyllyott, chancellor of the church of Exeter, who gave exhibitions for the maintenance of twelve Portionists, called Post-masters, in the year 1380. These were afterwards encreased to fourteen, by John Chambers, who directed that his two additional exhibitioners should be elected from Eaton school. Four scholarships have been likewise since founded by Mr. Henry Jackson late of this house.

At present the society consists of a warden, twenty-four scholars, fourteen post-masters, four scholars, two chaplains, and two clerks. The number of members of each sort is upwards of seventy.

Exeter College. The society belonging to this college was instituted by Walter Stapledon, bishop of Exeter in the year 1314; but he not liking the then situation translated the society to this building, which was at first called Stapledon Inn, but afterwards the name it now bears.

This college is situated on the left side within the Turl from the north. In the center of the front, which is two hundred and twenty feet in length, is a beautiful gate of rustic work: over it is a tower adorned with Ionic pilasters, supporting a semicircular pediment, in the area of which are the arms of the founder on a shield surrounded with festoons; and the whole is finished by a light balustrade.

On the south of the college is the hall, which is long and lofty, and adorned with portraits. It was entirely built from the ground by Sir John Ackland, knight, of Devonshire in the year 1618. On the north is the chapel, which consists of two isles, and was erected by doctor Hakewell, formerly rector, in the year 1624.

The original entrance into this college was through the tower which appears on the north east angle of the court, and for which a postern in the city wall was opened. Near or about this tower the old college seems to have stood, part of which still remains adjoining to the tower on either side, that on the east being the most ancient, erected in the year 1404, and that on the west, viz. the rectors lodgings, together with the tower itself, in the year 1432. Ancient, however, as these remains are, yet they are still more modern than any part of the founder's original structure, no remains of which are to be seen at present, except a part of the chapel, since converted into the library.

This college consists at present of one rector, twenty-five fellows, and a bible clerk, with two exhibitioners. The number of the students is about fifty.

Oriel College. The original foundation of this college is ascribed to king Edward II. in 1324; but it does not appear that he contributed any farther than granting a licence to Adam le Brome, his almoner, in that year, to build and endow a college here, by the name of St. Mary's-hall. To this society king Edward III. in the first year of his reign, gave a large building in Oxford, called le Oriel, to which the fellows removing from St. Mary's-hall, this was called Oriel College.

It is situated southward of St. Mary's church, on the north side of the front of Corpus Christi college, its great gate being almost opposite to the back gate of Christ-church. Its quadrangle, which was erected in the year 1640, is uniform and decent. The north side consists of the provost's lodgings, and the library; the east of the hall, buttery, and vestibule of the chapel, which runs eastward from thence; and the south and west sides form the common apartment. The ascent to the hall is by a large flight of steps, covered with a proportionable portico. It is handsomely wainscotted in the Doric style, and decorated at the upper end with a portrait of Edward II. dressed in his regalia, by Hudson; one of queen Anne, who annexed a prebend of Rochester to the provostship, by Dahl; and another of the late duke of Beaufort, who is represented erect, in his parliament robes, attended by a negro boy bearing a coronet, by Soldi. The chapel has that beauty belonging to it which is derived from a decent simplicity, and was finished in the year 1642. The window over the altar has been lately painted with the Wise Men's Offering, by Mr. Pakett of York.

The library consists of half the upper story of the north side of this quadrangle, and is a neat, well furnished room. The garden-court which is entered by a passage in the same north side, receives ceives an agreeable air from an elegant little garden which is formed in the midst of it, and fenced on this side with iron gates, and pallisades, supported by a dwarf wall and stone piers. The sides are two wings, in a style correspondent to that of the quadrangle. That on the right was erected by doctor Robinson, bishop of London; and that on the left, by doctor Carter, formerly provost.

The principal benefactor to this building was doctor John Tolson, when provost, who, besides other valuable donations, gave 1150l. for that purpose. Doctor Robinson, bishop of London, also gave 2500l. for augmenting the fellowships.

The members of this college consist at present of one provost, eighteen fellows, and about fourteen exhibitioners. The students amount to near eighty.

Queen's College. This college received its name from queen Philippa, consort of king Edward III. at whose instigation Robert Eglesfield, a bachelor of divinity in this university, in the year 1340, purchased certain houses in the parish of St. Peter in the East, in the city of Oxford, which he converted into a collegiate hall, by the name of "Aula Scholarium Reginae de Oxon." and having obtained a royal charter of confirmation he endowed this hall for a provost, and twelve fellows. After his death king Edward III. in remembrance of his queen Philippa, gave two tenements to this college, and settled them on the society by the name of Queen's college.

It is situated in the High-street, opposite University College. The front, which is formed in the style of the Luxemburgh palace, is at once magnificent and elegant. In the middle of it is a superb cupola, under which is a statue of the late queen Caroline. The first court is one hundred and forty feet in length, and one hundred and thirty in breadth; and, except the north side, is surrounded by a beautiful cloister. Over the western cloister are the provost's lodgings, which are spacious and splendid. The north side is formed by the chapel and hall, and finely finished in the Doric order. In the centre, over a portico leading to the north court, stands a handsome cupola supported by eight Ionic columns.

The north court is one hundred and thirty feet long, and ninety broad. On the west stands the library, which is of the Corinthian order. Under the east side of this edifice runs a cloister; its west side is adorned with statues of the founder, and benefactors, and other pieces of sculpture. The room within is highly finished. The book-cases, which are of Norway oak, are decorated with well-wrought carving, and in the ceiling are some admirable compartments of stucco.

The chapel is ornamented in the Corinthian order, with a beautiful ceiling of fret-work. The windows are all of fine old painted glass, viz. 1518; that over the altar excepted, representing our Lord's nativity, which was executed by Mr. Price, A. D. 1717. The most remarkable are two on the north side, of the Last Judgment, and two on the south, of the Ascension.

These, with the rest, were removed hither from the old chapel.

The hall, which is fitted up in the Doric order, and has an admirable proportion, is sixty feet long, and thirty broad, with an arched roof, of a correspondent height. It is furnished with excellent portraits of the founder and benefactors. Over the screen is a handsome gallery, intended for music, and as a vestibule to the common room, to which it leads.

The area on which this beautiful college stands is an oblong square three hundred feet in length, and two hundred and twenty in breadth, which being divided by the hall and chapel, is formed into the two courts above described.

This magnificent structure was begun by Sir Joseph Williamson, knight, in the year 1672, and being continued by the liberality of several other benefactors, was at length completed by the noble legacy of Mr. Mitchell of Richmond, who likewise founded eight fellowships and four scholarships. The fellows and scholars have handsome apartments appropriated to them in the new buildings, besides a stipend of fifty pounds per annum to each of the former, and thirty pounds per annum to each of the latter.

At present the college consists of a provost, sixteen fellows, two chaplains, eight taberdars, (so called from Taberdum, a short gown which they formerly wore) sixteen scholars, two clerks, and forty exhibitioners. The number of students is upwards of one hundred.

New College. This college is situated eastward of the schools, and is separated from Queen's College by a narrow lane on the south. It was founded by William of Wickham, bishop of Winchester, in the year 1379, and has many customs and privileges peculiar to itself.

In the center of the first court, which is one hundred and sixty-eight feet in length, and one hundred and twenty-nine in breadth, is a statue of Minerva, given by Sir Henry Parker of Hunnington in Warwickshire. The north side, which consists of the chapel and hall, is a noble specimen of Gothic magnificence. The two upper stories of the east side form the library; and on the west are the lodgings of the warden, which are very commodious, and adorned with many valuable portraits.

The chapel belonging to this college exceeds all in the university. The ante-chapel, which is supported by four pillars of fine proportion, runs at right angles to the choir, and is eighty feet long and thirty-six broad. The choir, which is entered by a gothic screen of beautiful construction, is one hundred feet long, thirty-five broad, and sixty-five in height. The painting over the altar is exceeding curious, and consists of a salutation piece, behind which the painter has artfully thrown the concave of a well ornamented dome, in which the chapel appears to terminate. The altar itself is approached by a noble flight of marble steps. It is enclosed by a well wrought rail of iron work, and covered with a rich pall of crimson velvet. From this situation, the organ with the stall-work underneath has a very striking effect. The windows on the south side are most beautifully painted by Mr. Price of London; don; each window representing eight figures of saints and martyrs, with their respective symbols and insignia, large as the life.

In this chapel choir service is performed every day at eleven and five, and is probably no where performed with more solemnity, or heard to better advantage. The organ is a most admirable instrument, erected by the famous Dolham, and since improved with the addition of the clarion-stop and swelling organ, by Mr. John Byfield.

Adjoining to the chapel, is a noble cloister, which constitutes a quadrangle, 146 feet in length on two sides, and 105 the other two, with a garden in the area; contiguous to which on the north is a large and lofty tower with ten bells.

The hall, is of excellent proportion, being 78 feet in length, 35 in breadth, and 43 in height. Its waincot, which was erected about the reign of Henry VIII. is curious, and much in character. At the east end are portraits of the munificent founder, William of Wickham; William of Wainfleet, founder of Magdalen college, and Henry Chichely, the founder of All Souls college.

The library consists of two rooms which are furnished with a fine collection, and well known to the learned for its many valuable manuscripts.

In the chapel is shewn the crozier of the founder, one of the noblest curiosities, and almost the only one of its kind now remaining in this kingdom. It is nearly seven feet in height, is of silver gilt, embellished with variety of the richest Gothic workmanship, and charged with figures of angels, and the tutelar saints of the cathedral church of Winchester, executed with an elegance equal to that of a more modern age. It is finely preserved, and from a length of almost four hundred years, has lost but little of its original splendor.

The garden court has a beautiful area, which, by means of a succession of retiring wings, displays itself gradually as we approach the garden, from which it is separated by a sumptuous iron pallisade, 130 feet in length. This court has a noble effect from the mount in the garden; and the prospect is still further improved by the appearance of the old Gothic spires and battlements, which overlook the new building from the founder's court. It began to be erected in the year 1682, at the expence of the college, assisted by many liberal benefactors.

A very principal part of the garden, as likewise part of the college, is surrounded by the city wall; which, from this circumstance of serving as a fence or boundary to the college precincts, is here, and here only, preserved entire, with its battlements and bastions, to a considerable distance. On the south side is a pleasant bowling green, shaded to the west by a row of elms, and on the east by tall sycamores, the branches of which being interwoven and incorporated with each other, from end to end, are justly admired as a natural curiosity.

This college, dedicated to St. Mary Winton, has been called New college from its first foundation, being at that time an object of public curiosity, and far superior, in point of extent and grandeur, to any college that had then appeared. It was the first effort to magnificence ever exhibited in Oxford; and probably Merton was, before this, the most splendid college in the university, though at that time by no means adorned with buildings as at present.

This college consists of the following members, viz. one warden, seventy fellows, ten chaplains, three clerks, sixteen choristers, and one sexton; together with many gentlemen commoners.

Lincoln College. The foundation of this college was begun by Richard Flenning, bishop of Lincoln, in the year 1427; but he dying before his design was completed, Thomas Rotherham, bishop of Lincoln, in the year 1475, finished the building of the college, encreased its revenues, and gave it the name it now bears.

This college is situated between All-Saints church and Exeter-college, and consists of two quadrangles. The first of these is formed exclusive of chambers, by the lodgings of the rector, standing in the south east angle, and erected by Thomas Beckington, bishop of Bath and Wells, in the year 1465; the library and common room on the north, and refectory on the east.

The library is small, but neatly decorated, and contains many curious manuscripts, chiefly given by Thomas Gascoigne, in the year 1432. It was finished, as it appears at present, by the liberality of Sir Nathaniel Lloyd, first a commoner of this, and afterwards fellow of All-Souls college. This room was originally the chapel, and was converted into a library at the expence of Nathaniel lord Crew, when fellow, in the year 1656.

The hall is forty feet in length, 25 in breadth, and proportionable in height. It was erected by John Williams, bishop of Lincoln; and was handsomely waincotted by bishop Crew, whose arms appear over the middle of the screen; and those of the rest of the contributors are interspersed about the mouldings.

From this court which forms a square of eighty feet, we enter through the south side, the second, which is about seventy feet square. On the south side of this quadrangle is the chapel, which was built by bishop Williams abovementioned, in the year 1631. The screen is of cedar elegantly carved. The windows are of painted glass, complete, and well preserved. Those on the north represent twelve of the prophets, and those on the south the twelve apostles, large as life.

The east window exhibits a view of the types relative to our Saviour, with their respective completions, viz.

1. From the left hand, the Nativity; and under it, the History of the Creation its ante-type.
2. Our Lord's baptism; and under it, the passing of the Israelites through the Red Sea.
3. The Jewish passover, and under it the institution of the Lord's Supper.
4. The Brazen Serpent in the Wilderness; corresponding to—Christ on the cross.
5. Jonas delivered from the whale's belly, expressive of—Christ's Resurrection.
6. Elijah in the fiery chariot, with—Our Lord's Ascension.

The roof consists of compartments in cedar, embellished with the arms of the different founders and benefactors, and interchangeably enriched with cherubims, palm-branches, and festoons, diversified with painting and gilding. There is an admirable proportion and elegance of execution in the eight figures of cedar which are respectively placed at each end of the desks, and represent Moses, Aaron, the four Evangelists, St. Peter and St. Paul.

The principal benefactor to this college is Nathaniel lord Crew, bishop of Durham, who, about the year 1717, added to the headship an annual allocation of twenty pounds; to the twelve fellowships ten pounds each; and to the seven scholarships and bible clerkship, five pounds each. He likewise improved the four college curacies; and moreover founded twelve exhibitioners, with salaries of twenty pounds per annum each.

At present the society consists of a rector, twelve fellows, twelve exhibitioners, and seven scholars, with a bible clerk; exclusive of members that are independent.

All Souls College. This college was founded by Henry Chicheley, archbishop of Canterbury, in the year 1437, for a warden, and forty fellows, the election of whom he directed should be annually held on All Souls day. It is situated in the High-street, westward of Queen's-college; and has over the gateway the statues of the founder and king Henry VI.

The first court is a handsome Gothic edifice 124 feet in length, and 72 in breadth. The chapel on the north side is a stately pile. The ante-chapel in which are some remarkable monuments, is 70 feet long, and 30 broad. The entrance to the inner chapel, which is of the same dimensions, is by a grand flight of marble steps, through a screen constructed by Sir Christopher Wren. The spacious environ of the altar consists of the richest red-vein marble. Above is a fine assumption piece of the founder, by Sir James Thornhill. On the right and left, at the approach of the altar, are two inimitable urns by the same hand, respectively representing, in their bas-reliefs, the institution of the two sacraments. Between the windows, on each side, are figures of saints in claro-obscuro, bigger than the life. The ceiling is disposed into compartments embellished with carving and gilding; and the whole has an air of great splendor and dignity.

The hall is an elegant modern room. It is furnished with portraits of the munificent founder, colonel Codrington, and Sir Nathaniel Lloyd. At the high table is an historical piece by Sir James Thornhill, whose subject is the finding of the law. The figure of Josiah, rending his robe, is animated and expressive. Over the chimney piece, which is handsomely executed, in dove-coloured marble, is a bust of the founder: on one side is a bust of Linacre, formerly fellow, a famous physician in the reign of Henry VIII. and on the other of John Leland, a celebrated antiquarian and polite scholar, about the same reign, supposed to have been a member of this house. The rest of the room is adorned with an admirable series of antique busts.

The buttery, which was built with the hall, is a well proportioned room, of an oval form, having an arched roof of stone, ornamented with curious workmanship.

The second court is a magnificent Gothic quadrangle, 172 feet in length, and 155 in breadth. On the south are the chapel and hall; on the west a cloister, with a grand portico; on the north a library; and on the east two superb Gothic towers, in the centre of a series of fine apartments.

The north side of this court is wholly taken up with the library, which is 200 feet in length, 30 in breadth, and 40 in height, and finished in the most splendid and elegant manner. The room itself is furnished with two noble arrangements of book cases, one above the other, supported by Doric and Ionic pilasters. The upper class is formed in a superb gallery, which surrounds three sides. On the north side, near the middle of the room, is a recess equal to the breadth of the whole room; and in its area is placed the statue of colonel Codrington, the founder of the library. The ceiling and spaces between the windows, are ornamented with the richest stucco; and over the gallery is a series of bronzes interchangeably disposed, consisting of vases, and the busts of many eminent men.

This college consists of one warden, forty fellows, two chaplains, three clerks and six choristers.

Magdalen College. This college was founded by William Patten, bishop of Winchester, in the year 1458. It is situated without the east gate of the city on the borders of the river Cherwell. At the entrance of the west front of the college is a Doric portal, decorated with a statue of the founder.

The gate under the west window of the chapel is adorned with five small but elegant figures; that on the right represents the founder; the next is William of Wykeham, in whose college at Winchester the founder was schoolmaster; the third is St. Mary Magdalen, to whom the college is dedicated; the fourth is Henry III. who founded the hospital since converted into this college; and the last of St. John the baptist, by whose name the said hospital was called.

Nearly adjoining to the president's lodgings is a stately gateway, the original entrance into the college; but since disused, formed in a tower, whose sides are adorned with statues of four of the persons above-mentioned. This leads us to a cloister, on the south side of which are the chapel and hall.

The hall is a stately Gothic room, well proportioned, and handsomely finished. It has four whole length portraits, viz. of the founder, doctor Butler, William Freeman, prince Rupert; and two half lengths, viz. bishop Warner, and doctor Hammond.

The ante-chapel is a spacious building, supported with two staff-moulded pillars, extremely light. In the west window are some fine remains of glass painted in claro obscuro. The subject is the resurrection. The design is after one invented and executed by Schwartz, for the wife of William duke of Bavaria, more than two hundred hundred years since, which was afterwards engraved by Sadeler. The choir is solemn, and handsomely decorated. The windows, each of which contains six figures, almost as large as life, of primitive fathers, saints, martyrs and apostles, are finely painted in the taste, and about the time of that just described. These windows formerly belonged to the ante-chapel, the two near the altar excepted, which were lately done, being all removed hither in the year 1741. In the confusion of the civil wars, the original choir windows were taken down and concealed. They did not, however, escape the rage of fanaticism and ignorance: they were unluckily discovered by a party of Cromwell's troopers, who spreading them along the cloisters, jumped through them in their jack-boots, with the utmost satisfaction, and entirely destroyed them. The altar-piece was performed by Isaac Fuller, about ninety years ago, and represents the Resurrection.

Under this piece is another admirable picture of our Lord bearing the cross, supposed to be the work of Guido. It was taken at Vigo; and being brought into England by the late duke of Ormond, came into the possession of William Freeman, esq; of Hamels, in Hertfordshire, who gave it to the society. The altar is fitted up in the modern stile, with a well executed wainscot, and columns of the Corinthian order, charged with other elegant embellishments. Choir service is performed in this chapel at eleven and four every day; except Sundays and Holidays, when the morning service is sung at eight.

On the north side of this court is a narrow passage that leads to a beautiful opening, one side of which is bounded by a noble and elegant edifice in the modern taste, consisting of three stories 300 feet in length. Through the center of this building we pass into the grove or paddock, which is well stocked with deer, and formed into many delightful walks and lawns.

Besides the abovementioned grove, there is a meadow within the college precincts, consisting of about thirteen acres, surrounded by a pleasant walk, called the Water-walk. This walk is shaded with hedges and lofty trees, which in one part grow wild, and in the other are cut and disposed regularly. The whole circuit of the walk is washed by branches of the Cherwell, and has many beautiful prospects. The tower of this college, which contains a musical peal of ten bells, was erected by cardinal Wolsey in the year 1492. The principal benefactors were, Henry VI. William Fitz Alan, earl of Arundell, Claymond, Morwent, &c.

The present members of this college are, a president, forty fellows, thirty demies, a divinity lecturer, a schoolmaster, one usher, four chaplains, an organist, eight clerks, and sixteen choristers. The number of students are about 120.

Brazen-Nose College. This college was founded by William Smith, bishop of Lincoln, and Richard Sutton, gent. in the year 1511. It received the singular epithet from a hall of the same name, distinguished by a large brass nose upon the gate, on the site of which it was principally built.

This college has two courts. The first, which is the original one, consists of the lodgings of the principal, and chambers of the fellows and students, and the refectory, which is elegantly fitted up, and adorned with portraits. Over its portico are two antique busts, one of Alfred, who built Little University hall, or King's hall, on the site of which the present college is partly founded; and the other of John Erigena, a Scotchman, who first read lectures in the said hall in the year 882. Over the door leading up to the Common room, which was originally the chapel, is a Latin inscription, the English of which runs thus:

“ In the name of God, the bishop of Lincoln
“ and Sutton, laid this stone, at the command “ of the king.”

In the center of this court is a statue of Cain and Abel.

From this court we are led through a passage on the left hand of the gate to the second court, which is planned in a good taste, and was probably the work of Sir Christopher Wren. The cloister on the east side supports the library; and on the south stands the chapel, the roof of which is a frame of wood in imitation of Gothic stonework. The altar is beautifully decorated, and the whole chapel is at once neat and splendid.

The college consists of one principal, twenty fellows, thirty scholars, and four exhibitioners; together with about forty or fifty students.

Corpus Christi College. This college was founded by Richard Fox, bishop of Winchester in the year 1513. It is situated near the back gate of Christ church, on the south side of Oriel college. A beautiful Gothic gateway leads us to the first court, in which there is a peculiar appearance of neatness. On the east stands the hall, which is handsomely wainscotted, and well proportioned. The rafters in the ceiling are well wrought in the Gothic stile.

In the center of this court is a curious column exhibiting a cylindrical dial, the construction of which is esteemed a valuable piece of old Gnomonics: It was made by Robert Hegge, a fellow, in the reign of queen Elizabeth. From hence we pass into the cloisters, which are in the modern taste. South of these is an elegant pile of building, of the Ionic order, which fronts Christ church meadow, and was erected by Dr. Turner, formerly president. There is likewise another neat structure, of the modern kind, near the hall, appropriated to the use of a certain number of gentlemen commoners.

The library, which is well furnished in general, is remarkable for a collection of pamphlets from the reformation to the revolution; an English bible, supposed to be of higher antiquity than that of Wickliffe; and a vellum roll, which exhibits the pedigree of the royal family, with the collateral branches, from Alfred to Edward I. richly decorated with their arms blazoned, and signed by the kings at arms. The most striking curiosity is an ancient manuscript history of the bible in French, illuminated with a series of beautiful tiful paintings, illustrating the sacred story. It was given by general Oglethorp, formerly a member of this house. Here is shewn also the crozier of the founder, which, although a fine specimen of antique workmanship, is by no means equal to that of Wickham at New College.

The chapel is seventy feet in length, and twenty-five in breadth, with a screen and altar-piece of cedar.

At present the members of this college consist of one president, twenty fellows, two chaplains, twenty scholars, two clerks, two choristers, and six gentlemen commoners.

The statutes ordain that the fellows should be elected from the scholars, and the latter from the counties and dioceses following, viz. one from Lancashire, one from Oxfordshire, two from Kent, one from Bedfordshire, one from Wiltshire, or, in defect of a candidate, the diocese of Sarum, two from Gloucestershire, two from Lincolnshire, two from Exeter, two from Bath and Wells, one from Durham, three from Hampshire, and two from Surry.

Christ Church College. This college was originally founded by cardinal Wolsey in the year 1525; but he being impeached of high treason before the buildings were finished, all the estates and possessions of this society were forfeited to the king, which put a stop to the buildings for three years, at the end of which time the king issued out letters patent, ordering the building to be carried on, the original revenues to be settled on the society, and the foundation to be called king Henry VIII's college; but being afterwards dissatisfied with this appointment, he suppressed the institution in 1545, and in the year following erected the church of this college into a cathedral, by the name of the cathedral church of Christ in Oxford, founded by king Henry VIII. and settled in it a bishop, dean and eight canons, eight clerks, eight choristers, a music master, an organist, and forty students, who were to be chosen yearly from Westminster school.

The front of this college is extended to the length of 382 feet, and terminated at either end by two corresponding turrets. In the center is the grand entrance, whose Gothic proportions and ornaments are remarkably magnificent. Over it is a beautiful tower, planned by Sir Christopher Wren, and erected by bishop Fell. It contains the great bell called Tom, on the sound of which, every night at nine, the students of the whole university are enjoined by statute to repair to their respective societies. The spectator cannot but observe with regret, that this front, perhaps the noblest in the kingdom of the Gothic stile, loses much of its effect, on account of the declivity of the ground on which it stands, and the narrowness of the approach. It seems, however, probable, that a terrace walk was intended, by way of raising the ground to a level, the whole length of the college; for the rough foundation stones of the hospital on the opposite side, left unfinished by Wolsey, still remain bare, and the smooth stones are terminated by an horizontal right line, to which height the ground would have been elevated.

The east, north, and west sides of the grand quadrangle, with part of the south, consist of the lodgings of the dean, the canons, and the students, &c. The greatest part of the south side is formed by the hall, which is considerably elevated above the rest of the buildings, and, taken as a detached structure, is a noble specimen of ancient magnificence.—The south, east, and part of the west side, were erected by cardinal Wolsey, as was the kitchen to the south of the hall, which is every way proportionable to the rest of the college.

The north, and what remained of the west side of this court, was finished in the year 1665. By the marks on the wall, some suppose this area was surrounded by a cloister. It is evident that a cloister was designed, but it does not appear ever to have been executed.

Round the area is a spacious terrace walk made in the year 1665; and in the center a basin and fountain, with a statue of Mercury. On the inside over the grand entrance, is a statue of queen Anne: over the arch, in the north east angle, another of bishop Fell; and opposite to that at the south east, a statue of Cardinal Wolsey.

Beneath the last statue is the hall, which contains eight windows on each side, and is 120 feet in length, 40 in breadth, and 80 feet high. It is entered by a spacious and stately stair-case of stone, covered by a beautiful roof built in the year 1630, which, though very broad, is supported by a small single pillar of fine proportion.

This hall is probably the largest, and certainly the most superb of any in the kingdom. The roof is a noble frame of timber work, beautified with near three hundred coats of arms, properly blazoned, and enriched with other decorations of painting, carving and gilding, in the Gothic taste. The room has been refitted at a large expence, and is adorned with the portraits of many eminent persons who have been either educated at, or connected with the college.

The church belonging to this college is situated to the east of the grand quadrangle. It is an ancient venerable structure, and was originally the church of St. Frideswide's monastery, on or near the site of which the college is erected. The roof of the choir is a beautiful piece of stone work, put up by Cardinal Wolsey, who likewise rebuilt or refitted the spire as it now stands. The isle, on the north of the choir, was the dormitory of St. Frideswide's, in which an ancient monument is shewn, said to be the tomb of that saint who died in the year 739. Some of the windows are adorned with beautiful paintings, particularly the east and west windows, the former of which represents the Epiphany; and the latter, St. Peter delivered out of prison by the angel.

Choir service is performed in this cathedral twice a day, viz. at ten o'clock in the morning, and four in the afternoon.

This college or church consists of one dean, eight canons, eight chaplains, eight singing men, one organist, eight choristers, and one hundred and one students.

Trinity College. This college was founded by Sir

Sir Thomas Pope, knight, in the year 1555. It is situate opposite to the Turl, and has a spacious avenue, fenced from the street by an handsome iron pallisade, with folding gates, adorned on the outside with the arms of the donor, and the earl of Guilford. Over the gate which leads to the front of the college are the arms of the founder, surrounded with a wreath of laurel, and supported by the genii of Fame.

The chapel is extremely elegant. The ceiling is covered with a bold and beautiful stucco; and the carvings about the screen, which is of cedar, are very masterly. Under an alcove near the altar, is a fine Gothic tomb, on which are the effigies of the liberal founder and his lady in alabaster.

The hall is spacious and well proportioned, in the Gothic style, and adorned with portraits of the founder and his lady.

The library contains a great number of books, among which is a valuable manuscript of Euclid; being a translation from the Arabic into Latin, before the discovery of the original Greek, by Adalardus Bathoniensis, in 1130.

This college consists of one president, twelve fellows, and twelve scholars. These, with the independent members amount to near seventy.

St. John Baptist's College. This college was founded by Sir Thomas White, alderman of London, in the year 1557. It stands in a retired situation, on the north of Baliol and Trinity colleges. Before its front is a handsome terrace, shaded with a row of lofty elms. It consists of two courts, in the first of which are the chapel and hall on the north, and the president's lodgings on the east.

The chapel is very elegantly furnished. The screen and altar are finished in the Corinthian order. Over the communion table is a beautiful piece of tapestry, representing our Lord breaking bread with the two disciples at Emmaus, from a famous original of Titian. On the north wall, eastward of the organ, is a marble urn, containing the heart of doctor Rawlinson, inclosed in a silver vessel, which was placed here according to the direction of his last will; and is thought to be a singular curiosity.

The hall is elegantly fitted up in the modern taste. The screen is of Portland stone, in the Ionic order; and the wainscot, which is the same, is remarkably beautiful. Over the chimney piece, is a picture of St. John the Baptist, by Titian; and at the upper end is a whole length portrait of the founder, with archbishop Laud on the right, and archbishop Juxton on the left.

The second court is the design of Inigo Jones, and was built in 1635. The east and west sides exhibit, each, a beautiful Doric colonade, whose columns consist of a remarkable species of stone, said to be dug at Fifield, in Berks. In the center of each colonade are formed two porticos, charged with a profusion of embellishments. Over these, on each side, are two good statues in brass; that on the east of Charles I. and that on the west, of his queen.

The library is formed from the upper stories of the south and east sides. The first division consists of printed books; the second of manuscripts, chiefly given by archbishop Laud, who, in this room, entertained Charles I. and his court with an elegant feast. In the archives are many curiosities; particularly a drawing of king Charles I. which contains the book of psalms written in the lines of the face and hair of the head. Likewise a picture of St. John the Baptist stained in marble.

This college consists of one president, fifty fellows, two chaplains, one organist, five singing men, six choristers, and two sextons; exclusive of about seventy students.

Jesus College was founded by Hugh Price, doctor of the canon laws, in the university, in the year 1571.

In the first court is the hall, in which is a portrait of queen Elizabeth, with a ceiling of well executed stucco; the principal's lodgings, in which is a valuable picture of Charles I. at full length; and the chapel which is handsomely furnished and well proportioned.

The library, which is on the west side of the inner court, is a well furnished room, and adorned, among other portraits, with a curious picture of Doctor Hugh Price, founder of the college.

The present members of this college consist of one principal, nineteen fellows, and eighteen scholars; besides many exhibitioners and independent students.

Wadham College. The design of this building was projected by Nicholas Wadham, esq; but he dying before the commencement of its execution, appointed Dorothy, his wife, to finish the same, which was accordingly done, and opened for the admittance of members on the twelfth of April 1613.

This college is situate in the northern suburb, called Holywell, the front being opposite to Trinity gardens. The hall is entered by a handsome portico decorated with the statue of the founder, the foundress, James I. and other ornaments. It is a spacious and lofty room, furnished with some valuable portraits; particularly a most remarkable one of an old woman.

The chapel is spacious and venerable. The east window is admirably painted by Van Ling, a Dutchman; it represents the passion of our Lord, and is said to have cost fifteen hundred pounds. Round the altar is a very singular piece of painting, the figures of which are finely drawn, and have a wonderful effect. The subject of the front is the Lord's supper; on the north, Abraham and Melchisedeck; and on the south, the children of Israel gathering manna.

The present members of this college are, one warden, fifteen fellows, and fifteen scholars; two chaplains, two clerks, and sixteen exhibitioners.

Pembroke College. This college was founded by Thomas Tildale, of Glimpton, near Woodstock, gent. in the year 1610. and is situate directly opposite the grand gate of Christ church. At the entrance, on the right hand, are the master's lodgings, which make a handsome appearance, and are large and convenient. From the first quadrangle, which, though small, is neat and uniform, we are led, by the north west angle, into the hall, which is very handsome, and adorned with pictures of the founder and benefactors.

The chapel, which is situated on one side of an irregular area, is a modern edifice of the Ionic order. The altar is greatly admired for its neatness, and the whole is elegantly finished, and properly adorned. It was built by contribution, and consecrated in 1732.

To the west of the chapel is the garden, in which is a pleasant common room, and an agreeable terrace walk, formed on the city wall.

To this college belong one master, fourteen fellows, and upwards of thirty scholars and exhibitioners.

Worcester College. This college was endowed by Sir Thomas Cooke of Astley, near the city of Worcester, in the year 1714. It is situated at the extremity of the western suburb, on an eminence which descends to the river and meadows. The grand court, or area, consists of three sides, all of which are finished in the modern taste.

The library is a beautiful Ionic edifice, one hundred feet in length, supported by a spacious cloister. It is furnished with a fine collection of books given by doctor Clarke, formerly fellow of All Soul's College. The greatest curiosity in this room is Inigo Jones's pallisadio, with his own manuscript notes in Italian.

On entering the college we have on each side the chapel and hall, both of which are fifty feet in length, and twenty-nine in breadth. On the whole, this house, when executed according to the plan, will be a well disposed elegant structure.

The society at present consists of one provost, twenty fellows, and seventeen scholars.

Hertford College. This college was originally called Hart-hall, but being endowed by the late doctor Richard Newton, for a principal, four senior fellows, or tutors, and junior fellows, or assistants, besides a certain number of students, or scholars, was, upon the eighth of September, 1740, erected to a college, by the name of Hertford college.

It is situate opposite the grand gate of the schools, and consists of one irregular court, which has been lately beautified from a fund raised for that purpose by the late principal. Part of this court consists of a small quantity of modern buildings, viz. the south east angle, and the chapel erected about thirty years since, in the stile of which the whole college is to be rebuilt.

Here are one principal, four senior fellows, or assistants, besides a certain number of students or scholars. The number of members in the whole is about thirty.

Exclusive of the above colleges, there are in the university of Oxford, five halls, viz.

1. Magdalen Hall. This hall is almost contiguous to Magdalen college on the west. A principal part of it is the grammar school for the choristers of Magdalen college, erected by the founder, William of Wainfleet, for that purpose alone. In this hall lord Clarendon, the celebrated historian, received his education. It has a well furnished library, with a neat chapel and refectory.

Opposite to this hall Edmund earl of Cornwall founded a small house and chapel for Trinitarian friars, of the redemption of captives, in 1291, in which, and in a chapel dedicated to the trinity, within East-gate, the brethren of this order, and several poor scholars who lived upon alms, continued till near the time of the general dissolution.

2. New Inn Hall. This hall is situated near St. Peter's church in the Bailey towards the castle. It was assigned to students by John Trillock, bishop of Hereford, in the year 1345, and is eminent for the education of many learned civilians.

Nearly opposite to this hall stands part of the gateway of St. Mary's college, in which Erasmus for sometime resided. It was founded in the year 1437 for novices of the Augustin order, and suppressed at the reformation.

Alban Hall. This hall joins to Merton college on the east. It appears to have been a house of learning in the reign of Edward I. and received its name from Robert de St. Alban, a citizen of Oxford, who, in the reign of Henry III. conveyed this tenement to the nuns of Littlemore. The front is decent, and was erected by Benedict Barnham, alderman of London, in the year 1595. It has a small refectory but no chapel.

4. St. Mary Hall. This hall is situate to the south of St. Mary's church, in Oriel-lane. It consists of an elegant little court, which encloses a neat garden; and has a library, with a handsome, though small chapel, and refectory.

5. St. Edmund's Hall. This hall is contiguous to the east part of Queen's college. It was first established about the reign of Edward II. and was assigned to Queen's college in the year 1557. It has a library, refectory and chapel, which are all very neat and commodious.

Oxford sends four members to parliament, viz. two for the city and two for the university. It has two markets, one on Wednesday, and the other on Saturday. Also three annual fairs, viz. the third of May, the first Monday in September, and the Thursday before Michaelmas.

Being a continuation of our History from September 1769, to the year 1770.

ON the twenty-ninth of September 1769, came on at Guildhall, the election of two persons to be returned by the livery to the court of aldermen for their choice of one to serve the office of Lord-mayor of the city of London for the year ensuing. The persons nominated were William Beckford, esq; Barlow Trecothick, esq; and Sir Henry Banks.

Various disputes arose between the livery and the city officers respecting the legality of Mr. Beckford's nomination. The town clerk and common serjeant warmly objected to it, and produced an obsolete by-law of the corporation made in the reign of Henry VI. which imported, "that it was agreed between the aldermen and commonalty, that on account of the heavy burden, the increased expence, and particular circumstances of those times, no person should be re-chosen to serve the office of Lord-mayor within the term of seven years after his former mayoralty." To this the livery replied, that there were precedents since that time to the contrary, and particularly that of Sir John Barnard, who having served the office of Lord mayor in 1737, was re-elected to the same office in the year 1740. This precedent being undeniable, and no answer given to it, Mr. Sheriff Townshend told the livery that he thought it his duty to take notice to them of the imposition attempted to be put upon him and them by their servants, the town clerk and common serjeant; that as not supposing them capable of an action of that kind, he had before given his opinion to the livery on the objection their servants had raised to their wishes, so he now declared the objection entirely overthrown.

Mr. Sawbridge, the other sheriff, with great humanity, endeavoured to appease the minds of the livery, and to mitigate the fault of the common serjeant. The nomination then took place; and after Mr. Beckford and the several aldermen below the chair had been nominated, the sheriffs declared the shew of hands to be for Messrs Beckford and Trecothick. A poll, however, being afterwards demanded for Sir Henry Banks, the same commenced immediately, and was continued till the sixth of October following, when, being finished, the numbers appeared as follow:

For William Beckford, 1967.
Barlow Trecothick, 1911.
Sir Henry Banks, 676.

In consequence of this, the two former were presented to the court of aldermen for their choice of one of them. And at another meeting held the next day it was determined to receive the sheriffs return, and the aldermen proceeded to their choice; sixteen of whom scratched for Mr. Beckford, and only six for Trecothick; whereupon the former was declared to be legally chosen.

On this declaration Mr. Beckford pleaded his age and infirmities, and wished, as he had before intreated them, that they had chosen Mr. Trecothick, and at the same time declaring that he must decline it. This was received by the livery with every mark of discontent. They vehemently persisted in their refusal to listen to any excuse whatever. And so determined were they to obtain their ends, that the next day, October, 13, a great number of them, together with the two sheriffs, waited on Mr. Beckford, and in the strongest terms of respect, solicited with much importunity, that he would, at that important crisis, serve the office of Lord-mayor for the year ensuing, to which dignity he had been a second time elected. Mr. Beckford yielded to their earnest request, and warmest desires and wishes; and told them, that notwithstanding his advanced years, with all his attendant infirmities, and giving up his ease and repose, he would devote himself to the service of the city of London, as well as the nation in general, by accepting the office.

In consequence of this answer, on the 8th of November Mr. Beckford was sworn into his office at Guildhall, in the presence of the Lord-mayor, several aldermen, the two sheriffs, &c. when the ensigns of mayoralty were surrendered to him in the usual manner. The next day, the 9th of November his lordship, together with Samuel Turner, esq; the late mayor, attended by six of the aldermen, and two sheriffs, set out from Guildhall in a very grand procession to the Three Cranes, from whence they proceeded in the city barge to the court of Exchequer at Westminster, where his lordship was sworn into his office with the accustomed formality. The dignity and splendor of the procession was considerably heightened by the state coach, which was magnificently adorned and drawn by a fine set of new foreign horses, preceded by eight footmen in very rich liveries. The cover to the coach box was crimson velvet curiously wrought; on the front, the sides, and the back part were enclosed the city arms and those of the ironmongers company, the cap of liberty, and various flowers of gold, with a fringe of gold round the edges. The whole procession was exceeding brilliant, and the entertainment at Guildhall more splendid than had been known for many years on a like occasion.

On the 10th of November came on in the court of common pleas, Westminster, a trial between lord Halifax and John Wilkes, esq; on an action brought by the latter against the former for illegally seizing his person and papers; when after many learned arguments by the council on both sides, a verdict was found for the plaintiff, with 4000*l*. damages. The populace were so incensed at this verdict (the damages having been laid at 20,000*l*.) that the jury were obliged to make their retreat the back way, with scarce time to take their fees, and without being invited to the accustomed refreshment of dinner.

On the 6th of March, 1770 pursuant to a precept issued by the Lord-mayor, a common hall of the livery of London was held at Guildhall, in order to consider of a remonstrance to his majesty, respecting the grievances complained of in a petition presented the 5th of July last. His lordship opened the business of the meeting in a spirited manly address to the livery. He told them that these causes of complaint were not to be attributed to the king; that we had the best of princes; that the enjoyment of our present liberties was owing to the illustrious house of Brunswick; and that it was only under their influence and sovereignty we could hope to preserve them. He asserted, that it was to evil counsellors only that many of the present national calamities were to be attributed; and he concluded with exhorting every person present to maintain order, decorum and regularity.

After his lordship had done Mr. Lovell stepped forward and addressed the common-hall in a sensible elegant speech, in which he informed them of the measures that himself and the rest of the committee had taken, and pointed out the necessity of the present meeting.

He told them that the city not having been honoured by his majesty with an answer, and the same sort of bad men and bad measures still prevailing and increasing, it was necessary now to send up a remonstrance. He then said that the committee had prepared a remonstrance, which, if it was their pleasure, he would deliver to the Lord-mayor to be by him given to the proper officer to be read to them.

The livery testifying their approbation, Sir James Hodges, the town clerk, came forward, and read it, the purport of which was as follows:

“ That the petitioners had in a former petition laid their grievances before his majesty, whom they considered as the father of his people. That their complaints had been slighted, their grievances confirmed, and the only judge who was removeable at the pleasure of the crown (meaning lord chancellor Camden) had been dismissed for his conduct in parliament.

“ That the same secret and malign influence had effected a measure which would prove more ruinous than the tax of ship money levied by Charles I. or any of the arbitrary mea“ sures attempted by James II. That if the parliament of James II. had been as compliant and subservient to that prince, as a subsequent one was to the views of the minister, the clamour of his minions for its meeting would have been as loud as the outcries were for the other's dissolution. And concluded with praying his majesty to dissolve the parliament.”

The remonstrance was received by the livery with the greatest acclamations of joy. And on the 14th the right honourable the Lord-mayor, attended by the two sheriffs, the aldermen Trecothick and Stephenson, the city officers, the committee of the livery, and about 120 common-councilmen, went in procession from Guildhall to St. James's, to present the same to his majesty, amidst the acclamations of a vast multitude of spectators assembled on the occasion.

At two o'clock they were introduced to his majesty, who received them seated on the throne. Sir James Hodges the town clerk, then read the remonstrance to his majesty very properly and distinctly, and with a suitable and judicious emphasis. To which his majesty was pleased to return the following answer:

“ I shall always be ready to receive the requests, and to listen to the complaints of my subjects; but it gives me great concern to find, that any of them should have been so far misled as to offer me an address and remonstrance, the contents of which I cannot but consider as disrespectful to me, injurious to parliament, and irreconcilable to the principles of the constitution.

“ I have ever made the law of the land the rule of my conduct, esteeming it my chief glory to reign over a free people. With this view I have always been careful, as well to execute faithfully the trust reposed in me, as to avoid even the appearance of invading any of those powers which the constitution has placed in other hands. It is only by persevering in such a conduct, that I can either discharge my own duty, or secure to my subjects the free enjoyment of those rights which my family were called to defend; and while I act upon these principles, I shall have a right to expect, and I am confident I shall continue to receive, the steady and affectionate support of my people.”

Remonstrances of the like nature have been presented from the city of Westminster and county of Middlesex; and others are in agitation at this time (April 1770) in almost all parts of the kingdom. What the event will be time only can discover.

In the description of the French hospital, p. 606, instead of the second paragraph, read thus:

“ This hospital contains about two hundred and twenty poor helpless men and women, all of whom are upon the foundation, and are plentifully supplied with the necessaries of life at the expence of the hospital. This charity likewise extends to lunatics, for whose accommodation a large infirmary is provided.”

The Publisher of the Work hopes that no Subscriber will take it amiss, if he finds his Name omitted in this List, since he has not been able to procure near one half of them, notwithstanding he delayed the Publication several Weeks entirely on that Account. It is also hoped that no Gentleman will be angry if he finds his Name spelt wrong, as they are all printed exactly as they were delivered by the Hawkers and others.
